"I have neither allowed you a heart nor a head," said Zarah, calmly.—"Nay, never redden as if you would fly at me. I say not but nature may have given you both; but folly has confounded the one, and selfishness perverted the other. The man whom I call deserving the name, is one whose thoughts and exertions are for others, rather than himself—whose high purpose is adopted on just principles, and never abandoned while heaven and earth affords means of accomplishing it. He is one who will neither seek an indirect advantage by a specious road, nor take an evil path to gain a real good purpose. Such a man were one for whom a woman's heart should beat constant while he breathes, and break when he dies."

She spoke with so much energy that the water sparkled in her eyes, and her cheek coloured with the vehemence of her feelings.

"You speak," said the Duke, "as if you had yourself a heart which could pay the full tribute to the merit which you describe so warmly."

"And have I not?" she said, laying her hand on her bosom. "Here beats one that would bear me out in what I have said, whether in life or in death!"

"Were it in my power," said the Duke, "who began to get farther interested in his visiter than he could at first have thought possible—"Were it in my power to deserve such faithful attachment, methinks it should be my care to requite it."

"Your wealth, your titles, your reputation as a gallant—all you possess, were too little to merit such sincere affection."

"Come, fair lady," said the Duke, a good deal liquored, "do not be quite so disdainful. Bethink you, that if your love be as pure as coined gold, still a poor fellow like myself may offer you an equivalent in silver—The quantity of my affection must make up for its quality."

"But I am not carrying my affection to market, my lord; and therefore I need none of the base coin you offer in change for it."

"How do I know that, my fairest?" said the Duke. "This is the realm of Paphos—You have invaded it, with what purpose you best know; but I think with one consistent with your present assumption of cruelty. Come, come—eyes that are so intelligent can laugh with delight, as well as gleam with scorn and anger. You are here a waif on Cupid's manor, and I must seize on you in name of the deity."

"Do not think of touching me, my lord," said the lady. "Approach me not, if you would hope to learn the purpose of my being here. Your Grace may suppose yourself a Solomon if you please; but I am no travelling princess, come from distant climes, either to flatter your pride, or wonder at your glory."

"A defiance, by Jupiter!" said the Duke.

"You mistake the signal," said the 'dark ladye'; "I came not here without taking sufficient precautions for my retreat."

"You mouth it bravely," said the Duke; "but never mistress so boasted its resources but the garrison had some thoughts of surrender. Thus I open the first parallel."

They had been hitherto divided from each other by long narrow table, which, placed in the recess of the large casement we have mentioned, had formed a sort of barrier on the lady's side, against the adventurous assailant. The Duke went hastily to remove it as he spoke; but, attentive to all his motions, his visiter instantly darted through the half open window.

Buckingham uttered a cry of horror and surprise, giving no doubt, at first, that she had precipitated herself from a height of at least fourteen feet: for so far the window was distant from the ground. But when he sprung to the spot, he perceived, to his astonishment, that she had effected her descent with equal agility and safety.

The outside of this stately mansion was decorated with a quantity of carving, in the mixed state, betwixt the Gothic and Grecian styles, which marks the age of Elizabeth and her successor; and though the feat seemed a surprising one, the projections of these ornaments were sufficient to afford footing to a creature so light and active, even in her hasty descent.

Inflamed alike by mortification and curiosity, Buckingham at first entertained some thought of following her by the same dangerous route, and had actually got upon the sill of the window for that purpose; and was contemplating what might be his next safe movement, when, from a neighbouring thicket of shrubs, amongst which his visiter had disappeared, he heard her chant a verse of a comic song, then much in fashion, concerning a despairing lover who had recourse to a precipice—

"But when he came near,
Beholding how steep
The sides did appear,
And the bottom how deep—
Though his suit was rejected,
He sadly reflected,
That a lover forsaken
A new love may get;
But a neck that's once broken
Can never be set."

The Duke could not help laughing, though much against his will, at the resemblance which the verses bore to his own absurd situation, and stepping back into the apartment, desisted from an attempt which might have proved dangerous as well as ridiculous. He called his attendants, and contented himself with watching the little thicket, unwilling to think that a female who had thrown herself in a great measure into his way, meant absolutely to mortify him by a retreat.

That question was determined in an instant. A form, wrapped in a mantle, with a slouched hat and shadowy plume, issued from the bushes, and was lost in a moment amongst the ruins of ancient and of modern buildings, with which, as we have already stated, the demesne formerly termed York House was now encumbered in all directions.

The Duke's servants, who had obeyed his impatient summons, were hastily directed to search for this tantalizing siren in every direction. Their master, in the mean time, eager and vehement in every new pursuit, but especially when his vanity was piqued, encouraged their diligence by bribes, and threats, and commands. All was in vain.—They found nothing of the Mauritanian Princess, as she called herself, but the turban and the veil; both of which she had left in the thicket, together with her satin slippers, which articles, doubtless, she had thrown aside as she exchanged them for others less remarkable.

Finding all his search in vain, the Duke of Buckingham after the example of spoiled children of all ages and stations, gave a loose to the frantic vehemence of passion; and fiercely he swore vengeance on his late visiter, whom he termed by a thousand opprobrious epithets, of which the elegant phrase "Jilt" was most frequently repeated.

Even Jerningham, who knew the depths and shallows of his master's mood, and was bold to fathom them at almost every state of his passions, kept out of his way on the present occasion; and, cabined with the pious old housekeeper, declared to her, over a bottle of ratafia, that, in his apprehension, if his Grace did not learn to put some control on his temper, chains, darkness, straw, and Bedlam, would be the final doom of the gifted and admired Duke of Buckingham.

CHAPTER XL.

—Contentions fierce,

Ardent, and dire, spring from no petty cause.—Admon.

THE quarrels between man and wife are proverbial; but let not these honest folks think that connexions of a less permanent nature are free from similar jars.

The frolic of the Duke of Buckingham, and the subsequent escape of Alice Bridgenorth, had kindled fierce dissension in Chiffinch's family, when, on his arrival in town, he learned these two stunning events: "I tell you," he said to his obliging helpmate, who seemed but little moved by all that he could say on the subject, "that your d—d carelessness has ruined the work of years."

"I think it is the twentieth time you have said so," replied the dame; "and without such frequent assurance, I was quite ready to believe that a very trifling matter would upset any scheme of yours, however long thought of."

"How on earth could you have the folly to let the Duke into the house when you expected the King?" said the irritated courtier.

"Lord, Chiffinch," answered the lady, "ought not you to ask the porter, rather than me, that sort of question?—I was putting on my cap to receive his Majesty."

"With the address of a madge-howlet," said Chiffinch, "and in the mean while you gave the cat the cream to keep."

"Indeed, Chiffinch," said the lady, "these jaunts to the country do render you excessively vulgar! there is a brutality about your very boots! nay, your muslin ruffles, being somewhat soiled, give to your knuckles a sort of rural rusticity, as I may call it."

"It were a good deed," muttered Chiffinch, "to make both boots and knuckles bang the folly and affectation out of thee." Then speaking aloud, he added, like a man who would fain break off an argument, by extorting from his adversary a confession that he has reason on his side, "I am sure, Kate, you must be sensible that our all depends on his Majesty's pleasure."

"Leave that to me," said she; "I know how to please his Majesty better than you can teach me. Do you think his Majesty is booby enough to cry like a school-boy because his sparrow has flown away? His Majesty has better taste. I am surprised at you, Chiffinch," she added, drawing herself up, "who were once thought to know the points of a fine woman, that you should have made such a roaring about this country wench. Why, she has not even the country quality of being plump as a barn-door fowl, but is more like a Dunstable lark, that one must crack bones and all if you would make a mouthful of it. What signifies whence she came, or where she goes? There will be those behind that are much more worthy of his Majesty's condescending attention, even when the Duchess of Portsmouth takes the frumps."

"You mean your neighbour, Mistress Nelly," said her worthy helpmate; "but, Kate, her date is out. Wit she has, let her keep herself warm with it in worse company, for the cant of a gang of strollers is not language for a prince's chamber."

"It is no matter what I mean, or whom I mean," said Mrs. Chiffinch; "but I tell you, Tom Chiffinch, that you will find your master quite consoled for loss of the piece of prudish puritanism that you would needs saddle him with; as if the good man were not plagued enough with them in Parliament but you must, forsooth, bring them into his very bed-chamber."

"Well, Kate," said Chiffinch, "if a man were to speak all the sense of the seven wise masters, a woman would find nonsense enough to overwhelm him with; so I shall say no more, but that I would to Heaven I may find the King in no worse humour than you describe him. I am commanded to attend him down the river to the Tower to-day, where he is to make some survey of arms and stores. They are clever fellows who contrive to keep Rowley from engaging in business, for, by my word, he has a turn for it."

* In Evelyn's Memoirs is the following curious passage respecting Nell Gwyn, who is hinted at in the text:—"I walked with him [King Charles II.] through Saint James' Park to the garden, where I both saw and heard a very familiar discourse between . . . [the King] and Mrs. Nelly, as they called her, an intimate comedian, she looking out of her garden on a terrace at the top of the wall, and [the King] standing on the green walk under it. I was heartily sorry at this scene."—EVELYN'S Memoirs, vol. i. p. 415.

"I warrant you," said Chiffinch the female, nodding, but rather to her own figure reflected from a mirror, than to her politic husband,— "I warrant you we will find means of occupying him that will sufficiently fill up his time."

"On my honour, Kate," said the male Chiffinch, "I find you strangely altered, and, to speak truth, grown most extremely opinionative. I shall be happy if you have good reason for your confidence."

The dame smiled superciliously, but deigned no other answer, unless this were one,— "I shall order a boat to go upon the Thames to-day with the royal party."

"Take care what you do, Kate; there are none dare presume so far but women of the first rank. Duchess of Bolton—of Buckingham—of"—

"Who cares for a list of names? why may not I be as forward as the greatest B. amongst your string of them?"

"Nay, faith, thou mayst match the greatest B. in Court already," answered Chiffinch; "so e'en take thy own course of it. But do not let Chaubert forget to get some collation ready, and a souper au petit couvert, in case it should be commanded for the evening."

"Ay, there your boasted knowledge of Court matters begins and ends.—Chiffinch, Chaubert, and Company;—dissolve that partnership, and you break Tom Chiffinch for a courtier."

"Amen, Kate," replied Chiffinch; "and let me tell you, it is as safe to rely on another person's fingers as on our own wit. But I must give orders for the water.—If you will take the pinnace, there are the cloth-of-gold cushions in the chapel may serve to cover the benches for the day. They are never wanted where they lie, so you may make free with them too."

Madam Chiffinch accordingly mingled with the flotilla which attended the King on his voyage down the Thames, amongst whom was the Queen, attended by some of the principal ladies of the Court. The little plump Cleopatra, dressed to as much advantage as her taste could devise, and seated upon her embroidered cushions like Venus in her shell, neglected nothing that effrontery and minauderie could perform to draw upon herself some portion of the King's observation; but Charles was not in the vein, and did not even pay her the slightest passing attention of any kind, until her boatmen, having ventured to approach nearer to the Queen's barge than etiquette permitted, received a peremptory order to back their oars, and fall out of the royal procession. Madam Chiffinch cried for spite, and transgressed Solomon's warning, by cursing the King in her heart; but had no better course than to return to Westminster, and direct Chaubert's preparations for the evening.

In the mean time, the royal barge paused at the Tower; and, accompanied by a laughing train of ladies and of courtiers, the gay Monarch made the echoes of the old prison-towers ring with the unwonted sounds of mirth and revelry. As they ascended from the river side to the centre of the building, where the fine old Keep of William the Conqueror, called the White Tower, predominates over the exterior defences, Heaven only knows how many gallant jests, good or bad, were run on the comparison of his Majesty's state-prison to that of Cupid, and what killing similes were drawn between the ladies' eyes and the guns of the fortress, which, spoken with a fashionable congee, and listened to with a smile from a fair lady, formed the fine conversation of the day.

This gay swarm of flutterers did not, however, attend close on the King's person, though they had accompanied him upon his party on the river. Charles, who often formed manly and sensible resolutions, though he was too easily diverted from them by indolence or pleasure, had some desire to make himself personally acquainted with the state of the military stores, arms, &c., of which the Tower was then, as now, the magazine; and, although he had brought with him the usual number of his courtiers, only three or four attended him on the scrutiny which he intended. Whilst, therefore, the rest of the train amused themselves as they might in other parts of the Tower, the King, accompanied by the Dukes of Buckingham, Ormond, and one or two others, walked through the well-known hall, in which is preserved the most splendid magazine of arms in the world, and which, though far from exhibiting its present extraordinary state of perfection, was even then an arsenal worthy of the great nation to which it belonged.

The Duke of Ormond, well known for his services during the Great Civil War, was, as we have elsewhere noticed, at present rather on cold terms with his Sovereign, who nevertheless asked his advice on many occasions, and who required it on the present amongst others, when it was not a little feared, that the Parliament, in their zeal for the Protestant religion, might desire to take the magazines of arms and ammunition under their own exclusive orders. While Charles sadly hunted at such a termination of the popular jealousies of the period, and discussed with Ormond the means of resisting or evading it, Buckingham, falling a little behind, amused himself with ridiculing the antiquated appearance and embarrassed demeanour of the old warder who attended on the occasion, and who chanced to be the very same that escorted Julian Peveril to his present place of confinement. The Duke prosecuted his railery with the greater activity, that he found the old man, though restrained by the place and presence, was rather upon the whole testy, and disposed to afford what sportsmen call play to his persecutor. The various pieces of ancient armour, with which the wall was covered, afforded the principal source of the Duke's wit, as he insisted upon knowing from the old man, who, he said, could best remember matters from the days of King Arthur downwards at the least, the history of the different warlike weapons, and anecdotes of the battles in which they had been wielded. The old man obviously suffered when he was obliged, by repeated questions, to tell the legends (often sufficiently absurd) which the tradition of the place had assigned to particular relics. Far from flourishing his partisan, and augmenting the emphasis of his voice, as was and is the prevailing fashion of these warlike Ciceroni, it was scarcely possible to extort from him a single word concerning those topics on which their information is usually overflowing.

"Do you know, my friend," said the Duke to him at last, "I begin to change my mind respecting you? I supposed you must have served as a Yeoman of the Guard since bluff King Henry's time, and expected to hear something from you about the Field of the Cloth of Gold.—and I thought of asking you the colour of Anne Bullen's breastknot, which cost the Pope three kingdoms; but I am afraid you are but a novice in such recollections of love and chivalry. Art sure thou didst not creep into thy warlike office from some dark shop in the Tower-Hamlets, and that thou hast not converted an unlawful measuring-yard into that glorious halberd?—I warrant, thou canst not even tell one whom this piece of antique panoply pertained to?"

The Duke pointed at random to a cuirass which hung amongst others, but was rather remarkable from being better cleaned.

"I should know that piece of iron," said the warder bluntly, yet with some change in his voice; "for I have known a man withinside of it who would not have endured half the impertinence I have heard spoken to-day."

The tone of the old man, as well as the words, attracted the attention of Charles and the Duke of Ormond, who were only two steps before the speaker. They both stopped, and turned round; the former saying at the same time,—"How now, sirrah!—what answers are these?—What man do you speak of?"

"Of one who is none now," said the warder, "whatever he may have been."

"The old man surely speaks of himself," said the Duke of Ormond, closely examining the countenance of the warder, which he in vain endeavoured to turn away. "I am sure I remember these features—Are not you my old friend, Major Coleby?"

"I wish your Grace's memory had been less accurate," said the old man, colouring deeply, and fixing his eyes on the ground.

The King was greatly shocked.—"Good God," he said, "the gallant Major Coleby, who joined us with his four sons and a hundred and fifty men at Warrington!—And is this all we could do for an old Worcester friend?"

The tears rushed thick into the old man's eyes as he said, in broken accents, "Never mind me, sire; I am well enough here—a worn-out soldier rusting among old armour. Where one old cavalier is better, there are twenty worse.—I am sorry your Majesty should know any thing of it, since it grieves you."

With that kindness, which was a redeeming point of his character, Charles, while the old man was speaking, took the partisan from him with his own hand, and put it into that of Buckingham, saying, "What Coleby's hand has borne, can disgrace neither yours nor mine,—and you owe him this atonement. Time has been with him, that, for less provocation, he would have laid it about your ears."

The Duke bowed deeply, but coloured with resentment, and took an immediate opportunity to place the weapon carelessly against a pile of arms. The King did not observe a contemptuous motion, which, perhaps, would not have pleased him, being at the moment occupied with the veteran, whom he exhorted to lean upon him, as he conveyed him to a seat, permitting no other person to assist him. "Rest there," he said, "my brave old friend; and Charles Stewart must be poor indeed if you wear that dress an hour longer.—You look very pale, my good Coleby, to have had so much colour a few minutes since. Be not vexed at what Buckingham says, no one minds his folly.—You look worse and worse. Come, come, you are too much hurried by this meeting. Sit still—do not rise—do not attempt to kneel. I command you to repose yourself till I have made the round of these apartments."

The old cavalier stooped his head in token of acquiescence in the command of his Sovereign, but he raised it not again. The tumultuous agitation of the moment had been too much for spirits which had been long in a state of depression, and health which was much decayed. When the King and his attendants, after half an hour's absence, returned to the spot where they had left the veteran, they found him dead, and already cold, in the attitude of one who has fallen easily asleep. The King was dreadfully shocked; and it was with a low and faltering voice that he directed the body, in due time, to be honourably buried in the Chapel of the Tower.* He was then silent, until he attained the steps in front of the arsenal, where the party in attendance upon his person began to assemble at his approach, along with some other persons of respectable appearance, whom curiosity had attracted.

"This is dreadful," said the King. "We must find some means of relieving the distresses, and rewarding the fidelity of our suffering followers, or posterity will cry fie upon our memory."

"Your Majesty has had often such plans agitated in your Council," said Buckingham.

"True, George," said the King. "I can safely say it is not my fault. I have thought of it for years."

"It cannot be too well considered," said Buckingham; "besides, every year makes the task of relief easier."

"True," said the Duke of Ormond, "by diminishing the number of sufferers. Here is poor old Coleby will no longer be a burden to the Crown."

"You are too severe, my Lord of Ormond," said the King, "and should respect the feelings you trespass on. You cannot suppose that we would have permitted this poor man to hold such a situation, had we known of the circumstance?"

"For God's sake, then, sire," said the Duke of Ormond, "turn your eyes, which have just rested on the corpse of one old friend, upon the distresses of others."

* A story of this nature is current in the legends of the Tower. The affecting circumstances are, I believe, recorded in one of the little manuals which are put into the hands of visitors, but are not to be found in the later editions.

Here is the valiant old Sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak, who fought through the whole war, wherever blows were going, and was the last man, I believe, in England, who laid down his arms—Here is his son, of whom I have the highest accounts, as a gallant of spirit, accomplishments, and courage—Here is the unfortunate House of Derby—for pity's sake, interfere in behalf of these victims, whom the folds of this hydra-plot have entangled, in order to crush them to death—rebuke the fiends that are seeking to devour their lives, and disappoint the harpies that are gaping for their property. This very day seven-night the unfortunate family, father and son, are to be brought upon trial for crimes of which they are as guiltless, I boldly pronounce, as any who stand in this presence. For God's sake, sire, let us hope that, should the prejudices of the people condemn them, as it has done others, you will at last step between the blood-hunters and their prey."

The King looked, as he really was, exceedingly perplexed.

Buckingham, between whom and Ormond there existed a constant and almost mortal quarrel, interfered to effect a diversion in Charles's favour. "Your Majesty's royal benevolence," he said, "needs never want exercise, while the Duke of Ormond is near your person. He has his sleeve cut in the old and ample fashion, that he may always have store of ruined cavaliers stowed in it to produce at demand, rare old raw-boned boys, with Malmsey noses, bald heads, spindle shanks, and merciless histories of Edgehill and Naseby."

"My sleeve is, I dare say, of an antique cut," said Ormond, looking full at the Duke; "but I pin neither bravoës nor ruffians upon it, my Lord of Buckingham, as I see fastened to coats of the new mode."

"That is a little too sharp for our presence, my lord," said the King.

"Not if I make my words good," said Ormond.—"My Lord of Buckingham, will you name the man you spoke to as you left the boat?"

"I spoke to no one," said the Duke, hastily—"nay, I mistake, I remember a fellow whispered in my ear, that one, who I thought had left London, was still lingering in town. A person whom I had business with."

"Was yon the messenger?" said Ormond, singling out from the crowd who stood in the court-yard, a tall dark-looking man, muffled in a large cloak, wearing a broad shadowy black beaver hat, with a long sword of the Spanish fashion—the very Colonel, in short, whom Buckingham had despatched in quest of Christian, with the intention of detaining him in the country.

When Buckingham's eyes had followed the direction of Ormond's finger, he could not help blushing so deeply, as to attract the King's attention.*

"What new frolic is this, George?" he said. "Gentlemen, bring that fellow forward. On my life a truculent-looking caitiff.—Hark ye, friend, who are you? If an honest man, Nature has forgot to lay upon your countenance.—Does none here know

'With every symptom of a knave complete, If he be honest he's a devilish cheat.'"

"He is well known to many, sire," replied Ormond; "and that he walks in this area with his safe, and his limbs unshackled, is an instance, among many, that we live under the sway of the most indulgent Prince of Europe."

"Oddsfish! who is the man, my Lord Duke?" said the King. "Your Grace talks mysteriously—Buckingham blushes—and the rogue himself is dumb."

"That honest gentleman, please your Majesty," replied the Duke of Ormond, "whose modesty makes him mute, though it cannot make him blush, notorious Colonel Blood, as he calls himself, attempt to possess himself of your Majesty's crown, took place at no very distant date, in the Tower of London."

"That exploit is not easily forgotten," said the King; "but that the fellow lives, shows your Grace's clemency as well as mine."

"I cannot deny that I was in his hands, sire," said Ormond, "and had certainly been murdered by him had he chosen to take my life on the spot, instead of sparing me—I thank him for the honour—hanged at Tyburn. I had certainly been spared had he thought me worth knife or pistol, or any other short of the cord.—Look at him, sire! If he dared, he would say at this moment, like Caliban the play, 'Ho, ho, I would I had done it!'"

"Why, oddsfish!" answered the King, "he looks a villainous sneer, my lord, which seems to me much; but, my Lord Duke, we have pardoned him, and so has your Grace."

"It would ill have become me," said the Duke of Ormond, "to have been severe in prosecuting a man who had tempted on my poor life, when your Majesty was pleased to remit his more outrageous and insolent attacks upon your royal crown. But I must conceive a piece of supreme insolence on the part of this thirsty bully, by whomsoever he may be now brought to appear in the Tower, which was the theatre of his villainies, or before me, who was well nigh a victim of another."

"It shall be amended in future," said the King. "Hark ye, sirrah Blood, if you again presume to thrust yourself in the way you have done but once, you will have the hangmen's knife and your knavish head made acquainted."

Blood bowed, and, with a coolness of impudence which did his nerves great honour, he said he only came to the Tower accidentally, to communicate with a particular friend on business of importance. "My Lord Duke of Buckingham," he said, "knew I had no other intentions."

"Get you gone, you scoundrelly cut-throat!" said the Duke, as much impatient of Colonel Blood's claim of acquaintance as a town-rake of the low blackguard companions of his midnight ramblings. "When they accost him in daylight amidst better company; 'if you dare to quote my name again, I will have you thrown into the Thames.'"

Blood, thus repulsed, turned round with the insolent composure, and walked away down the parade, all men looking at him, as at a strange and monstrous prodigy, so much was he renowned for daring and desperate villainy. He even followed him, to have a better survey of the notorious Colonel Blood, like the smaller tribe of which keep fluttering round an owl when he appears in the light of the sun. But as, in the latter of these thoughtless flutterers are careful to keep out of reach of the beak and claws of the bird of Minerva, so none of those who followed and gazed on Blood as something ominous, cared to bandy looks with him, or to endure and return the lowering and threatening glances which he shot from time to time on those who pressed nearest to him. He stalked on in a manner, like a daunted, yet sullen wolf, afraid to yet unwilling to fly, until he reached the Tower gate, and getting on board a sculler which waited for him, he disappeared from their eyes.

* The conspirator Blood even sought or made his way into good society, and sat at good men's feasts. Evelyn's Diary bears, 10th May, 1671.—"Dined at Mr. Treasurer's, where dined Monsieur de Grammont and several French noblemen, and one Blood, that impudent, bold fellow, that had not long ago attempted to steal the Imperial crown itself out of the Tower, pretending curiosity of seeing the Regalia, when, stabbing the keeper, though not mortally, he boldly went away with it through all the guards, taken only by the accident of his horse falling down. How he came to be pardoned, and even received into favour, not only after this, but several other exploits almost as daring, both in Ireland and here, I could never come to understand. Some believed he became a spy of several parties, being well with the sectaries and enthusiasts, and did his Majesty service that way, which none alive could do so well as he. But it was certainly, as the boldest attempt, so the only treason of the sort that was ever pardoned. The man had not only a daring, but a villainous unmerciful look, a false countenance, but very well spoken and dangerously insinuating."—EVELYN'S Memoirs, vol. i. p. 413.

This is one of the many occasions on which we might make curious remarks on the disregard of our forefathers for appearances, even in the regulation of society. What should we think of a Lord of the Treasury, who, to make up a party of French nobles and English gentlemen of condition, should invite as a guest Barrington or Major Semple, or any well-known châtelain d'industrie? Yet Evelyn does not seem to have been shocked at the man being brought into society, but only at his remaining unaltered.

Charles would fain have obliterated all recollection of his appearance, by the observation, "It were shame that such a reprobate scoundrel should be the subject of discord between two noblemen of distinction;" and he recommended to the Dukes of Buckingham and Ormond to join hands, and forget a misunderstanding which rose on so unworthy a subject.

Buckingham answered carelessly, "That the Duke of Ormond's honoured white hairs were a sufficient apology for his making the first overtures to a reconciliation," and he held out his hand accordingly. But Ormond only bowed in return, and said, "The King had no cause to expect that the Court would be disturbed by his personal resentments, since time would not yield him back twenty years, nor the grave restore his gallant son Ossory. As to the ruffian who had intruded himself there, he was obliged to him, since, in showing that his Majesty's clemency extended even to the very worst of criminals, he strengthened his hopes of obtaining the King's favour for such of his innocent friends as were now in prison, and in danger, from the odious charges brought against them on the score of the Popish Plot."

The King made no other answer to this insinuation than by directing that the company should embark on their return to Whitehall; and thus took leave of the officers of the Tower who were in attendance, with one of those well-turned compliments to their discharge of duty, which no man knew better how to press; and issued at the same time strict and anxious orders for protection and defence of the important fortress confided to them, and all which it contained.

Before he parted with Ormond on their arrival at Whitehall, he turned round to him, as one who has made up his resolution, and said, "Be satisfied, my old Duke—our friends' case shall be looked to."

In the same evening the Attorney-General, and Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, had orders, with all secrecy, to meet his Majesty that evening on especial matters of state, at the apartments of Chiffinch, the centre of all affairs, whether of gallantry or business.

CHAPTER XII.

Yet, Corah, thou shalt from oblivion pass, Erect thyself, thou monumental brass,
High as the serpent of thy metal made,
While nations stand secure beneath thy shade
Abraham and Achitophel.

THE morning which Charles had spent in visiting the Tower, had been very differently employed by these unhappy individuals, whom their bad fate, and the singular temper of the times, had made the innocent tenants of that state prison, and who had received official notice that they were to stand their trial in the Court of King's Bench at Westminster, on the seventh succeeding day. The stout old Cavalier at first only railed at the officer for spoiling his breakfast with the news, but evinced great feeling when he was told that Julian was to be put under the same indictment.

We intend to dwell only very generally on the nature of their trial, which corresponded, in the outcome, with almost all those that took place during the prevalence of the Popish Plot. That is, one or two famous and perjured evidences, whose profession of innocence and oath to the prisoner's having expressed themselves interested in the great confederacy of the Catholics. A number of others brought forward facts and suspicions, affecting the character of the parties as honest Protestants and good subjects; and betwixt the direct and presumptive evidence, enough was usually extracted for justifying, to a corrupted court and a perjured jury, the fatal verdict of Guilty.

The fury of the people had, however, now begun to subside away, exhausted even by its own violence. The English nation differ from all others, indeed even from those of the sister kingdoms, in being very easily led with punishment, even when they suppose it not merited. Other nations are like the tamed tiger, which, when once its native appetite for slaughter is indulged in one instance, rushes on in promiscuous ravages. But the English public have always rather resembled what is told of the sleuth-dog, which, eager, fierce, and clamorous in pursuit of his prey, desists from it so soon as blood is sprinkled upon his path.

Men's minds were now beginning to cool—the character of the witnesses was more closely sifted—their testimonies did not in all cases tally—and a wholesome suspicion began to be entertained of men, who would never say they had made a full discovery of all they knew, but avowedly reserved some point of evidence to bear on future trials.

The King also, who had lain passive during the first burst of popular fury, was now beginning to bestir himself, which produced a marked effect on the conduct of the Crown Counsel, and even the Judges. Sir George Wakem in had been acquitted in spite of Oates's direct testimony; and public attention was strongly excited concerning the event of the next trial; which chanced to be that of the Peverils, father and son, with whom, I know not from what concatenation, little Hudson the dwarf was placed at the bar of the Court of King's Bench.

It was a piteous sight to behold a father and son, who had been so long separated, meet under circumstances so melancholy; and many tears were shed, when the majestic old man—for such he was, though now broken with years—folded his son to his bosom, with a mixture of joy, affection, and a bitter anticipation of the event of the impending trial. There was a feeling in the Court that for a moment overcame every prejudice and party feeling. Many spectators shed tears; and there was even a low moaning, as of those who weep aloud.

Such as felt themselves sufficiently at ease to remark the conduct of poor little Geoffrey Hudson, who was scarcely observed amid the preponderating interest created by his companions in misfortune, could not but notice a strong degree of mortification on the part of that diminutive gentleman. He had soothed his great mind by the thoughts of playing the character which he was called on to sustain, in a manner which should be long remembered in that place; and on his entrance, had saluted the numerous spectators, as well as the Court, with a cavalier air, which he meant should express grace, high-breeding, perfect coolness, with a noble disregard to the issue of their proceedings. But his little person was so obscured and jostled aside, on the meeting of the father and son, who had been brought in different boats from the Tower, and placed at the bar at the same moment, that his distress and his dignity were alike thrown into the background, and attracted neither sympathy nor admiration.

The dwarf's wisest way to attract attention, would have been to remain quiet, when so remarkable an exterior would certainly have received in its turn the share of public notice which he so eagerly coveted. But when did personal vanity listen to the suggestions of prudence?—Our impatient friend scrambled, with some difficulty, on the top of the bench intended for his seat; and there, "painting himself to stand a-tiptoe," like Chaucer's gallant Sir Chaunteclere, he challenged the notice of the audience as he stood bowing and claiming acquaintance of his namesake Sir Geoffrey the larger, with whose shoulders, notwithstanding his elevated situation, he was scarcely yet upon a level.

The taller Knight, whose mind was occupied in a very different manner, took no notice of these advances upon the dwarf's part, but sat down with the determination rather to die on the spot than evince any symptoms of weakness before Roundheads and Presbyterians; under which obnoxious epithets, being too old-fashioned to find out party designations of a newer date, he comprehended all persons concerned in his present trouble.

By Sir Geoffrey the larger's change of position, his face was thus brought on a level with that of Sir Geoffrey the less, who had an opportunity of pulling him by the cloak. He of Martindale Castle, rather mechanically than consciously, turned his head towards the large wrinkled visage, which, struggling between an assumed air of easy importance, and an anxious desire to be noticed, was grimacing within a yard of him. But neither the singular physiognomy, the nods and smiles of greeting and recognition into which it was wreathed, nor the strange little form by which it was supported, had at that moment the power of exciting any recollections in the old Knight's mind; and having stared for a moment at the poor little man, his bulky namesake turned away his head without farther notice.

Julian Peveril, the dwarf's more recent acquaintance, had, even amid his own anxious feelings, room for sympathy with those of his little fellow-sufferer. As soon as he discovered that he was at the same terrible bar with himself, although he could not conceive how their causes came to be conjoined, he acknowledged him by a hearty shake of the hand, which the old man returned with affected dignity and real gratitude. "Worthy youth," he said, "thy presence is restorative, like the nepenthe of Homer, even in this syncope of our mutual fate. I am concerned to see that your father hath not the same alacrity of soul as that of ours, which are lodged within smaller compass; and that he hath forgotten an ancient comrade and fellow-soldier, who now stands beside him to perform, perhaps, their last campaign."

Julian briefly replied, that his father had much to occupy him. But the little man—who, to do him justice, cared no more (in his own phrase) for imminent danger or death, than he did for the puncture of a flea's proboscis—did not so easily renounce the secret object of his ambition, which was to acquire the notice of the large and lofty Sir Geoffrey Peveril, who, being at least three inches taller than his son, was in so far possessed of that superior excellence, which the poor dwarf, in his secret soul, valued before all other distinctions, although, in his conversation, he was constantly depreciating it. "Good comrade and namesake," he proceeded, stretching out his hand, so as again to reach the elder Peveril's cloak, "I forgive your want of reminiscence, seeing it is long since I saw you at Naseby, fighting as if you had as many arms as the fabled Briareus."

The Knight of Martindale, who had again turned his head towards the little man, and had listened, as if endeavouring to make something out of his discourse, here interrupted him with a peevish "Pshaw!"

"Pshaw!" repeated Sir Geoffrey the less; "Pshaw is an expression of slight esteem,—nay, of contempt,—in all languages; and were this a befitting place"—

But the Judges had now taken their places, the criers called silence, and the stern voice of the Lord Chief-Justice (the notorious Scroggs) demanded what the officers meant by permitting the accused to communicate together in open court.

It may here be observed, that this celebrated personage was, upon the present occasion, at a great loss how to proceed. A calm, dignified, judicial demeanour, was at no time the characteristic of his official conduct. He always ranted and roared either on the one side or the other; and of late, he had been much unsettled which side to take, being totally incapable of any thing resembling impartiality. At the first trials for the Plot, when the whole stream of popularity ran against the accused, no one had been so loud as Scroggs;—to attempt to impeach the character of Oates or Bedlowe, or any other leading witness, he treated as a crime more heinous than it would have been to blaspheme the Gospel on which they had been sworn—it was a stifling of the Plot, or discrediting of the King's witnesses—a crime not greatly, if at all, short of high treason against the King himself.

But, of late, a new light had begun to glimmer upon the understanding of this interpreter of the laws. Sagacious in the signs of the times, he began to see that the tide was turning; and that Court favour at least, and probably popular opinion also, were likely, in a short time, to declare against the witnesses, and in favour of the accused.

The opinion which Scroggs had hitherto entertained of the high respect in which Shaftesbury, the patron of the Plot, was held by Charles, had been definitively shaken by a whisper from his brother North to the following effect: "His Lordship has no more interest at Court than your footman."

This notice, from a sure hand, and received but that morning, had put the Judge to a sore dilemma; for, however indifferent to actual consistency, he was most anxious to save appearances. He could not but recollect how violent he had been on former occasions in favour of these prosecutions; and being sensible at the same time that the credit of the witnesses, though shaken in the opinion of the more judicious, was, amongst the bulk of the people out of doors, as strong as ever, he had a difficult part to play. His conduct, therefore, during the whole trial, resembled the appearance of a vessel about to go upon another tack, when her sails are shivering in the wind, ere they have yet caught the impulse which is to send her forth in a new direction. In a word, he was so uncertain which side it was his interest to favour, that he might be said on that occasion to have come nearer a state of total impartiality than he was ever capable of attaining, whether before or afterwards. This was shown by his bullying now the accused, and now the witnesses, like a mastiff too much irritated to lie still without baying, but uncertain whom he shall first bite.

The indictment was then read; and Sir Geoffrey Peveril heard, with some composure, the first part of it, which stated him to have placed his son in the household of the Countess of Derby, a recusant Papist, for the purpose of aiding the horrible and blood-thirsty Popish Plot—with having had arms and ammunition concealed in his house—and with receiving a blank commission from the Lord Stafford, who had suffered death on account of the Plot. But when the charge went on to state that he had communicated for the same purpose with Geoffrey Hudson, sometimes called Sir Geoffrey Hudson, now, or formerly, in the domestic service of the Queen Dowager, he looked at his companion as if he suddenly recalled him to remembrance, and broke out impatiently, "These lies are too gross to require a moment's consideration. I might have had enough of intercourse, though in nothing but what was loyal and innocent, with my noble kinsman, the late Lord Stafford—I will call him so in spite of his misfortunes—and with my wife's relation, the Honourable Countess of Derby. But what likelihood can there be that I should have colluded with a decrepit buffoon, with whom I never had an instant's communication, save once at an Easter feast, when I whistled a hornpipe, as he danced on a trencher to amuse the company?"

The rage of the poor dwarf brought tears in his eyes, while, with an affected laugh, he said, that instead of those juvenile and festive passages, Sir Geoffrey Peveril might have remembered his charging along with him at Wiggan-Lane.

"On my word," said Sir Geoffrey, after a moment's recollection, "I will do you justice, Master Hudson—I believe you were there—I think I heard you did good service. But you will allow you might have been near one, without his seeing you."

A sort of titter ran through the Court at the simplicity of the larger Sir Geoffrey's testimony, which the dwarf endeavoured to control, by standing on his up-toes, and looking fiercely around, as if to admonish the laughers that they indulged their mirth at their own peril. But perceiving that this only excited further scorn, he composed himself into a semblance of careless contempt, observing, with a smile, that no one feared the glance of a chained lion; a magnificent simile, which rather increased than diminished the mirth of those who heard it.

Against Julian Peveril there failed not to be charged the aggravated fact, that he had been bearer of letters between the Countess of Derby and other Papists and priests, engaged in the universal, treasonable conspiracy of the Catholics; and the attack of the house at Moultrassie-Hall,—with his skirmish with Chiffinch, and his assault, as it was termed, on the person of John Jenkins, servant of the Duke of Buckingham, were all narrated at length, as so many open and overt acts of treasonable import. To this charge Peveril contented himself with pleading—Not Guilty.

His little companion was not satisfied with so simple a plea; for when he heard it read, as a part of the charge applying to him, that he had received from an gent of the Plot a blank commission as Colonel of a regiment of grenadiers, he replied, in wrath and scorn, at if Goliath of Gath had come to him with such a proposal, and proffered him the command of the whole host of Anak in a body, he should never have had occasion or opportunity to repeat the temptation to another. "I would have slain him," said the little man of loyalty, "even where he stood."

The charge was stated anew by the Counsel for the Crown; and forth came the notorious Doctor Oates, striding in the full silken canonicals of priesthood, for was at a time when he affected no small dignity of exterior decoration and deportment.

This singular man, who, aided by the obscure intrigues of the Catholics themselves, and the fortuitous circumstance of Godfrey's murder, had been able to lay down the public throat such a mass of absurdity, his evidence amounts to, had no other talent for imposture than an impudence which set conviction and shame alike at defiance. A man of sense or rectitude, by trying to give his plot an appearance of more probability, would most likely have failed, as wise men often do in addressing the multitude, from not daring to calculate upon the prodigious extent of their credulity, especially where the figments presented them involve the fearful and the terrible.

Oates was by nature choleric; and the credit he had acquired made him insolent and conceited. Even his exterior was portentous. A fleece of white perwig showed a most uncouth visage, of great length, having the mouth, as the organ by use of which he was to rise to eminence, placed in the very centre of the countenance, and exhibiting to the astonished spectator as much chin below as there was nose and brow above the aperture. His pronunciation, too, was after a conceited fashion of his own, in which he accented the vowels in a manner altogether peculiar to himself. This notorious personage, such as we have described him, stood forth on the present trial, and delivered his astonishing testimony concerning the existence of a Catholic Plot for the subversion of the government and murder of the King, in the same general outline which it may be found in every English history, but as the Doctor always had in reserve some special piece of evidence affecting those immediately on trial, he was pleased, on the present occasion, deeply to implicate the Countess of Derby. "He had seen," as he said, "that honourable lady when he was at the Jesuits' College at Saint Omer's. She had sent for him to an inn, or auberge, as it was there termed—the sign of the Golden Lamb; and had ordered him breakfast in the same room with her ladyship; and afterwards told him, that, knowing he was trusted by the Fathers of the Society, she was determined that he should have a share of her secrets also; and thereupon, that she drew from her bosom a broad sharp-pointed knife, such as butchers kill sheep with, and demanded of him what he thought of it for the purpose; and when he, the witness, said for what purpose, she rapt him on the fingers with her fan, called him a dull fellow, and said it was designed to kill the king with."

Here Sir Geoffrey Peveril could no longer refrain his indignation and surprise. "Mercy of Heaven!" he cried. "did ever any one hear of ladies of quality carrying butchering knives about them, and telling every surly companion she meant to kill the King with them?—Gentlemen of the Jury, do but think if this is reasonable—though, if the villain could prove by any direct evidence, that my Lady of Derby ever let such scum as himself come to speech of her, I would believe all he can say."

"Sir Geoffrey," said the Judge. "rest you quiet—you must not fly out—passion helps you not here—the doctor must be suffered to proceed."

Doctor Oates went on to state, how the lady complained of the wrongs the House of Derby had sustained from the King, and the oppression of her religion, and boasted of the schemes of the Jesuits and seminary priests; and how they would be furthered by her noble kinsman of the House of Stanley. He finally averred that both the Countess and the others of the seminary abroad, founded much upon the talents and courage of Sir Geoffrey Peveril and his son—the latter of whom was a member of her family. Of Hudson he only recollected of having heard one of the Fathers say, "that though but a dwarf in stature, he would prove a giant in the cause of the Church."

When he had ended his evidence, there was a pause, until the Judge, as if the thought had suddenly occurred to him, demanded of Dr. Oates, whether he had ever mentioned the name of the Countess of Derby in any of the previous informations which he had lodged before the Privy Council, and elsewhere, upon this affair?

Oates seemed rather surprised at the question, and coloured with anger, as he answered, in his peculiar mode of pronunciation, "Whoy, no, maay laard."

"And, pray, Doctor," said the Judge, "how came so great a revealer of mysteries as you have lately proved, to have suffered so material a circumstance as the accession of this powerful family to the Plot to have remained undiscovered?"

"Maay laard," said Oates, with much effrontery, "aye do not come here to have my evidence questioned as touching the Plaat."

"I do not question your evidence, Doctor," said Scroggs, for the time was not arrived that he dared treat him roughly; "nor do I doubt the existence of the Plaat, since it is your pleasure to swear to it. I would only have you, for your own sake, and the satisfaction of all good Protestants, to explain why you have kept back such a weighty point of information from the King and country."

"Maay laard," said Oates, "I will tell you a pretty fable."

"I hope," answered the Judge, "it may be the first and last which you shall tell in this place."

"Maay laard," continued Oates, "there was once a faux, who having to carry a goose over a frozen river, and being afraid the ice would not bear him and his booty, did carry over a staane, maay laard, in the first instance, to prove the strength of the aice."

"So your former evidence was but the stone, and now, for the first time, you have brought us the goose?" said Sir William Scroggs; "to tell us this, Doctor, is to make geese of the Court and Jury."

"I desire your laardship's honest construction," said Oates, who saw the current changing against him, but was determined to pay the score with effrontery. "All men know at what coast and praise I have given my evidence, which has been always, under Gaad, the means of awakening this poor nation to the dangerous state in which it stands. Many here know that I have been obliged to faurtify my lodging at Whitehall against the bloody Papists. It was not to be thought that I should have brought all the story out at nance. I think your wisdom would have advised me otherwise."

"Nay, Doctor," said the Judge, "it is not for me to direct you in this affair; and it is for the Jury to believe you or not; and as for myself, I sit here to do justice to both—the Jury have heard your answer to my question."

Doctor Oates retired from the witness-box reddening like a turkey-cock, as one totally unused to have such accounts questioned as he chose to lay before the courts of justice; and there was, perhaps for the first time, amongst the counsel and solicitors, as well as the templars and students of law there present, a murmur, distinct and audible, unfavourable to the character of the great father of the Popish Plot.

Everett and Dangerfield, with whom the reader is already acquainted, were then called in succession to sustain the accusation. They were subordinate informers—a sort of under-spur-leathers, as the cant term went—who followed the path of Oates, with all deference to his superior genius and invention, and made their own fictitious clume in and harmonize with his, as well as their talents could devise. But as their evidence had at no time received the full credence into which the impudence of Oton had caused the public, as they now began to fall into discredit rather more readily than their prototype, as the superadded terrors of an ill-constructed building are naturally the first to give way.

* It was on such terms that Dr. Oates was pleased to claim the extraordinary privilege of dealing out the information which he chose to communicate to a court of justice. The only sense in which his story of the fox, stone, and goose, could be applicable, is by supposing, that he was determined to ascertain the extent of his countrymen's credulity before supplying it with a full meal.

It was in vain that Everett, with the precision of a hypocrite, and Dangerfield, with the audacity of a bully, narrated with added circumstances of suspicion and criminality, their meeting with Julian Peveril in Liverpool, and again at Marstondale Castle. It was in vain they described the arms and accoutrements which they pretended to have discovered in old Sir Geoffrey's possession; and that they gave a most dreadful account of the escape of the younger Peveril from Montrose-Hall, by means of an armed force.

The Jury listened coldly, and it was visible that they were but little moved by the accusation; especially as the Judge, always professing his belief in the Plot, and his zeal for the Protestant religion, was over and over reminding them that presumptions were no proofs—that hearsay was no evidence—that those who made a trade of discovery were likely to add their researches by invention—and that without doubting the guilt of the unfortunate persons at the bar, he would gladly hear some evidence brought against them of a different nature. "Here we are told of a riot, and an escape achieved by the younger Peveril, at the house of a grave and worthy magistrate, known, I think, to most of us. Why, Master Attorney, bring ye not Master Bridgenorth himself to prove the fact, or all his household, if it be necessary?—A rising in arms is an affair over public to be left on the hearsay tale of these two men—though Heaven forbid that I should suppose they speak one word more than they believe. They are the witnesses for the King—and what is equally dear to us, the Protestant religion—and witnesses against a most foul and heinous Plot. On the other hand, here is a warshipful old knight, for such I must suppose him to be since he has been often in battle for the King, such, I must say, I suppose him to be, until he is proved otherwise. And here is his son, a hopeful young gentleman—we must see that they have right, Master Attorney."

"Unquestionably, my lord," answered the Attorney. "And forbear else! But we will make out these matters against these unhappy gentlemen in a manner more able, if your lordship will permit us to bring in our evidence."

"Go on, Master Attorney," said the Judge, throwing himself back in his seat. "Heaven forbid I hinder proving the King's accusation! I only say, what you know as well as I, that de non apparentibus et non existantibus eadem est ratio."

"We shall then call Master Bridgenorth, as your lordship advises, who I think is in waiting."

"No!" answered a voice from the crowd, apparently that of a female, "he is too wise and too humane to be here."

The voice was distinct as that of Lady Fairfax, when she expressed herself to a similar effect on the trial of Charles the First; but the remarks which were made on the present occasion to discover the speaker were unsuccessful.

After the slight confusion occasioned by this circumstance was abated, the Attorney, who had been talking aside with the conductors of the prosecution, said, "Whoever favoured us with that information, my lord, had good reason for what they said. Master Bridgenorth has become, I am told, suddenly invisible since this morning."

"Look ye there now, Master Attorney," said the Judge. "This comes of not keeping the sworn witnesses together and in readiness—I am sure I cannot help the consequences."

"Nor I either, my lord," said the Attorney presently. "I could have proved by this worshipful gentleman, Master Justice Bridgenorth, the ancient friendship between this party, Sir Geoffrey Peveril, and the Countess of Derby, of whose designs and intentions Doctor Oton has given such a deliberate evidence. I could have proved his having abetted her in his Castle against a process of law, and rescued her, by force of arms, from this very Justice Bridgenorth, not without actual violence. Moreover, I could have proved against young Peveril the whole story charged upon him by the same worshipful evidence."

Here the Judge stuck his thumbs into his girdle, which was a favourite attitude of his on such occasions, and exclaimed, "Pshaw, pshaw, Master Attorney!—Tell me not that you could have proved this, and you could have proved that, or that, or this. Prove what you will, but let it be through the mouths of your evidence. Men are not to be led out of their lives by the rough side of a lawyer's tongue."

"Nor is a foul Plot to be smothered," said the Attorney, "for all the haste your lordship is in. I cannot call Master Chiffinch neither, as he is employed on the King's special affairs, as I am the instant cartiered from the Court at Whitehall."

"Produce the papers, then, Master Attorney, of which this young man is said to be the bearer," said the Judge.

"They are before the Privy Council, my Lord."

"Then why do you found on them here?" said the Judge. "This is something like trifling with the Court."

"Since your Lordship gives it that name," said the Attorney, sitting down in a huff, "you may manage the cause as you will."

"If you do not bring more evidence, I pray you to charge the Jury," said the Judge.

"I shall not take the trouble to do so," said the Crown Counsel. "I see plainly how the matter is to go."

"Nay, but be better advised," said Serogga. "Consider, your case is but half proved respecting the son Peveril, and doth not pinch on the little man at all, saving that Doctor Oton said that he was in a certain case to prove a giant, which seems no very probable Popish miracle."

This sally occasioned a laugh in the Court, which the Attorney-General seemed to take as good badgeron.

"Master Attorney," said Oton, who always interfered in the management of these lawsuits, "this is a plain and absolute giving away of the cause—I must needs say it, a mere stuffing of the Plot."

"Then the Devil who bend it may blow wind into again, if he lists," answered the Attorney-General, and flinging down his brief, he left the Court, as in a huff with all who were concerned in the affair.

The Judge having obtained silence—for a moment arose in the Court when the Counsel for the prosecution threw up his brief—began to charge the Jury, balancing, as he had done throughout the whole day, the different opinions by which he seemed alternately swayed. He protested on his salvation that he had no more doubt of the existence of the horrid and detestable conspiracy called the Popish Plot, than he had of the treachery of Judas Iscariot, and that he considered Oton as the instrument under Providence of preserving the nation from all the miseries of his Majesty's assassination, and of a second Saint Bartholomew, acted in the streets of London. But then he said it was the candid construction of the law of England, that the worse the crime, the more strong should be the evidence. Here was the case of accessories tried, whilst their principal—for such he should call the Countess of Derby—was unconvicted and at large; and for Dr. Oton, he had but spoke of matters which personally applied to that noble lady, whose words, if she used such in passion, touching and which he expected in more reasonable matters from that Peveril, and from her kinsmen, or her son's kinsmen, of the House of Stanley, may have been but a burst of female resentment—calce Amorificis ira, as the poet hath it. Who knows but Doctor Oton did mistake—he being a gentleman of a rancid countenance and even demeanour—the same rap with the fan as a chastisement for lack of courage in the Catholic cause, when, peradventure, it was otherwise meant, as Popish ladies will put, it is said, such emphytes and youthful candidates for orders, to many entire trials. "I speak these things judicially," said edge, "having no wish to stain the reputation of the Honourable Countess or the Reverend r; only I think the bearing between them may related to something short of high treason.

What the Attorney-General hath set forth of s and force, and I wot not what, sure I am, in a civil country, when such things happen, things may be proved; and that you and I, gentlemen, are not to take them for granted gratuitously. "Regarding this other prisoner, this Galfridus minimus must needs say," he continued, "he could discover even a shadow of suspicion against Was it to be thought so abortive a creature thrust himself into depths of policy, far less stratagems of war? They had but to look at conclude the contrary—the creature was, from its size and appearance, for the inside of a raree-show, fitter for the grave than a conspiracy—and its size and appearance, for the inside of a raree-show than the mysteries of a plot."

The dwarf here broke in upon the Judge by force of naming, to assure him that he had been, simple as he sat there, engaged in seven plots in Cromwell's and, as he proudly added, with some of the men of England. The matchless look and air which Sir Geoffrey Hudson made this vaunt, set laughing, and increased the ridicule with which the trial began to be received; so that it was not shaking sides and watery eyes that a general verdict of Not Guilty was pronounced, and the prisoner dismissed from the bar.

A warmer sentiment awakened among those who saw the father and son throw themselves into their arms, and, after a hearty embrace, extend hands to their poor little companion in peril, who, when present at a similar scene, had succeeded, by stretching himself up to them and weeping at the same time, to secure to himself a share of their sympathy and gratulation.

This was the singular termination of this trial. The dwarf himself was desirous to have taken consideration with the Duke of Ormond for the evasion of the law, which had been thus effected by his private influence; and was both surprised and mortified at the coldness with which his Grace replied, that he rejoiced at the poor gentlemen's safety, but would not have had the King redeem them like a prince, by the royal prerogative of mercy, than that his Judge should convey them out of the power of the law, like a common felon with his cups and balls.

CHAPTER XLII.

—On fair ground
I could beat forty of them!—Coriolanus.

Without doubtless occurred to many that were present at the trial we have described, that it was managed in a singular manner, and that the quarrel, which had the appearance of having taken place between the Attorney-General and the Crown Counsel, might proceed from some private understanding betwixt them, the object of which was the miscarriage of the accusation. Though such underhand dealing was much suspected, the greater part of the audience, being well educated and intelligent, had already suspected the existence of the Popish Plot, and were glad to see that the accusations, founded on what had already cost so much blood, could be evaded in any way. But the people who waited in the Court of Requests, and in the streets, and without doors, viewed in a very different light the combination, as they interpreted it, between the Attorney-General and the Attorney-General, for the escape of the prisoners.

A man, whom less provocation than he had that day received often induced to behave like one frantic with passion, threw himself amongst the crowd, and cried till he was hoarse, "They are stoiling the law—they are strangling the Plaintiff!—My Laard and Maaster Attarny are in league to secure the escape of the plaaters and Paapists!"

"This is the device of the Papist whore of Port-" said one.

"Old Rowley himself," said another.

"He could be murdered by himself, why, hang him! what would hinder it!" exclaimed a third.

"He should be tried," said a fourth, "for conspiring his own death, and hanged in terrorem."

In the mean while, Sir Geoffrey, his son, and their little companion, left the hall, intending to go to Lady Peveril's lodgings, which had been removed to Fleet Street. She had been relieved from considerable inconvenience, as Sir Geoffrey gave Julian hastily to understand, by an angel, in the shape of a young friend, and she now expected them doubtless with impatience. Humanity, and some indistinct idea of having unintentionally hurt the feelings of the poor dwarf, induced the honest Cavalier to ask this unprotected being to go with them. "He knew Lady Peveril's lodgings were but small," he said; "but it would be strange, if there was not some cupboard large enough to accommodate the little gentleman."

The dwarf registered this well-meant remark in his mind, to be the subject of a proper explanation, along with the unhappy reminiscence of the trencher-hornpipe, whenever time should permit an argument of such nicety.

And thus they sallied from the hall, attracting general observation, both from the circumstances in which they had stood so lately, and from their resemblance, as a wag of the Inner Temple expressed it, to the three degrees of comparison, Large, Lesser, Least. But they had not passed far along the street, when Julian perceived, that more malevolent passions than mere curiosity began to actuate the crowd, which followed, and, as it were, dogged their motions.

"There go the Papist cut-throats, tantivy for Rome!" said one fellow.

"Tantivy to Whitehall, you mean!" said another.

"Ah! the blood-thirsty villains!" cried a woman; "Shame one of them should be suffered to live, after poor Sir Edmondsbury's cruel murder!"

"Out upon the mealy-mouthed jury, that turned out the bloodhounds on an innocent town!" cried a fourth.

In short, the tumult thickened, and the word began to pass among the more desperate, "Lambe them, lads; Lambe them!"—a cant phrase of the time, derived from the fate of Dr. Lambe, an astrologer and quack, who was knocked on the head by the rabble in Charles the First's time.

Julian began to be much alarmed at these symptoms of violence, and regretted that they had not gone down to the city by water. It was now too late to think of that mode of retreating, and he therefore requested his father in a whisper to walk steadily forward towards Charing Cross, taking no notice of the insults which might be cast upon them, while the steadiness of their pace and appearance might prevent the rabble from resorting to actual violence. The execution of this prudent resolution was prevented after they had passed the palace, by the hasty disposition of the elder Sir Geoffrey, and the no less choleric temper of Galfridus Minimus, who had a soul which spurned all odds, as well of numbers as of size.

"Now a murrain take the knaves, with their hollowing and whooping," said the larger knight; "by this day, if I could but light on a weapon, I would cudgel reason and loyalty into some of their carcasses!"

"And I also," said the dwarf, who was toiling to keep up with the longer strides of his companions, and therefore spoke in a very phthisical tone,—"I also will cudgel the plebeian knaves beyond measure—he!—hem!"

Among the crowd who thronged around them, impeded, and did all but assault them, was a mischievous shoemaker's apprentice, who, hearing this unlucky vaunt of the valorous dwarf, repaid it by flapping him on the head with a boot which he was carrying home to the owner, so as to knock the little gentleman's hat over his eyes. The dwarf, thus rendered unable to discover the urchin that had given him the offence, flew with instinctive ambition against the biggest fellow in the crowd, who received the onset with a kick on the stomach, which made the poor little champion reel back to his companions. They were now assaulted on all sides; but fortune, complying with the wish of Sir Geoffrey the larger, ordained that the scuffle should happen near the booth of a cutler, from amongst whose wares, as they stood exposed to the public, Sir Geoffrey Peveril snatched a broadsword, which he brandished with the formidable address of one who had for many a day been in the familiar practice of using such a weapon. Julian, while at the same time he called loudly for a peace-officer, and reminded the assailants that they were attacking inoffensive passengers, saw nothing better for it than to imitate his father's example, and seized also one of the weapons thus opportunely offered.

When they displayed these demonstrations of defence, the rush which the rabble at first made towards them was so great as to throw down the unfortunate dwarf, who would have been trampled to death in the scuffle, had not his stout old namesake cleared the rascal crowd from about him with a few flourishes of his weapon, and seizing on the fallen champion, put him out of danger, (except from missiles,) by suddenly placing him on the bulkhead, that is to say, the flat wooden roof of the cutler's projecting booth. From the rusty iron-ware which was displayed there, the dwarf instantly snatched an old rapier and target, and covering himself with the one, stood making passes with the other, at the faces and eyes of the people in the street; so much delighted with his post of vantage, that he called loudly to his friends who were skirmishing with the rioters on more equal terms as to position, to lose no time in putting themselves under his protection. But far from being in a situation to need his assistance, the father and son might easily have extricated themselves from the rabble by their own exertions, could they have thought of leaving the man-ikin in the forlorn situation, in which, to every eye but his own, he stood like a diminutive puppet, tricked out with sword and target as a fencing master's sign.

Stones and sticks began now to fly very thick, and the crowd, notwithstanding the exertions of the Peverils to disperse them with as little harin as possible, seemed determined on mischief, when some gentlemen who had been at the trial, understanding that the prisoners who had been just acquitted were in danger of being murdered by the populace, drew their swords, and made forward to effect their rescue, which was completed by a small party of the King's Life-Guards, who had been despatched from their ordinary post of alarm, upon intelligence of what was passing. When this unexpected reinforcement arrived, the old jolly knight at once recognised, amidst the cries of those who then entered upon action, some of the sounds which had animated his more active years.

"Where be these cuckoldy Roundheads?" cried some.—"Down with the sneaking knaves!" cried others.—"The King and his friends, and the devil a one else!" exclaimed a third set, with more oaths and d—n me's, than, in the present more correct age, it is necessary to commit to paper.

The old soldier, pricking up his ears like an ancient hunter at the cry of the hounds, would gladly have scoured the Strand, with the charitable purpose, now he saw himself so well supported, of knocking the London knaves, who had insulted him, into twigg'n bottles; but he was withheld by the prudence of Julian, who, though himself extremely irritated by the unprovoked ill usage which they had received, saw himself in a situation in which it was necessary to exercise more caution than vengeance. He prayed and pressed his father to seek some temporary place of retreat from the fury of the populace, while that prudent measure was yet in their power. The subaltern officer who commanded the party of the Life-Guards, exhorted the old Cavalier eagerly to the same sage counsel, using, as a spice of compulsion, the name of the King; while Julian strongly urged that of his mother. The old Knight looked at his blade, crimsoned with cross-cuts and slashes which he had given to the most forward of the assailants, with the eye of one not half satisfied.

"I would I had pinked one of the knaves at least—but I know not how it was, when I looked on their broad round English faces, I shunned to use my point, and only sliced the rogues a little."

"But the King's pleasure," said the officer, "is, that no tumult be prosecuted."

"My mother," said Julian, "will die with fright, if the rumour of this scuffle reaches her ere we see her."

"Ay, ay," said the Knight, "the King's Majesty, and my good dame—well, their pleasure be done, that's all I can say—Kings and ladies must be obeyed. But which way to retreat, since retreat we needs must?"

Julian would have been at some loss to advise what course to take, for every body in the vicinity had shut up their shops, and chained their doors, upon observing the confusion become so formidable. The poor cutler, however, with whose goods they made so free, offered them an asylum on the part of his landlord, whose house served as a rest for his shop, and only, intimated gently, he hoped the gentlemen would consider him for the use of his weapons.

Julian was hastily revolving whether they ought in prudence, to accept this man's invitation, aware, by experience, how many trepans, as they were termed, were used betwixt two contending factions, each too inveterate to be very scrupulous of the character of fair play to an enemy, when the dwarf, exerting his cracked voice to the uttermost, and shrieking like an exhausted herald, from the exalted station which he still occupied on the bulk-head, exhorted them to accept the offer of the worthy man of the mansion. "He himself," he said, as he reposed himself after the glorious conquest in which he had some share, "had been favoured with a benificent vision, too splendid to be described to common and mere mortal ears, but which had commanded him, in a voice to which his heart had bounded as to a trumpet sound, to take refuge with the worthy person of the house, and cause his friends to do so."

"Vision!" said the Knight of the Peak,—"sound of a trumpet!—the little man is stark mad."

But the cutler, in great haste, intimated to them that their little friend had received an intimation from a gentlewoman of his acquaintance, who spoke to him from the window, while he stood on the bulk-head, that they would find a safe retreat in his landlord's; and desiring them to attend to two or three deaf though distant huzzas, made them aware that the rabble were up still, and would soon be upon them, with renewed violence, and increased numbers.

The father and son, therefore, hastily thanked the officer and his party, as well as the other gentlemen who had volunteered in their assistance, lifted little Sir Geoffrey Hudson from the conspicuous post which he had so creditably occupied during the skirmish, and followed the footsteps of the tenant of the booth, who conducted them down a blind alley, and through one or two courts, in case, as he said, any one might have watched where they burrowed, and so into a back-door. This entrance admitted them to a staircase carefully hung with straw mats to exclude damp from the upper step of which they entered upon a tolerably large withdrawing-room, hung with coarse green serge edged with gilded leather, which the poorer or more economical citizens at that time used instead of tapestry or wainscoting.

Here the poor cutler received from Julian such a gratuity for the loan of the swords, that he generously abandoned the property to the gentlemen who had used them so well; "the rather," he said, "that he saw, by the way they handled their weapons, that they were men of mettle, and tall fellows."

Here the dwarf smiled on him courteously, and bowed, thrusting, at the same time, his hand into his pocket, which, however, he withdrew carelessly, probably because he found he had not the means of making the small donation which he had meditated.

The cutler proceeded to say, as he bowed and was about to withdraw, that he saw there would be merry days yet in Old England, and that Bilboa blades would fetch as good a price as ever. "I remember," he said, "gentlemen, though I was then but a prentice, the demand for weapons in the years forty-one and forty-two; sword blades were more in request than tooth-picks, and Old Ironsides, my master, took more for rascally Provant rapiers, than I dare ask now-a-days for a Toledo. But, to be sure, a man's life then rested the blade he carried; the Cavaliers and Roundheads fought every day at the gates of Whitehall, as it were, gentlemen, by your good example, they may do in, when I shall be enabled to leave my pitiful th, and open a shop of better quality. I hope you recommend me gentlemen, to your friends. I am always provided with ware which a gentleman may his life on."

"Thank you, good friend," said Julian, "I prithee one. I trust we shall need thy ware no more for the time at least."

he cutler retired, while the dwarf hollowed after down stairs, that he would call on him soon, equip himself with a longer blade, and one more for action; although, he said, the little weapon had did well enough, for a walking-sword, or in a mish with such canaille as they had been engaged in.

he cutler returned at this summons, and agreed to the little man with a weapon more suited to his magnanimity; then, as if the thought suddenly occurred to him, he said, "But, gentlemen, it will be but wild work to walk with your swords through the Strand, and it can scarce to raise the rabble again. If you please, while repose yourselves here, I can fit the blades with atha."

he proposal seemed so reasonable, that Julian and father gave up their weapons to the friendly cutler, example which the dwarf followed, after a moment's hesitation, not caring, as he magnificently expressed it, to part so soon with the trusty friend which one had but the moment before restored to his side. The man retired with the weapons under his arm; and, in shutting the door behind him, they heard him turn the key.

"Did you hear that?" said Sir Geoffrey to his son and we are disarmed!"

Julian, without reply, examined the door, which was secured; and then looked at the casements, which were at a story's height from the ground, and grated with iron. "I cannot think," he said, after a moment's pause, "that the fellow means to trepan and, in any event, I trust we should have no difficulty in forcing the door, or otherwise making an ape. But, before resorting to such violent measures, I think it is better to give the rabble leisure to depart, by waiting this man's return with our weapons within a reasonable time, when, if he does not appear, I trust we shall find little difficulty in extricating ourselves." As he spoke thus, the hangings were pulled aside, and, from a small door which was concealed behind them, Major Bridgenorth entered the room.

CHAPTER XLIII.

He came amongst them like a new raised spirit,
To speak of dreadful judgments that impend,
And of the wrath to come.—The Reformer.

THE astonishment of Julian at the unexpected arrival of Bridgenorth, was instantly succeeded by apprehension of his father's violence, which he had every reason to believe would break forth against him; whom he himself could not but reverence on account of his own merits, as well as because he was the father of Alice. The appearance of Bridgenorth was not, however, such as to awaken resentment. His countenance was calm, his step slow and composed, his eye not without the indication of some deep-seated anxiety, but without any expression of anger or of triumph. "You are welcome," said, "Sir Geoffrey Peveril, to the shelter and hospitality of this house; as welcome as you would have been in other days when we called each other neighbours and friends."

"Odzooks," said the old Cavalier, "and had I known it was thy house, man, I would sooner had my own blood run down the kennel, than my foot should have crossed your threshold—in the way of king safety, that is."

"I forgive your inveteracy," said Major Bridgenorth, "on account of your prejudices."

"Keep your forgiveness," answered the Cavalier,

"until you are pardoned yourself. By Saint George, I have sworn, if ever I got my heels out of yon rascally prison, whither I was sent much through your means, Master Bridgenorth,—that you should pay the reckoning for my bad lodging.—I will strike no man in his own house; but if you will cause the fellow to bring back my weapon, and take a turn in that blind court there below, along with me, you shall soon see what chance a traitor hath with a true man, and a kennel-blooded Puritan with Peveril of the Peak."

Bridgenorth smiled with much composure. "When I was younger and more warm-blooded," he replied, "I refused your challenge, Sir Geoffrey; it is not likely I should now accept it, when each is within a stride of the grave. I have not spared, and will not spare, my blood, when my country wants it."

"That is, when there is any chance of treason against the King," said Sir Geoffrey.

"Nay, my father," said Julian, "let us hear Master Bridgenorth! We have been sheltered in his house; and although we now see him in London, we should remember that he did not appear against us this day, when perhaps his evidence might have given a fatal turn to our situation."

"You are right young man," said Bridgenorth; "and it should be some pledge of my sincere good will, that I was this day absent from Westminster, when a few words from my mouth had ended the long line of Peveril of the Peak; It needed but ten minutes to walk to Westminster Hall, to have ensured your condemnation. But could I have done this, knowing, as I now know, that to thee, Julian Peveril, I owe the extrication of my daughter—of my dearest Alice—the memory of her departed mother—from the snares which lust and profligacy had opened around her?"

"She is, I trust, safe," said Peveril, eagerly, and almost forgetting his father's presence; "she is, I trust, safe, and in your own wardship?"

"Not in mine," said the dejected father; "but in that of one in whose protection, next to that of Heaven, I can most fully confide."

"Are you sure—are you very sure of that?" repeated Julian, eagerly. "I found her under the charge of one to whom she had been trusted, and who yet?"

"And who yet was the basest of women," answered Bridgenorth; "but he who selected her for the charge was deceived in her character."

"Say rather you were deceived in his; remember that when we parted at Moultrassie I warned you of that Galesse—that!"

"I know your meaning," said Bridgenorth; "nor did you err in describing him as a worldly-wise man, But he has atoned for his error by recovering Alice from the dangers into which she was plunged when separated from you, and besides, I have not thought meet again to intrust him with the charge that is dearest to me."

"I thank God your eyes are thus far opened!" said Julian.

"This day will open them wide, or close them forever," answered Bridgenorth.

During this dialogue, which the speakers hurried through without attending to the others who were present, Sir Geoffrey listened with surprise and eagerness, endeavouring to catch something which should render their conversation intelligible; but as he totally failed in gaining any such key to their meaning, he broke in with,—"'Sblood and thunder, Julian, what unprofitable gossip is this? What hast thou to do with this fellow, more than to bastinado him, if you should think it worth while to beat so old a rogue?"

"My dearest father," said Julian, "you know not this gentleman—I am certain you do him injustice. My own obligations to him are many; and I am sure when you come to know them!"

"I hope I shall die ere that moment come," said Sir Geoffrey; and continued with increasing violence, "I hope in the mercy of Heaven, that I shall be in the grave of my ancestors, ere I learn that my son—my only son—the last hope of my ancient house—the last remnant of the name of Peveril—hath consented to receive obligations from the man on earth I am most bound to hate were I not still more bound to contemn him!—Degenerate dogwhelp!" he repeated with great vehemence, "you colour without replying! Speak and disown such disgrace; or, by the God of my fathers"—

The dwarf suddenly stepped forward, and called out, "Forbear!" with a voice at once so discordant and commanding, that it sounded supernatural. "Man of sin and pride," he said, "forbear; and call not the name of a holy God, to witness thine unhalloved resentments."

The rebuke so boldly and decidedly given, and the moral enthusiasm with which he spoke, gave the despised dwarf an ascendancy for the moment over the fiery spirit of his gigantic namesake. Sir Geoffrey Peveril eyed him for an instant askance and shyly, as he might have done a supernatural apparition, and then muttered, "What knowest thou of my cause of wrath?"

"Nothing," said the dwarf;—"nothing but this—that no cause can warrant the oath thou wert about to swear. Ungrateful man! thou wert to-day rescued from the devouring wrath of the wicked, by a marvellous conjunction of circumstances—Is this a day, thinkest thou, on which to indulge thine own hasty resentments?"

"I stand rebuked," said Sir Geoffrey, "and by a singular monitor—the grasshopper, as the prayer-book saith, hath become a burden to me.—Julian, I will speak to thee of these matters hereafter;—and for you, Master Bridgenorth, I desire to have no farther communication with you, either in peace or in anger. Our time passes fast, and I would fain return to my family. Cause our weapons to be restored; unbar the doors, and let us part without farther altercation, which can but disturb and aggravate our spirits."

"Sir Geoffrey Peveril," said Bridgenorth, "I have no desire to vex your spirit or my own; but, for thus soon dismissing you, that may hardly be, it being a course inconsistent with the work which I have on hand."

"How, sir! Do you mean that we should abide here, whether with or against our inclinations?" said the dwarf. "Were it not that I am laid under charge to remain here, by one who hath the best right to command this poor microcosm, I would show thee that bolts and bars are unavailing restraints on such as I am."

"Truly," said Sir Geoffrey, "I think, upon an emergency, the little man might make his escape through the keyhole."

Bridgenorth's face was moved into something like a smile at the swaggering speech of the pigmy hero, and the contemptuous commentary of Sir Geoffrey Peveril; but such an expression never dwelt on his features for two seconds together, and he replied in these words:—"Gentlemen, each and all of you must be fain to content yourselves. Believe me, no hurt is intended towards you; on the contrary, your remaining here will be a means of securing your safety, which would be otherwise deeply endangered. It will be your own fault if a hair of your head is hurt. But the stronger force is on my side; and, whatever harm you may meet with should you attempt to break forth by violence, the blame must rest with yourselves. If you will not believe me, I will permit Master Julian Peveril to accompany me, where he shall see that I am provided fully with the means of repressing violence."

"Treason!—treason!" exclaimed the old Knight—"Treason against God and King Charles!—O for one half hour of the broadsword which I parted with like an ass!"

"Hold, my father, I conjure you!" said Julian. "I will go with Master Bridgenorth, since he requests it. I will satisfy myself whether there be danger, and of what nature. It is possible I may prevail on him to desist from some desperate measure, if such be indeed in agitation. Should it be necessary, fear not that your son will behave as he ought to do."

"Do your pleasure, Julian," said his father; "I will confide in thee. But if you betray my confidence, a father's curse shall cleave to you."

Bridgenorth now motioned to Peveril to follow him, and they passed through the small door by which he had entered.

The passage led to a vestibule or anteroom, in which several other doors and passages seemed to centre. Through one of these Julian was conducted by Bridgenorth, walking with silence and precaution, in obedience to a signal made by his guide to that effect. As they advanced, he heard sounds, like those of the human voice, engaged in urgent and emphatic declamation. With slow and light steps Bridgenorth conducted him through a door which terminated this passage; and as he entered a little gallery, having a curtain in front, the sound of the preacher's voice—for such it now seemed—became distinct and audible.

Julian now doubted not that he was in one of those conventicles, which, though contrary to the existing laws, still continued to be regularly held in different parts of London and the suburbs. Many of these, as frequented by persons of moderate political principles, though dissenters from the church for conscience' sake, were connived at by the prudence or timidity of the government. But some of them, in which assembled the fiercer and more exalted sects of Independents, Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy men, and other sectaries whose stern enthusiasm had contributed so greatly to effect the overthrow of the late King's throne, were sought after, suppressed, and dispersed, wherever they could be discovered.

Julian was soon satisfied that the meeting into which he was thus secretly introduced, was one of the latter class; and, to judge by the violence of the preacher, of the most desperate character. He was still more effectually convinced of this, when, at a sign from Bridgenorth, he cautiously unclosed a part of the curtain which hung before the gallery, and thus, unseen himself, looked down on the audience, and obtained a view of the preacher.

About two hundred persons were assembled beneath, in an area filled up with benches, as if for the exercise of worship; and they were all of the male sex, and well armed with pikes and muskets, as well as swords and pistols. Most of them had the appearance of veteran soldiers, now past the middle of life, yet retaining such an appearance of strength as might well supply the loss of youthful agility. They stood, or sat, in various attitudes of stern attention; and, resting on their spears and muskets, kept their eyes firmly fixed on the preacher, who ended the violence of his declamation by displaying from the pulpit a banner, on which was represented a lion, with the motto, "Vicit Leo ex tribu Judæ."

The torrent of mystical yet animating eloquence of the preacher—an old gray-haired man, whom zeal seemed to supply with the powers of voice and action, of which years had deprived him—was suited to the taste of his audience, but could not be transferred to these pages without scandal and impropriety. He menaced the rulers of England with all the judgments denounced on those of Moab and Assyria—he called upon the saints to be strong, to be up and doing; and promised those miracles which, in the campaigns of Joshua, and his successors the valiant Judges of Israel, supplied all odds against the Amorites, Midianites, and Philistines. He sounded trumpets, opened vials, broke seals, and denounced approaching judgments under all the mystical signs of the Apocalypse. The end of the world was announced, accompanied with all its preliminary terrors.

Julian, with deep anxiety, soon heard enough to make him aware, that the meeting was likely to terminate in open insurrection, like that of the Fifth-Monarchy men under Venner, at an earlier period of Charles's reign; and he was not a little concerned at the probability of Bridgenorth's being implicated in so criminal and desperate an undertaking. If he had retained any doubts of the issue of the meeting, they must have been removed when the preacher called on his hearers to renounce all expectation which had hitherto been entertained of safety to the nation, from the execution of the ordinary laws of the land. This, he said, was at best but a carnal seeking after earthly aid—a going down to Egypt for help, which the jealousy of their Divine Leader would resent as a fleeing to another rock, and a different banner, from that which was this day displayed over them.—And here he solemnly swung the bannered lion over their heads, as the only sign under which they ought to seek for life and safety. He then proceeded to insist, that recourse to ordinary justice was vain as well as sinful.

"The event of that day at Westminster," he said, "might teach them that the Man at Whitehall was even as the Man his father;" and he closed a long tirade against the vices of the Court, with assurance "that Tophet was ordained of old—for the King it was made hot."

As the preacher entered on a description of the approaching theocracy, which he dared to prophesy, Bridgenorth, who appeared for a time to have forgotten the presence of Julian, whilst with stern and fixed attention he drank in the words of the preacher, seemed suddenly to collect himself, and, taking Julian by the hand, led him out of the gallery, of which he carefully closed the door, into an apartment at no great distance.

When they arrived there, he anticipated the expostulations of Julian, by asking him, in a tone of severe triumph, whether these men he had seen were likely to do their work negligently, or whether it would not be perilous to attempt to force their way from a house, when all the avenues were guarded by such as he had now seen—men of war from their childhood upwards.

"In the name of Heaven," said Julian, without replying to Bridgenorth's question, "for what desperate purpose have you assembled so many desperate men? I am well aware that your sentiments of religion are peculiar; but beware how you deceive yourself—No views of religion can sanction rebellion and murder; and such are the natural and necessary consequences of the doctrine we have just heard poured into the ears of fanatical and violent enthusiasts."

"My son," said Bridgenorth, calmly "in the days of my nonage, I thought as you do. I deemed it sufficient to pay my tithes of cummin and anniseed—my poor petty moral observances of the old law; and I thought I was heaping up precious things, when they were in value no more than the husks of the swine-trough. Praised be Heaven, the scales are fallen from mine eyes; and after forty years' wandering in the desert of Sinai, I am at length arrived in the land of Promise—My corrupt human nature has left me—I have cast my slough, and can now with some conscience put my hand to the plough, certain that there is no weakness left in me wherethrough I may look back. The furrows," he added, bending his brows, while a gloomy fire filled his large eyes, "must be drawn long and deep, and watered by the blood of the mighty."

There was a change in Bridgenorth's tone and manner, when he used these singular expressions, which convinced Julian, that his mind, which had wavered for so many years between his natural goodness and the insane enthusiasm of the time, had finally given way to the latter; and, sensible of the danger in which the unhappy man himself, the innocent and beautiful Alice, and his own father, were likely to be placed—to say nothing of the general risk of the community by a sudden insurrection, he at the same time felt that there was no chance of reasoning effectually with one who would oppose spiritual conviction to all arguments which reason could urge against his wild schemes. To touch his feelings seemed a more probable resource; and Julian therefore conjured Bridgenorth to think how much his daughter's honour and safety were concerned in his abstaining from the dangerous course which he meditated. "If you fall," he said, "must she not pass under the power and guardianship of her uncle, whom you allow to have shown himself capable of the grossest mistake in the choice of her female protector; and whom I believe, upon good grounds, to have made that infamous choice with his eyes open?"

me feel like the poor bird, around whose wing some wanton boy has fixed a line, to pull the struggling wretch to earth at his pleasure. Know, since thou wilt play this cruel part, and drag me down from higher contemplations, that she with whom Alice is placed, and who hath in future full power to guide her motions and decide her fate, despite of Christian and every one else, is—I will not tell thee who she is—Enough—no one—thou least of all, needs to fear for her safety."

At this moment a side-door opened, and Christian himself came into the apartment. He started and coloured when he saw Julian Peveril; then turning to Bridgenorth with an assumed air of indifference, asked, "Is Saul among the prophets?—Is a Peveril among the saints?"

"No, brother," replied Bridgenorth, "his time is not come, more than thine own—thou art too deep in the ambitious intrigues of manhood, and he in the giddy passions of youth, to hear the still calm voice—You will both hear it, as I trust and pray."

"Master Ganlesse, or Christian, or by whatever name you are called," said Julian, "by whatever reasons you guide yourself in this most perilous matter, you at least are not influenced by any idea of an immediate divine command for commencing hostilities against the state. Leaving, therefore, for the present, whatever subjects of discussion may be between us, I implore you as a man of shrewdness and sense, to join with me in dissuading Master Bridgenorth from the fatal enterprise which he now meditates."

"Young gentleman," said Christian, with great composure, "when we met in the west, I was willing to have made a friend of you, but you rejected the overture. You might, however, even then have seen enough of me to be assured, that I am not likely to rush too rashly on any desperate undertaking. As to this which lies before us, my brother Bridgenorth brings to it the simplicity, though not the harmlessness of the dove, and I the subtlety of the serpent. He hath the leading of saints who are moved by the spirit; and I can add to their efforts a powerful body, who have for their instigators, the world, the devil, and the flesh."

"And can you," said Julian, looking at Bridgenorth, "accede to such an unworthy union?"

"I unite not with them," said Bridgenorth; "but I may not, without guilt, reject the aid which Providence sends to assist his servants. We are ourselves few, though determined—Those whose swords come to help the cutting down of the harvest, must be welcome—When their work is wrought, they will be converted or scattered.—Have you been at York-Place, brother, with that unstable epicure? We must have his last resolution, and that within an hour."

Christian looked at Julian, as if his presence prevented him from returning an answer; upon which Bridgenorth arose, and taking the young man by the arm, led him out of the apartment, into that in which they had left his father; assuring him by the way, that determined and vigilant guards were placed in every different quarter by which escape could be effected, and that he would do well to persuade his father to remain a quiet prisoner for a few hours.

Julian returned him no answer, and Bridgenorth presently retired, leaving him alone with his father and Hudson. To their questions he could only briefly reply, that he feared they were trepanned, since they were in the house with at least two hundred fanatics, completely armed, and apparently prepared for some desperate enterprise. Their own want of arms precluded the possibility of open violence; and however unpleasant it might be to remain in such a condition, it seemed difficult, from the strength of the fastenings at doors, and windows, to attempt any secret escape without instantaneous detection.

The valiant dwarf alone nursed hopes, with which he in vain endeavoured to inspire his companions in affliction. "The fair one whose eyes," he said, "were like the twin stars of Leda"—for the little man was a great admirer of lofty language—"had not invited him, the most devoted, and, it might be, not the least favoured of her servants, into this place as a harbour, in order that he might therein suffer shipwreck ; and he generously assured his friends, that in his safety they also should be safe."

Sir Geoffrey, little cheered by this intimation, expressed his despair at not being able to get the length of Whitehall, where he trusted to find as many jolly Cavaliers as would help him to stifle the whole nest of wasps in their hive ; while Julian was of opinion that the best service he could now render Bridgenorth, would be timeously to disclose his plot, and, if possible, to send him at the same time warning to save his person.

But we must leave them to meditate over their plans at leisure ; no one of which, as they all depended on their previous escape from confinement, seemed in any great chance of being executed.

CHAPTER XLIV.

And some for safety took the dreadful leap.
Some for the voice of Heaven seem'd calling on them ;
Some for advancement, or for lucre's sake—
I leap'd in frolic.—The Dream.

AFTER a private conversation with Bridgenorth, Christian hastened to the Duke of Buckingham's hotel, taking at the same time such a route as to avoid meeting with any acquaintance. He was ushered into the apartment of the Duke, whom he found cracking and eating filberts, with a flask of excellent white wine at his elbow. "Christian," said his Grace, "come help me to laugh—I have bit Sir Charles Sedley—flung him for a thousand, by the gods!"

"I am glad at your luck, my Lord Duke," replied Christian ; "but I am come here on serious business."

"Serious?—why, I shall hardly be serious in my life again—ha, ha, ha!—and for luck, it was no such thing—sheer wit, and excellent contrivance ; and but that I don't care to affront Fortune, like the old Greek general, I might tell her to her face.—In this thou hadst no share. You have heard, Ned Christian, that Mother Cresswell is dead?"

"Yes, I did hear that the devil hath got his due," answered Christian.

"Well," said the Duke, "you are ungrateful ; for I know you have been obliged to her, as well as others. Before George, a most benevolent and helpful old lady ; and that she might not sleep in an unblest grave, I betted—do you mark me—with Sedley, that I would write her funeral-sermon ; that it should be every word in praise of her life and conversation ; that it should be all true, and yet that the diocesan should be unable to lay his thumb on Quodling, my little chaplain, who should preach it."

"I perfectly see the difficulty, my lord," said Christian, who well knew that if he wished to secure attention from this volatile nobleman, he must first suffer, nay, encourage him, to exhaust the topic, whatever it might be, that had got temporary possession of his pineal gland.

"Why," said the Duke, "I caused my little Quodling to go through his oration thus—'That whatever evil reports had passed current during the lifetime of the worthy matron whom they had restored to dust that day, malice itself could not deny that she was born well, married well, lived well, and died well ; since she was born in Shadwell, married to Cresswell, lived in Camberwell, and died in Bridewell.' Here ended the oration, and with it Sedley's ambitious hopes of overreaching Buckingham—ha, ha, ha!—And now, Master Christian, what are your commands for me to-day?"

"First, to thank your Grace for being so attentive as to send so formidable a person as Colonel Blood, to wait upon your poor friend and servant. Faith, he took such an interest in my leaving town, that he wanted to compel me to do it at point of fox, so I was obliged to spill a little of his malapert blood. Your Grace's swordsmen have had ill luck of late ; and it is hard, since you always choose the best hands, and such scrupulous knaves too."

"Come now, Christian," said the Duke, "do not thus exult over me ; a great man, if I may so call myself, is never greater than amid miscarriage. I only played this little trick on you, Christian, to impress on you a wholesome idea of the interest I take in your motions. The scoundrel's having dared to draw upon you, is a thing not to be forgiven.—What! injure my old friend, Christian?"

"And why not," said Christian, coolly, "if your old friend was so stubborn as not to go out of town, like a good boy, when your Grace desired him to do so, for the civil purpose of entertaining his niece in his absence?"

"How—what!—how do you mean by my entertaining your niece, Master Christian?" said the Duke. "She was a personage far beyond my poor attentions, being destined, if I recollect aright, to something like royal favour."

"It was her fate, however, to be the guest of your Grace's convent for a brace of days, or so. Marry, my lord, the father confessor was not at home, and—for convents have been scaled of late—returned not till the bird was flown."

"Christian, thou art an old reynard—I see there is no doubling with thee. It was thou, then, stole away my pretty prize, but left me something so much prettier in my mind, that, had it not made itself wings to fly away with, I would have placed it in a cage of gold. Never be downcast, man ; I forgive thee—I forgive thee."

"Your Grace is of a most merciful disposition, especially considering it is I who have had the wrong ; and sages have said, that he who doth the injury, is less apt to forgive than he who only sustains it."

"True, true, Christian," said the Duke, "which, as you say, is something quite new, and places my demerency in a striking point of view. Well, then, thou forgiven man, when shall I see my Mauritanian princess again?"

"Whenever I am certain that a quibble, and a car whichit, or a play or a sermon, will not banish her from your Grace's memory."

"Not all the wit of South, or of Etherage," said Buckingham, hastily, "to say nothing of my own, shall in future make me oblivious of what I owe the Morisco princess."

"Yet to leave the fair lady out of thought for a little while—a very little while," said Christian. "since I swear that in due time your Grace shall see her, and know in her the most extraordinary woman that this age has produced—to leave her, I say, out of sight for a little while, has your Grace had late notice of your Duchess's health?"

"Health!" said the Duke. "Umph—no—nothing particular. She has been ill—but"

"She is no longer so," subjoined Christian ; "she died in Yorkshire forty-eight hours since."

"Thou must deal with the devil!" said the Duke.

"It would ill become one of my name to do so," replied Christian. "But, in the brief interval since your Grace hath known of an event which has not yet reached the public ear, you have, I believe, made proposals to the King for the hand of the Lady Anne, second daughter of the Duke of York, and your Grace's proposals have been rejected."

"Fiends and firebrands, villain!" said the Duke, starting up and seizing Christian by the collar. "who hath told thee that?"

"Take your hand from my cloak, my Lord Duke, and I may answer you," said Christian. "I have a scurvy touch of old puritanical humour about me, I abide not the imposition of hands. Take off your grasp from my cloak, or I will find means to make you unloose it."

The Duke, who had kept his right hand on his dagger-hilt, while he held Christian's collar with his left, unloosed it as he spoke, but slowly, and as one who rather suspends than abandons the execution of some hasty impulse ; while Christian, adjusting his cloak with perfect composure, said, "Soh—my cloak being at liberty, we speak on equal terms. I come not to insult your Grace, but to offer you vengeance for the insult you have received."

"Vengeance!" said the Duke—"It is the dearest proffer man can present to me in my present mood. I hunger for vengeance—thirst for vengeance—could die to ensure vengeance!—'Sdeath!" he continued, walking up and down the large apartment with the most unrestrained and violent agitation; "I have chased this repulse out of my brain with ten thousand trifles, because I thought no one knew it. But it is known, and to thee, the very common-sewer of Court secrets—the honour of Villiers is in thy keeping, Ned Christian! Speak, thou man of wiles and of intrigue—on whom dost thou promise the vengeance? Speak! and if thy answers meet my desires, I will make a bargain with thee as willingly as with thy master, Satan himself."

"I will not be," said Christian, "so unreasonable in my terms as stories tell of the old apostate; I will offer your Grace, as he might do, temporal prosperity and revenge, which is his frequent recruiting money, but I leave it to yourself to provide, as you may be pleased, for your future salvation."

The Duke, gazing upon him fixedly and sadly, replied, "I would to God, Christian, that I could read what purpose of damnable villany thou hast to propose to me in thy countenance, without the necessity of thy using words!"

"Your Grace can but try a guess," said Christian, calmly smiling.

"No," replied the Duke, after gazing at him again for the space of a minute; "thou art so deeply dyed a hypocrite, that thy mean features, and clear gray eye, are as likely to conceal treason, as any petty scheme of theft or larceny, more corresponding to your degree."

"Treason, my lord?" echoed Christian; "you may have guessed more nearly than you were aware of. I honour your Grace's penetration."

"Treason!" echoed the Duke. "Who dare name such a crime to me?"

"If a name startles your Grace, you may call it vengeance—vengeance on the cabal of counsellors, who have ever countermined you, in spite of your wit and your interest with the King. —Vengeance on Arlington, Ormond—on Charles himself."

"No," by Heaven," said the Duke, resuming his disordered walk through the apartment—"Vengeance on these rats of the Privy Council,—come at it as you will. But the King!—never—never. I have provoked him a hundred times, where he has stirred me once. I have crossed his path in state intrigue—rivalled him in love—had the advantage in both,—and, d—n it, he has forgiven me! If treason would put me in his throne, I have no apology for it—it were worse than bestial ingratitude."

"Nobly spoken, my lord," said Christian; "and consist'ent alike with the obligations under which your Grace lies to Charles Stewart, and the sense you have ever shown of them. —But it signifies not. If your Grace patronise not our enterprise, there is Shaftesbury—there is Monmouth!"

"Scoundrel!" exclaimed the Duke, even more vehemently agitated than before, "think you that you shall carry on with others an enterprise which I have refused?—No, by every heathen and every Christian god!—Hark ye, Christian, I will arrest you on the spot—I will, by gods and devils, and carry you to unravel your plot at Whitehall."

"Where the first words I speak," answered the imperturbable Christian, "will be to inform the Privy Council in what place they may find certain letters, wherewith your Grace has honoured your poor vassal, containing, as I think, particulars which his Majesty will read with more surprise than pleasure."

"Sdeath, villain!" said the Duke, once more laying his hand on his poniard-hilt, "thou hast me again at advantage. I know not why I forbear to poniard you where you stand!"

"I might fall, my Lord Duke," said Christian, slightly colouring, and putting his right hand into his bosom, "though not, I think, unavenged—for I have not put my person into this peril altogether without means of defence. I might fall, but, alas! your Grace's correspondence is in hands, which, by that very act, would be rendered sufficiently active in handing them to the King and the Privy Council. What say you to the Moorish Princess, my Lord Duke? What if I have left her executrix of my will, with certain instructions how to proceed if I return not unharmed from York-Place? O, my lord, though my head is in the wolf's mouth, I was not goose enough to place it there without settling how many carabines should be fired on the wolf, so soon as my dying cackle was heard.—Pshaw, my Lord Duke! you deal with a man of sense and courage, yet you speak to him as a child and a coward."

The Duke threw himself into a chair, fixed his eyes on the ground, and spoke without raising them. "I am about to call Jerningham," he said; "but fear nothing—it is only for a draught of wine.—That stuff on the table may be a vehicle for filberts and walnuts, but not for such communications as yours. Bring me champagne," he said to the attendant who answered on his summons.

The domestic returned, and brought a flask of champagne, with two large silver cups. One of them he filled for Buckingham, who, contrary to the usual etiquette, was always served first at home, and then offered the other to Christian, who declined to receive it.

The Duke drank off the large goblet which was presented to him, and for a moment covered his forehead with the palm of his hand; then instantly withdrew it, and said, "Christian, speak your errand plainly. We know each other. If my reputation be in some degree in your hands, you are well aware that your life is in mine. Sit down," he said, taking a pistol from his bosom and laying it on the table—"Sit down, and let me hear your proposal."

"My lord," said Christian, smiling, "I shall produce no such ultimate argument on my part, though possibly, in time of need, I may not be found destitute of them. But my defence is in the situation of things, and in the composed view which, doubtless, your Majesty will take of them."

"Majesty!" repeated the Duke—"My good friend Christian, you have kept company with the Puritans so long, that you confuse the ordinary titles of the Court."

"I know not how to apologize," said Christian, "unless your Grace will suppose that I spoke by prophecy."

"Such as the devil delivered to Macbeth," said the Duke—again paced the chamber, and again seated himself, and said, "Be plain, Christian—speak out at once, and manfully, what is it you intend?"

"I," said Christian—"What should I do?—I can do nothing in such a matter; but I thought it right that your Grace should know that the godly of this city"—(he spoke the word with a kind of ironical grin)—"are impatient of inactivity, and must needs be up and doing. My brother Bridgenorth is at the head of all old Weiver's congregation; for you must know, that, after floundering from one faith to another, he hath now got beyond ordinances, and is become a Fifth-Monarchy man. He has nigh two hundred of Weiver's people, fully equipped, and ready to fall on; and, with slight aid from your Grace's people, they must carry Whitehall, and make prisoners of all within it."

"Rascal!" said the Duke, "and is it to a Peer of England you make this communication?"

"Nay," answered Christian, "I admit it would be extreme folly in your Grace to appear until all is over. But let me give Blood and the others a hint on your part. There are the four Germans also—right Knopperdolings and Anabaptists—will be specially useful. You are wise, my lord, and know the value of a corps of domestic gladiators, as well as did Octavius, Lepidus, and Antony, when, by such family forces, they divided the world by indenture tripartite."

"Stay, stay," said the Duke. "Even if these blood-hounds were to join with you—not that I would permit it without the most positive assurances for the King's personal safety—but say the villains were to join, what hope have you of carrying the Court?"

"Bully Tom Armstrong,* my lord, hath promised his interest with the Life-Guards. Then there are

* Thomas, or Sir Thomas Armstrong, a person who had distinguished himself in youth by duels and drunken exploits. He was particularly connected with the Duke of Monmouth, and was said to be concerned in the Rye-House Plot, for which he suffered capital punishment, 26th June, 1684.

my Lord Shaftesbury's brisk boys in the city—thirty thousand on the holding up a finger."

"Let him hold up both hands, and if he count a hundred for each finger," said the Duke, "it will be more than I expect. You have not spoken to him?"

"Surely not, till your Grace's pleasure was known. But, if he is not applied to, there is the Dutch train, Hans Snorehout's congregation, in the Strand—there are the French Protestants in Piccadilly—there are the Family of Levi in Lewkenor's Lane—the Muggletonians in Thames Street"—

"Ah, laugh!—Out upon them—out upon them!—How the knaves will stink of cheese and tobacco when they come upon action!—they will drown all the perfumes in Whitehall. Spare me the detail; and let me know, my dearest Ned, the sum total of thy most odoriferous forces."

"Fifteen hundred men, well armed," said Christian, "besides the rabble that will rise to a certainty—they have already nearly torn to pieces the prisoners who were this day acquitted on account of the Plot."

"All, then, I understand.—And now, hark ye, most christian Christian," said he, wheeling his chair full in front of that on which his agent was seated, "you have told me many things to-day—Shall I be equally communicative? Shall I show you that my accuracy of information matches yours? Shall I tell you, in a word, why you have at once resolved to push every one, from the Puritan to the free-thinker, upon a general attack of the Palace at Whitehall, without allowing me, a peer of the realm, time either to pause upon or to prepare for a step so desperate? Shall I tell you why you would lead or drive, seduce or compel me, into countenancing your measures?"

"My lord, if you please to form a guess," said Christian, "I will answer with all sincerity, if you have assigned the right cause."

"The Countess of Derby is this day arrived, and attends the Court this evening, with hopes of the kindest reception. She may be surprised amid the mêlée? Ha! Said I not right, Master Christian? You, who pretend to offer me revenge, know yourself its exquisite sweetness."

"I would not presume," said Christian, half smiling, "to offer your Grace a dish, without acting as your taster as well as purveyor."

"That's honestly said," said the Duke. "Away then, my friend. Give Blood this ring—he knows it, and knows how to obey him who bears it. Let him assemble my gladiators, as thou dost most wittily term my coup jarrets. The old scheme of the German music may be resorted to, for I think thou hast the instruments ready. But take notice, I know nothing on't; and Rowley's person must be safe—I will hang and burn on all hands if a hair of his black periwig* be but singed. Then what is to follow—a Lord Protector of the realm—or stay—Cromwell has made the word somewhat slovenly and unpopular—a Lord Lieutenant of the Kingdom?—The patriots, who take it on themselves to revenge the injustice done to the country, and to remove evil counsellors from before the King's throne, that it may be henceforward established in righteousness—so I think the rubric runs—cannot fail to make a fitting choice."

"They cannot, my Lord Duke," said Christian, "since there is but one man in the three kingdoms on whom that choice can possibly fall."

"I thank you, Christian," said his Grace; "and I trust you. Away, and make all ready. Be assured your services shall not be forgot. We will have you near to us."

"My Lord Duke," said Christian, "you bind me doubly to you. But remember, that as your Grace is spared any obnoxious proceedings which may befall in the way of military execution, or otherwise, so it will be advisable that you hold yourself in preparation, upon a moment's notice, to put yourself at the head of a band of honourable friends and allies, and come presently to the palace, where you will be received by the victors as a commander, and by the vanquished as a preserver."

* Charles, to suit his dark complexion, always wore a black periwig. He used to say of the players, that if they wished to represent a villain on the stage, "Odds-fish, they always clapp'd on him a black periwig, whereas the greatest rogue in England (meaning, probably, Dr. Oates) wears a white one."—See CIBBER'S Apology.

"I conceive you—I conceive you. I will be in prompt readiness," said the Duke.

"Ay, my lord," continued Christian; "and, for Heaven's sake, let none of those toys, which are the very Delilas of your imagination, come across your Grace this evening, and interfere with the execution of this sublime scheme."

"Why, Christian, dost think me mad?" was his Grace's emphatic reply. "It is you who linger, when all should be ordered for a deed so daring. Go then.—But hark ye, Ned; ere you go, tell me when I shall again see yonder thing of fire and air—yon Eastern Peri, that glides into apartments by the key-hole, and leaves them through the casement—yon black-eyed houri of the Mahometan paradise—when, I say, shall I see her once more?"

"When your Grace has the truncheon of Lord Lieutenant of the Kingdom," said Christian, and left the apartment.

Buckingham stood fixed in contemplation for a moment after he was gone. "Should I have done this?" he said, arguing the matter with himself; "or had I the choice, rather, of doing aught else? Should I not hasten to the Court, and make Charles aware of the treason which besets him? I will, by Heaven!—Here, Jerningham, my coach, with the despatch of light!—I will throw myself at his feet, and tell him of all the follies which I have dreamed of with this Christian.—And then he will laugh at me, and spurn me?—No, I have knicked to him to-day already, and my repulse was nothing gentle. To be spurned once in the sun's daily round is enough for Buckingham."

Having made this reflection, he seated himself, and began hastily to mark down the young nobles and gentlemen of quality, and others, their very ignoble companions, who he supposed might be likely to assume him for their leader in any popular disturbance. He had nearly completed it, when Jerningham entered, to say the coach would be ready in an instant, and to bring his master's sword, hat, and cloak.

"Let the coachman draw off," said the Duke. "I'll be in readiness. And send to the gentlemen thou wilt find named in this list; say I am but ill at ease, and wish their company to a slight collation. Let instant expedition be made, and care not for expense; you will find most of them at the Club-House in Fuller's Rents."*

The preparations for festivity were speedily made, and the intended guests, most of them persons who were at leisure for any call that promised pleasure, though sometimes more deaf to those of duty, began speedily to assemble. There were many youths of the highest ranks, and with them, as is usual in those circles, many of a different class, whom talents, or impudence, or wit, or a turn for gambling, had reared up into companions for the great and the gay. The Duke of Buckingham was a general patron of persons of this description; and a numerous attendance took place on the present occasion.

The festivity was pursued with the usual appliances of wine, music, and games of hazard; with which, however, there mingled in that period much more wit, and a good deal more gross profligacy of conversation, than the talents of the present generation can supply, or their taste would permit.

The Duke himself proved the complete command which he possessed over his versatile character, by maintaining the frolic, the laugh, and the jest, while his ear caught up, and with eagerness, the most distant sounds, as intimating the commencement of Christian's revolutionary project. Such sounds were heard from time to time, and from time to time they died away, without any of those consequences which Buckingham expected.

* The place of meeting of the Green Riband Club. "Their place of meeting," says Roger North, "was in a sort of Carre-four at Chancery Lane, in a centre of business and company most proper for such anglers of souls. The house was double balconied in front, as may yet be seen, for the clubbers to wave forth à fresco, with hats and no perukes, pipes in their mouths, merry faces, and dilated throats for vocal encouragement of the canaglia below on usual and unusual occasions."

At length, and when it was late in the evening, Jeringham announced Master Chiffinch from the Court; and that worthy personage followed the annunciation.

"Strange things have happened, my Lord Duke," he said; "your presence at Court is instantly required by his Majesty."

"You alarm me," said Buckingham, standing up.
"I hope nothing has happened—I hope there is nothing wrong—I hope his Majesty is well?"

"Perfectly well," said Chiffinch; "and desirous to see your Grace without a moment's delay."

"This is sudden," said the Duke. "You see I have had merry fellows about me, and am scarce in case to appear, Chiffinch."

"Your Grace seems to be in very handsome plight," said Chiffinch; "and you know his Majesty is gracious enough to make allowances."

"True," said the Duke, not a little anxious in his mind, touching the cause of this unexpected summons—"True—his Majesty is most gracious—I will order my coach."

"Mine is below," replied the royal messenger; "it will save time, if your Grace will condescend to use it."

Forced from every evasion, Buckingham took a goblet from the table, and requested his friends to remain at his palace so long as they could find the means of amusement there. He expected, he said, to return almost immediately; if not, he would take farewell of them with his usual toast, "May all of us that are not hanged in the interval, meet together again here on the first Monday of next month."

This standing toast of the Duke bore reference to the character of several of his guests; but he did not link it on the present occasion without some anticipation concerning his own fate, in case Christian had betrayed him. He hastily made some addition to his dress, and attended Chiffinch in the chariot to Whitehall.

CHAPTER XLV.

High feasting was there there—the gilded roofs
Rung to the wassail-health—the dancer's step Sprung to the chord responsive—the gay gamester
To fate's disposal flung his heap of gold.
And laugh'd alike when it increased or lessen'd:
Such virtue hath court-air to teach us patience
Which schoolmen preach in vain.

Why come ye not to Court?

Upon the afternoon of this eventful day, Charles held his Court in the Queen's apartments, which were opened at a particular hour to invited guests of a certain lower degree, but accessible without restriction to the higher classes of nobility who had come of birth, and to the courtiers who held by office, the privilege of the entrée.

It was one part of Charles's character, which unquestionably rendered him personally popular, and ostended to a subsequent reign the precipitation of his family from the throne, that he banished from his Court many of the formal restrictions with which it was in other reigns surrounded. He was conscious of the good-natured grace of his manners, and trusted to it, often not in vain, to remove evil impressions rising from actions, which he was sensible could not be justified on the grounds of liberal or national policy.

In the daytime the King was commonly seen in the public walks alone, or only attended by one or two persons; and his answer to the remonstrance of his brother, on the risk of thus exposing his person, is well known;—"Believe me, James," he said, "no one will murder me, to make you King."

In the same manner, Charles's evenings, unless such as were destined to more secret pleasures, were frequently spent amongst all who had any pretence to approach a courtly circle; and thus it was upon the night which we are treating of. Queen Catherine, reconciled or humbled to her fate, had long ceased to express any feelings of jealousy, nay, seemed so absolutely dead to such a passion, that she received in her drawing-room, without scruple, and even with encouragement, the Duchesses of Portsmouth and Cleveland, and others, who enjoyed, though in a less avowed character, the credit of having been royal favourites. Constraint of every kind was banished from a circle so composed, and which was frequented at the same time, if not by the wisest, at least by the wittiest courtiers, who ever assembled round a monarch, and who, as many of them had shared the wants, and shifts, and frolics of his exile, had thus acquired a sort of prescriptive license, with the good-natured prince, when he attained his period of prosperity, could hardly have restrained had it suited his temper to do so. This, however, was the least of Charles's thoughts. His manners were such as secured him from indelicate obtrusion; and he sought no other protection from over-familiarity, than what these and his ready wit afforded him.

On the present occasion, he was peculiarly disposed to enjoy the scene of pleasure which had been prepared. The singular death of Major Coleby, which, taking place in his own presence, had proclaimed, with the voice of a passing bell, the ungrateful neglect of the Prince for whom he had sacrificed every thing, had given Charles much pain. But, in his own opinion at least, he had completely atoned for this negligence, by the trouble which he had taken for Sir Geoffrey Peveril and his son, whose liberation he looked upon not only as an excellent good deed in itself, but in spite of the grave rebuke of Ormond, as achieved in a very pardonable manner, considering the difficulties with which he was surrounded. He even felt a degree of satisfaction on receiving intelligence from the city that there had been disturbances in the streets, and that some of the more violent fanatics had betaken themselves to their meeting-houses, upon sudden summons, to inquire, as their preachers phrased it, into the causes of Heaven's wrath, and into the backsliding of the Court, lawyers, and jury, by whom the false and bloody favourers of the Popish Plot were screened and cloaked from deserved punishment.

The King, we repeat, seemed to hear these accounts with pleasure, even when he was reminded of the dangerous and susceptible character of those with whom such suspicions originated. "Will any one now assert," he said, with self-complaisance, "that I am so utterly negligent of the interest of friends?—
You see the peril in which I place myself, and even the risk to which I have exposed the public peace, to rescue a man whom I have scarce seen for twenty years, and then only in his buff-coat and bandoleers, with other Train-Band officers who kissed hands upon the Restoration. They say kings have long hands—I think they have as much occasion for long memories, since they are expected to watch over and reward every man in England, who hath but shown his good-will by crying, 'God save the King!'"

"Nay, the rogues are even more unreasonable still," said Sedley; "for every knave of them thinks himself entitled to your Majesty's protection in a good cause, whether he has cried God save the King or no."

The King smiled, and turned to another part of the stately hall, where every thing was assembled which could, according to the taste of the age, make the time glide pleasantly away.

In one place, a group of the young nobility, and of the ladies of the Court, listened to the reader's acquaintance Empson, who was accompanying, with his unrivalled breathings on the flute, a young siren, who, while her bosom palpitated with pride and with fear, warbled to the courtly and august presence the beautiful air, beginning,

"Young I am, and yet unskill'd
How to make a lover yield," &c.

She performed her task in a manner so corresponding with the strains of the amatory poet, and the voluptuous air with which the words had been invested by the celebrated Purcell, that the men crowded around in ecstasies, while most of the ladies thought it proper either to look extremely indifferent to the words she sung, or to withdraw from the circle as quietly as possible. To the song succeeded a concerto, performed by a select band of most admirable musicians, which the King, whose taste was indisputable, had himself selected.

At other tables in the apartment, the elder courtiers worshipped Fortune, at the various fashionable games of ombre, quadrille, hazard, and the like; while heaps of gold which lay before the players, augmented or dwindled with every turn of a card or cast of a die. Many a year's rent of fair estates was ventured upon the main or the odds; which, spent in the old deserted manor-house, had repaired the ravages of Cromwell upon its walls, and replaced the sources of good house-keeping and hospitality, that, exhausted in the last age by fine and sequestration, were now in a fair way of being annihilated by careless prodigality. Elsewhere, under cover of observing the gamester, or listening to the music, the gallantries of that all-licensed age were practised among the gay and fair, closely watched the whilst by the ugly or the old, who promised themselves at least the pleasure of observing, and it may be that of proclaiming, intrigues in which they could not be sharers.

From one table to another glided the merry Monarch, exchanging now a glance with a Court beauty, now a jest with a Court wit, now beating time to the music, and anon losing or winning a few pieces of gold on the chance of the game to which he stood nearest;—the most amiable of voluptuaries—the gayest and best-natured of companions—the man that would, of all others, have best sustained his character, had life been a continued banquet, and its only end to enjoy the passing hour, and send it away as pleasantly as might be.

But Kings are least of all exempted from the ordinary lot of humanity; and Seged of Ethiopia is, amongst monarchs, no solitary example of the vanity of reckoning on a day or an hour of undisturbed serenity. An attendant on the Court announced suddenly to their Majesties that a lady, who would only announce herself as a Peeress of England, desired to be admitted into the presence.

The Queen said, hastily, it was impossible. No peeress, without announcing her title, was entitled to the privilege of her rank.

"I could be sworn," said a nobleman in attendance, "that it is some whim of the Duchess of Newcastle."

The attendant, who brought the message, said that he did indeed believe it to be the Duchess, both from the singularity of the message, and that the lady spoke with somewhat a foreign accent.

"In the name of madness, then," said the King, "let us admit her. Her Grace is an entire raree-show in her own person—a universal masquerade—indeed a sort of private Bedlam-hospital, her whole ideas being like so many patients crazed upon the subjects of love and literature, who act nothing in their vagaries, save Minerva, Venus, and the nine Muses."

"Your Majesty's pleasure must always supersede mine," said the Queen. "I only hope I shall not be expected to entertain so fantastic a personage. The last time she came to Court, Isabella,"—(she spoke to one of her Portuguese ladies of honour)—"you had not returned from our lovely Lisbon,—her Grace had the assurance to assume a right to bring a train-bearer into my apartment; and when this was not allowed, what then, think you, she did?—even caused her train to be made so long, that three mortal yards of satin and silver remained in the antechamber, supported by four wenches, while the other end was attached to her Grace's person, as she paid her duty at the upper end of the presence-room. Full thirty yards of the most beautiful silk did her Grace's madness employ in this manner."

"And most beautiful damsels they were who bore this portentous train," said the King—"a train never equalled save by that of the great comet in sixty-six. Sedley and Etherege told us wonders of them; for it is one advantage of this new fashion brought up by the Duchess, that a matron may be totally unconscious of the coquetry of her train and its attendants."

"Am I to understand, then, your Majesty's pleasure is, that the lady is to be admitted?" said the usher.

"Certainly," said the King; "that is, if the incognita be really entitled to the honour.—It may be as well to inquire her title—there are more madwomen abroad than the Duchess of Newcastle. I will walk into the anteroom myself, and receive your answer."

But ere Charles had reached the lower end of the apartment in his progress to the anteroom, the usher surprised the assembly by announcing a name which had not for many a year been heard in these courtly halls—"the Countess of Derby!"

Stately and tall, and still, at an advanced period of life, having a person unbroken by years, the noble lady advanced towards her sovereign, with a step resembling that with which she might have met an equal. There was indeed nothing in her manner that indicated either haughtiness or assumption unbecoming that presence; but her consciousness of wrongs, sustained from the administration of Charles, and of the superiority of the injured party over those from whom, or in whose name, the injury had been done, gave her look dignity and her step firmness. She was dressed in widow's weeds, of the same fashion which were worn at the time her husband was brought to the scaffold; and which, in the thirty years subsequent to that event, she had never permitted her firewoman to alter.

The surprise was no pleasing one to the King; and cursing in his heart the rashness which had allowed the lady entrance on the gay scene in which they were engaged, he saw at the same time the necessity of receiving her in a manner suitable to his own character, and her rank in the British Court. He approached her with an air of welcome, into which he threw all his natural grace, while he began, "Chère Comtesse de Derby, puissante Reine de Man, notre très auguste sœur"—

"Speak English, sire, if I may presume to ask such a favour," said the Countess, "I am a Peeress of this nation—mother to one English Earl, and widow, alas, to another! In England I have spent my brief days of happiness, my long years of widowhood and sorrow. France and its language are but to me the dreams of an uninteresting childhood. I know no tongue save that of my husband and my son. Permit me, as the widow and mother of Derby, thus to render my homage."

She would have kneeled, but the King gracefully prevented her, and, saluting her cheek, according to the form, led her towards the Queen, and himself performed the ceremony of introduction. "Your Majesty," he said, "must be informed that the Countess has imposed a restriction on French—the language of gallantry and compliment. I trust your Majesty will, though a foreigner like herself, find enough of honest English to assure the Countess of Derby, with what pleasure we see her at Court, after the absence of so many years."

"I will endeavour to do so at least," said the Queen, on whom the appearance of the Countess of Derby made a more favourable impression than that of many strangers, whom, at the King's request she was in the habit of receiving with courtesy.

Charles himself again spoke. "To any other lady of the same rank I might put the question, why she was so long absent from the circle? I fear I can only ask the Countess of Derby, what fortunate cause produces the pleasure of seeing her here?"

"No fortunate cause, my liege, though one most strong and urgent."

The King augured nothing agreeable from this commencement; and in truth, from the Countess's first entrance, he had anticipated some unpleasant explanation, which he therefore hastened to parry, having first composed his features into an expression of sympathy and interest.

"If," said he, "the cause is of a nature in which we can render assistance, we cannot expect your ladyship should enter upon it at the present time; but a memorial addressed to our secretary, or, if it is more satisfactory, to ourselves directly, will receive our immediate, and, I trust I need not add, our favourable construction."

The Countess bowed with some state, and answered, "My business, sire, is indeed important; but so brief, that it need not for more than a few minutes withdraw your ear from what is more pleasing;—yet it is so urgent, that I am afraid to postpone it even for a moment."

"This is unusual," said Charles. "But you, Countess of Derby, are an unwonted guest, and must command my time. Does the matter require my private ear?"

"For my part," said the Countess, "the whole Court might listen; but your Majesty may prefer hearing me in the presence of one or two of your counsellors."

"Ormond," said the King, looking around, "attend us for an instant,—and do you, Arlington, do the same."

The King led the way into an adjoining cabinet, and, seating himself, requested the Countess would also take a chair. "It needs not, sire," she replied; then pausing for a moment, as if to collect her spirits, she proceeded with firmness.

"Your Majesty well said that no light cause had drawn me from my lonely habitation. I came not hither when the property of my son—that property which descended to him from a father who died for your Majesty's rights—was conjured away from him under pretext of justice, that it might first feed the avarice of the rebel Fairfax, and then supply the prodigality of his son-in-law, Buckingham."

"These are over harsh terms, lady," said the King. "A legal penalty was, as we remember, incurred by an act of irregular violence—so our courts and our laws term it, though personally I have no objection to call it, with you, an honourable revenge. But admit it were such, in prosecution of the laws of honour, bitter legal consequences are often necessarily incurred."

"I come not to argue for my son's wasted and forfeited inheritance, sire," said the Countess; "I only take credit for my patience, under that afflicting dispensation. I now come to redeem the honour of the House of Derby, more dear to me than all the treasures and lands which ever belonged to it."

"And by whom is the honour of the House of Derby impeached?" said the King; "for on my word, you bring me the first news of it."

"Has there one Narrative, as these wild fictions are termed, been printed with regard to the Popish Plot—this pretended Plot, as I will call it—in which the honour of our house has not been touched and tainted? And are there not two noble gentlemen, father and son, allies of the House of Stanley, about to be placed in jeopardy of their lives, on account of matters in which we are the parties first impeached?"

The King looked around, and smiled to Arlington and Ormond. "The Countess's courage, methinks, shames ours. What lips dared have called the immaculate Plot pretended, or the Narrative of the witnesses, our preservers from Popish knives, a wild fiction?—But, Madam," he said, "though I admire the generosity of your interference in behalf of the two Peverils, I must acquaint you, that your interference is unnecessary—they are this morning acquitted."

"Now may God be praised!" said the Countess, folding her hands. "I have scarce slept since I heard the news of their impeachment; and have arrived here to surrender myself to your Majesty's justice, or to the prejudices of the nation, in hopes, by so doing, I might at least save the lives of my noble and generous friends, enveloped in suspicion only, or chiefly, by their connexion with us.—Are they indeed acquitted?"

"They are, by my honour," said the King. "I marvel you heard it not."

"I arrived but last night, and remained in the strictest seclusion," said the Countess, "afraid to make any inquiries that might occasion discovery ere I saw your Majesty."

"And now that we have met," said the King, taking her hand kindly—"a meeting which gives me the greatest pleasure—may I recommend to you speedily to return to your royal island with as little eclat as we came hither? The world, my dear Countess, has changed since we were young. Men fought in the Civil War with good swords and muskets; but now we fight with indictments and oaths, and such like legal weapons. You are no adept in such warfare; and though I am well aware you know how to hold out a castle, I doubt much if you have the art to parry off an impeachment. This Plot has come upon us like a land storm—there is no steering the vessel in the teeth of the tempest—we must run for the nearest haven, and happy if we can reach one."

"This is cowardice, my liege," said the Countess,—"Forgive the word!—it is but a woman who speaks it. Call your noble friends around you, and make a stand like your royal father. There is but one right and one wrong—one honourable and forward course; and all others which deviate are oblique and unworthy."

"Your language, my venerated friend," said Ormond,—who saw the necessity of interfering betwixt the dignity of the actual Sovereign, and the freedom of the Countess, who was generally accustomed to receive, not to pay observance,—“your language is strong and decided, but it applies not to the times. It might occasion a renewal of the Civil War, and of all its miseries, but could hardly be attended with the effects you sanguinely anticipate."

"You are too rash, my Lady Countess," said Arlington, "not only to rush upon this danger yourself, but to desire to involve his Majesty. Let me say plainly, that in this jealous time, you have done but ill to exchange the security of Castle Rushin for the chance of a lodging in the Tower of London."

"And were I to kiss the block there," said the Countess, "as did my husband at Bolton-on-the-Moors, I would do so willingly, rather than forsake a friend!—and one, too, whom, as in the case of the younger Peveril, I have thrust upon danger."

"But have I not assured you that both of the Peverils, elder and younger, are freed from peril?" said the King; "and, my dear Countess, what can else tempt you to thrust yourself on danger, from which, doubtless, you expect to be relieved by my intervention? Methinks a lady of your judgment should not voluntarily throw herself into a river, merely that her friends might have the risk and merit of dragging her out."

The Countess reiterated her intention to claim a fair trial.—The two counsellors again pressed their advice that she should withdraw, though under the charge of absconding from justice, and remain in her own feudal kingdom.

The King, seeing no termination to the debate, gently reminded the Countess that her Majesty would be jealous if he detained her ladyship longer, and offered her his hand to conduct her back to the company. This she was under the necessity of accepting, and returned accordingly to the apartments of state, where an event occurred immediately afterwards, which must be transferred to the next chapter.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Here stand I tight and trim,
Quick of eye, though little of limb;
He who denieth the word I have spoken,
Betwixt him and me shall lances be broken.
Lay of the Little John de Salatre.

WHEN Charles had re-conducted the Countess of Derby into the presence-chamber, before he parted with her, he entreated her, in a whisper, to be governed by good counsel, and to regard her own safety; and then turned easily from her, as if to distribute his attentions equally among the other guests.

These were a good deal circumscribed at the instant by the arrival of a party of five or six musicians; one of whom, a German, under the patronage of the Duke of Buckingham, was particularly renowned for his performance on the violoncello, but had been detained in inactivity in the antechamber by the non-arrival of his instrument, which had now at length made its appearance.

The domestic who placed it before the owner, shrouded as it was within its wooden case, seemed heartily glad to be rid of his load, and lingered for a moment, as if interested in discovering what sort of instrument was to be produced that could weigh so heavily. His curiosity was satisfied, and in a most extraordinary manner; for, while the musician was fumbling with the key, the case being for his greater convenience placed upright against the wall, the case and instrument itself at once flew open, and out started the dwarf, Geoffrey Hudson,—at sight of whose unearthly appearance, thus suddenly introduced, the ladies shrieked, and ran backwards; the gentlemen started; and the poor German, on seeing the portentous delivery of his fiddle case, tumbled on the floor in an agony, supposing, it might be, that his instrument was metamorphosed into the strange figure which supplied its place. So soon, however, as he recovered, he glided out of the apartment, and was followed by most of his companions.

"Hudson!" said the King—"My little old friend, I am not sorry to see you; though Buckingham, who I suppose is the purveyor of this jest, hath served us up but a stale one."

"Will your Majesty honour me with one moment's attention?" said Hudson.

"Assuredly, my good friend," said the King. "Old acquaintances are springing up in every quarter to-night; and our leisure can hardly be better employed than in listening to them.—It was an idle trick of Buckingham," he added, in a whisper to Ormond, "to send the poor thing hither, especially as he was to-day tried for the affair of the Plot. At any rate, he comes not to ask protection from us, having had the rare fortune to come off Plot-free. He is but fishing, I suppose, for some little present or pension."

The little man, precise in Court etiquette, yet impatient of the King's delaying to attend to him, stood in the midst of the floor, most valorously pawing and prancing, like a Scots pony assuming the airs of a war-horse, waving meanwhile his little hat with the tarnished feather, and bowing from time to time, as if impatient to be heard.

"Speak on, then, my friend," said Charles; "if thou hast some poetical address penned for thee, out with it, that thou mayst have time to repose these flourishing little limbs of thine."

"No poetical speech have I, most mighty Sovereign," answered the dwarf; "but, in plain and most loyal prose, I do accuse, before this company, the once noble Duke of Buckingham of high treason!"

"Well spoken, and manfully—Get on, man," said the King, who never doubted that this was the introduction to something burlesque or witty, not conceiving that the charge was made in solemn earnest.

A great laugh took place among such courtiers as heard, and among many who did not hear, what was uttered by the dwarf; the former entertained by the extravagant emphasis and gesticulation of the little champion, and the others laughing not the less loud that they laughed for example's sake, and upon trust.

"What matter is there for all this mirth?" said he, very indignantly—"Is it fit subject for laughing, that I, Geoffrey Hudson, Knight, do, before King and nobles, impeach George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, of high treason?"

"No subject of mirth, certainly," said Charles, composing his features; "but great matter of wonder.—Come, cease this mouthing, and prancing, and mummeries. If there be a jest, come out with it, man; and if not, even get thee to the beaufet, and drink a cup of wine to refresh thee after thy close lodging."

"I tell you, my liege," said Hudson, impatiently, yet in a whisper, intended only to be audible by the King, "that if you spend over much time in trifling, you will be convinced by dire experience of Buckingham's treason. I tell you,—I asseverate to your Majesty,—two hundred armed fanatics will be here within the hour, to surprise the guards."

"Stand back, ladies," said the King, "or you may hear more than you will care to listen to. My Lord of Buckingham's jests are not always, you know, quite fitted for female ears; besides, we want a few words in private with our little friend. You, my Lord of Ormond—you, Arlington," (and he named one or two others,) "may remain with us."

The gay crowd bore back, and dispersed through the apartment—the men to conjecture what the end of this mummeries, as they supposed it, was likely to prove; and what jest, as Sedley said, the bass-fiddle had been brought to bed of—and the ladies to admire and criticise the antique dress and richly embroidered ruff and hood of the Countess of Derby, to whom the Queen was showing particular attention.

"And now, in the name of Heaven, and amongst friends," said the King to the dwarf, "what means all this?"

"Treason my lord the King!—Treason to his Majesty of England!—When I was chambered in yonder instrument, my lord, the High-Dutch fellows who bore me, carried me into a certain chapel, to see, as they said to each other, that all was ready. Sire, I went where bass-fiddle never went before, even into a conventicle of Fifth-Monarchists; and when they brought me away, the preacher was concluding his sermon, and was within a 'Now to apply' of setting off like the bell-wether at the head of his flock, to surprise your Majesty in your royal Court! I heard him through the sound-holes of my instrument, when the fellow set me down for a moment to profit by this precious doctrine."

"It would be singular," said Lord Arlington, "were there some reality at the bottom of this buffoonery; for we know these wild men have been consulting together to-day, and five conventicles have held a solemn fast."

"Nay," said the King, "if that be the case, they are certainly determined on some villany."

"Might I advise," said the Duke of Ormond, "I would summon the Duke of Buckingham to this presence. His connexions with the fanatics are well known, though he affects to conceal them."

"You would not, my lord, do his Grace the injustice to treat him as a criminal on such a charge as this?" said the King. "However," he added, after a moment's consideration, "Buckingham is accessible to every sort of temptation, from the flightiness of his genius. I should not be surprised if he nourished hopes of an aspiring kind—I think we had some proof of it but lately.—Hark ye, Chiffinch; go to him instantly, and bring him here on any fair pretext thou canst devise. I would fain save him from what lawyers call an overt act. The Court would be dull as a dead horse, were Buckingham to miscarry."

"Will not your Majesty order the Horse Guards to turn out?" said young Selby, who was present and an officer.

"No, Selby," said the King, "I like not horse-play. But let them be prepared; and let the High Bailiff collect his civil officers, and command the Sheriff to summon their worshipful attendants, from javelin-men to hangmen,* and have them in readiness, in case of any sudden tumult—double the sentinels on the doors of the palace—and see no strangers get in."

"Or out," said the Duke of Ormond. "Where are the foreign fellows who brought in the dwarf?"

They were sought for, but they were not to be found. They had retreated, leaving their instruments—a circumstance which seemed to bear hard on the Duke of Buckingham, their patron.

* It can hardly be forgotten that one of the great difficulties of Charles II.'s reign was to obtain for the crown the power of choosing the sheriffs of London. Roger North gives a lively account of his brother, Sir Dudley North, who agreed to serve for the court. "I omit the share he had in composing the tumults about burning the Pope, because that is accounted for in the Examen, and the life of the Lord Keeper North. Neither is there occasion to say any thing of the rise and discovery of the Rye Plot, for the same reason. Nor is my subject much concerned with this latter, farther than that the conspirators had taken especial care of Sir Dudley North. For he was one of those who, if they had succeeded, was to have been knocked on the head, and his skin to be stuffed, and hung up in Guildhall. But, all that apart, he reckoned it a great unhappiness, that so many trials for high treason, and executions, should happen in his year. However in these affairs, the sheriffs were passive; for all returns of panels, and other despatches of the law, were issued and done by under-officers; which was a fair screen for them. They attended at the trials and executions, to coerce the crowds, and keep order, which was enough for them to do. I have heard Sir Dudley North say, that, striking with his cane, he wondered to Hasty preparations were made to provide resistance to any effort of despair which the supposed conspirators might be driven to; and in the mean while, the King, withdrawing with Arlington, Ormond, and a few other counsellors, into the cabinet where the Countess of Derby had had her audience, resumed the examination of the little discoverer. His declaration, though singular, was quite coherent; the strain of romance intermingled with it, being in fact a part of his character, which often gained him the fate of being laughed at, when he would otherwise have been pitied, or even esteemed.

He commenced with a flourish about his sufferings for the Plot, which the impatience of Ormond would have cut short, had not the King reminded his Grace, that a top, when it is not flogged, must needs go down of itself at the end of a definite time, while the application of the whip may keep it up for hours.

Geoffrey Hudson was, therefore, allowed to exhaust himself on the subject of his prison-house, which he informed the King was not without a beam of light—an emanation of loveliness—a mortal angel—quick of step and beautiful of eye, who had more than once visited his confinement with words of cheering and comfort.

"By my faith," said the King, "they fare better in Newgate than I was aware of. Who would have thought of the little gentleman being solaced with female society in such a place?"

"I pray your Majesty," said the dwarf, after the manner of a solemn protest, "to understand nothing amiss. My devotion to this fair creature is rather like what we poor Catholics pay to the blessed saints, than mixed with any grosser quality. Indeed, she seems rather a sylphid of the Rosiernean system, than aught more carnal; being slighter, lighter, and less than the females of common life, who have something of that coarseness of make which is doubtless derived from the sinful and gigantic race of the antediluvians."

"Well, say on, man," quoth Charles. "Didst thou not discover this sylph to be a mere mortal wench after all?"

"Who?—I, my liege?—O fie!"

"Nay, little gentleman, do not be so particularly scandalized," said the King; "I promise you I suspect you of no audacity of gallantry."

"Time wears fast," said the Duke of Ormond, impatiently, and looking at his watch. "Chiffinch hath been gone ten minutes, and ten minutes will bring him back."

"True," said Charles gravely. "Come to the point, Hudson; and tell us what this female has to do with your coming hither in this extraordinary manner."

"Every thing, my lord," said little Hudson. "I saw her twice during my confinement in Newgate, and, in my thought, she is the very angel who guards my life and welfare; for, after my acquittal, as I walked towards the city with two tall gentlemen, who had been in trouble along with me, and just while we stood to our defence against a rascally mob, and just as I had taken possession of an elevated situation to have some vantage against the great odds of numbers, I heard a heavenly voice sound, as it were, from a window behind me, counselling me to take refuge in a certain house; to which measure I readily persuaded my gallant friends the Peverils, who have always shown themselves willing to be counselled by me."

re what blows his countrymen would take upon their bare heads, and never look up at it. And indeed, nothing can match the zeal of the common people to see executions. The worst grievance was the executioner coming to him for orders, touching the absconded members, and to know where to dispose of them. Once, while he was abroad, a cart, with some of them, came into the court-yard of his house, and frightened his lady almost out of her wits; and she could never be reconciled to the dog hangman's saying he came to speak with his master. These are inconveniences that attend the stations of public magistracy, and are necessary to be borne with, as magistracy itself is necessary. I have now no more to say of any incidents during the shrovetide; but that, at the year's end, he delivered up his charges to his successor in like manner as he had received them from his predecessor, and, having reinstated his family, he lived well and easy at his own house, as he did before these disturbances put him out of order."

desty," said the King. "But what chanced next? Be brief—he like thyself, man."

"For a time, sire," said the dwarf, "it seemed as if I were not the principal object of attention. First, the younger Peveril was withdrawn from us by a gentleman of venerable appearance, though somewhat smacking of a Puritan, having boots of neat's leather, and wearing his weapon without a sword-knot. When Master Julian returned, he informed us, for the first time, that we were in the power of a body of armed fanatics, who were, as the poet says, prompt for direful act. And your Majesty will remark, that both father and son were in some measure desperate, and disregarding from that moment of the assurances which I gave them that the star which I was bound to worship, would, in her own time, shine forth in signal of our safety. May it please your Majesty, in answer to my hilarious exhortations to confidence, the father did but say tush, and the son pshaw, which showed how men's prudence and manners are disturbed by affliction. Nevertheless, these two gentlemen, the Peverils, forming a strong opinion of the necessity there was to break forth, were it only to convey a knowledge of these dangerous passages to your Majesty, commenced an assault on the door of the apartment, I also assisting with the strength which Heaven hath given, and some threescore years have left me. We could not, as it unhappily proved, manage our attempt so silently, but that our guards overheard us, and, entering in numbers, separated us from each other, and compelled my companions, at point of pike and poniard, to go to some other and more distant apartment, thus separating our fair society. I was again enclosed in the now solitary chamber, and I will own that I felt a certain depression of soul. But when bale is at highest, as the poet singeth, boot is at highest, for a door of hope was suddenly opened."

"In the name of God, my liege," said the Duke of Ormond, "let this poor creature's story be translated into the language of common sense by some of the scribblers of romances about Court, and we may be able to make meaning of it."

Geoffrey Hudson looked with a frowning countenance of reproof upon the impatient old Irish nobleman, and said, with a very dignified air, "That one duke upon a poor gentleman's hand was enough at a time, and that, but for his present engagement and dependency with the Duke of Buckingham, he would have endured no such terms from the Duke of Ormond."

"Abate your valour, and diminish your choler, at our request, most puissant Sir Geoffrey Hudson," said the King; "and forgive the Duke of Ormond for my sake; but at all events go on with your story."

Geoffrey Hudson laid his hand on his bosom, and bowed in proud and dignified submission to his Sovereign; then waved his forgiveness gracefully to Ormond, accompanied with a horrible grin, which he designed for a smile of gracious forgiveness and conciliation. "Under the Duke's favour, then," he proceeded, "when I said the door of hope was opened to me, I meant a door behind the tapestry, from whence issued that fair vision—yet not so fair as lustrously dark, like the beauty of a continental night, where the cloudless azure sky shrouds us in a veil more lovely than that of day!—But I note your Majesty's impatience;—enough. I followed my beautiful guide into an apartment, where there lay, strangely intermingled, warlike arms and musical instruments. Amongst these I saw my own late place of temporary obscurity—a violoncello. To my astonishment, she turned around the instrument, and opening it behind by pressure of a spring, showed that it was filled with pistols, daggers, and ammunition made up in bandoleers. 'These,' she said, 'are this night destined to surprise the Court of the unwary Charles'—your Majesty must pardon my using her own words; 'but if thou dar'st go in their stead, thou may'st be the saviour of king and kingdom; if thou art afraid, keep a secret, I myself will try the adventure.' Now, may Heaven forbid, that Geoffrey Hudson were craven enough, said I, to let thee run such a risk! You know not—you cannot know, what belongs to such ambuscades and concealments—I am accustomed to them—have lurked in the pocket of a giant, and have formed the contents of a pasty. ‘Get in, then,’ she said, ‘and lose no time.’ Nevertheless, while I prepared to obey, I will not deny that some cold apprehensions came over my hot valour, and I confessed to her, if it might so be, I would rather find my way to the palace on my own feet. But she would not listen to me, saying hastily, ‘I would be intercepted, or refused admittance, and that I must embrace the means she offered me of introduction into the presence, and when there, tell the King to be on his guard—little more is necessary; for once the scheme is known it becomes desperate.’ Rashly and boldly, I bid adieu to the daylight which was then fading away. She withdrew the contents of the instrument destined for my concealment, and having put them behind the chimney-board, introduced me in their room. As she clasped me in, I implored her to warn the men who were to be intrusted with me, to take heed and keep the neck of the violoncello uppermost; but ere I had completed my request, I found I was left alone, and in darkness. Presently, two or three fellows entered, whom, by their language, which I in some sort understood, I perceived to be Germans, and under the influence of the Duke of Buckingham. I heard them receive from the leader a charge how they were to deport themselves, when they should assume the concealed arms—and—for I will do the Duke no wrong—I understood their orders were precise, not only to spare the person of the King, but also those of the courtiers, and to protect all who might be in the presence against an irruption of the fanatics. In other respects, they had charge to disarm the gentleman-pensioners in the guard-room, and, in fine, to obtain the command of the Court.”

The King looked disconcerted and thoughtful at this communication, and bade Lord Arlington see that Selby quietly made search into the contents of the other cases which had been brought as containing musical instruments. He then signed to the dwarf to proceed in his story, asking him again and again, and very solemnly, whether he was sure that he heard the Duke's name mentioned, as commanding or approving this action.

The dwarf proceeded to state, that he was carried after his metamorphosis into the chapel, where he heard the preacher seemingly about the close of his harangue, the tenor of which he also mentioned. Words, he said, could not express the agony which he felt when he found that his bearer, in placing the instrument in a corner, was about to invert its position, in which case, he said, human frailty might have proved too great for love, for loyalty, for true obedience, nay, for the fear of death, which was like to ensue on discovery; and he concluded, that he greatly doubted he could not have stood on his head for many minutes without screaming aloud.

“I could not have blamed you,” said the King; “placed in such a posture in the royal oak, I must needs have roared myself.—Is this all you have to tell us of this strange conspiracy?” Sir Geoffrey Hudson replied in the affirmative, and the King presently subjoined—“Go my little friend, your services shall not be forgotten. Since thou hast crept into the bowels of a fiddle for our service, we are bound, in duty and conscience, to find you a more roomy dwelling in future.”

“It was a violoncello, if your Majesty is pleased to remember,” said the little jealous man, “not a common fiddle; though, for your Majesty's service, I would have crept even into a kit.”

“Whatever of that nature could have been performed by any subject of ours, thou wouldst have enacted in our behalf—of that we hold ourselves certain. Withdraw for a little; and hark ye, for the present, beware what you say about this matter. Let your appearance be considered—do you mark me—as a frolic of the Duke of Buckingham; and not a word of conspiracy.”

“It is unnecessary,” said the King. “I remember the little wretch of old. Fortune, to make him the model of absurdity, has closed a most lofty soul within that little miserable carcass. For wielding his sword and keeping his word, he is a perfect Don Quixote in decimo-octavo. He shall be taken care of.—But, oddsfish, my lords, is not this freak of Buckingham too villanous and ungrateful?”

“He had not had the means of being so, had your Majesty,” said the Duke of Ormond, “been less lenient on other occasions.”

“My lord, my lord,” said Charles, hastily—“your lordship is Buckingham's known enemy—we will take other and more impartial counsel.—Arlington, what think you of all this?”

“May it please your Majesty,” said Arlington, “I think the thing is absolutely impossible, unless the Duke has had some quarrel with your Majesty, of which we know nothing. His Grace is very flighty, doubtless, but this seems actual insanity.”

“Why, faith,” said the King, “some words passed betwixt us this morning—his Duchess it seems is dead—and to lose no time, his Grace had cast his eyes about for means of repairing the loss, and had the assurance to ask our consent to woo my niece Lady Anne.”

“Which your Majesty of course rejected?” said the statesman.

“And not without rebuking his assurance,” added the King.

“In private, sir, or before any witness?” said the Duke of Ormond.

“Before no one, said the King,—“excepting, indeed, little Chiffinch; and he, you know, is no one.”

“Hinc illa lachryma,” said Ormond. “I know his Grace well. While the rebuke of his aspiring petulance was a matter betwixt your Majesty and him, he might have let it pass by; but a check before a fellow from whom it was likely enough to travel through the Court was a matter to be revenged.”

Here Selby came hastily from the other room, to say, that his Grace of Buckingham had just entered the presence chamber.

The King rose. “Let a boat be in readiness, with a party of the yeomen,” said he. “It may be necessary to attach him of treason, and send him to the Tower.”

“Should not a Secretary of State's warrant be prepared?” said Ormond.

“No, my Lord Duke,” said the King, sharply. “I still hope that the necessity may be avoided.”

CHAPTER XLVII.

High reaching Buckingham grows circumspect.

Richard III.

BEFORE giving the reader an account of the meeting betwixt Buckingham and his injured Sovereign, we may mention a trifling circumstance or two which took place betwixt his Grace and Chiffinch, in the short drive betwixt York-Place and Whitehall.

In the outset, the Duke endeavoured to learn from the courtier the special cause of his being summoned so hastily to the Court. Chiffinch answered, cautiously, that he believed there were some gambols going forward, at which the King desired the Duke's presence.

This did not quite satisfy Buckingham, for, conscious of his own harsh purpose, he could not but apprehend discovery. After a moment's silence, “Chiffinch,” he said, abruptly, “did you mention to any one what the King said to me this morning touching the Lady Anne?”

“My Lord Duke,” said Chiffinch, hesitating, “surely my duty to the King—my respect to your Grace.”

“You mentioned it to no one, then?” said the Duke, sternly.

“To no one,” replied Chiffinch, faintly, for he was intimidated by the Duke's increasing severity of manner.

"You lie, like a scoundrel!" said the Duke—"You told Christian!"

"Your Grace," said Chiffinch—"your Grace—your Grace ought to remember that I told you Christian's secret, that the Countess of Derby was come up."

"And you think the one point of treachery may balance for the other? But no. I must have a better atonement. Be assured I will blow your brains out, ere you leave this carriage, unless you tell me the truth of this message from Court."

As Chiffinch hesitated what reply to make, a man, who, by the blaze of the torches, then always borne, as well by the lackeys who hung behind the carriage, as by the footmen who ran by the side, might easily see who sat in the coach, approached, and sung in a deep manly voice, the burden of an old French song on the battle of Marignan, in which is imitated the German French of the defeated Swiss—

*"Tout est en l'air
La victoire,
Tout est en l'air
Bei Got."*

"I am betrayed," said the Duke, who instantly conceived that this chorus, expressing "all is lost," was sung by one of his faithful agents, as a hint to him that their machinations were discovered.

He attempted to throw himself from the carriage, but Chiffinch held him with a firm, though respectful grasp. "Do not destroy yourself, my lord," he said, in a tone of deep humility—"there are soldiers and officers of the peace around the carriage, to enforce your Grace's coming to Whitehall, and to prevent your escape. To attempt it would be to confess guilt; and I advise you strongly against that—the King is your friend—be your own."

The Duke, after a moment's consideration, said sullenly, "I believe you are right. Why should I fly, when I am guilty of nothing but sending some fireworks to entertain the Court, instead of a concert of music?"

"And the dwarf, who came so unexpectedly out of the bass-viol?"

"Was a masking device of my own, Chiffinch," said the Duke, though the circumstance was then first known to him. "Chiffinch, you will bind me for ever, if you will permit me to have a minute's conversation with Christian."

"With Christian, my lord?—Where could you find him?—You are aware we must go straight on to the Court."

"True," said the Duke, "but I think I cannot miss finding him; and you, master Chiffinch, are no officer, and have no warrant either to detain me prisoner, or prevent my speaking to whom I please."

Chiffinch replied, "My Lord Duke, your genius is so great, and your escapes so numerous, that it will be from no wish of my own if I am forced to hurt a man so skilful and so popular."

"Nay, then, there is life in it yet," said the Duke, and whistled; when, from beside the little cutler's booth, with which the reader is acquainted, appeared, suddenly, Master Christian, and was in a moment at the side of the coach. "Ganz ist verloren," said the Duke.

"I know it," said Christian; "and all our godly friends are dispersed upon the news. Lucky the Colonel and these German rascals gave a hint. All safe—You go to Court.—Hark ye I will follow."

"You, Christian? that would be more friendly than wise."

"Why, what is there against me?" said Christian. "I am innocent as the child unborn—so is your Grace. There is but one creature who can bear witness to our guilt; but I trust to bring her on the stage in our favour—besides, if I went not, I should presently be sent for."

"The familiar of whom I have heard you speak, I warrant?"

"Hark in your ear again."

"I understand," said the Duke, "and will delay Master Chiffinch,—for he, you must know, is my conductor,—no longer.—Well, Chiffinch, let them drive on.—Vogue la Galere!" he exclaimed as the carriage went onward; "I have sailed through worse perils than this yet."

"It is not for me to judge said Chiffinch; "your Grace is a bold commander; and Christian hath the cunning of the devil for a pilot; but—However, I remain your Grace's poor friend, and will heartily rejoice in your extrication."

"Give me a proof of your friendship," said the Duke. "Tell me what you know of Christian's familiar, as he calls her."

"I believe it to be the same dancing wench who came with Empson to my house on the morning that Mistress Alice made her escape from us. But you have seen her, my lord?"

"I?" said the Duke; "when did I see her?"

"She was employed by Christian, I believe, to set his niece at liberty, when he found himself obliged to gratify his fanatical brother-in-law, by restoring his child; besides being prompted by a private desire, as I think, of bantering your Grace."

"Umph! I suspected so much. I will repay it," said the Duke. "But first to get out of this dilemma.—That little Numidian witch, then, was his familiar; and she joined in the plot to tantalize me!—But here we reach Whitehall.—Now, Chiffinch, be no worse than thy word, and—now, Buckingham, be thyself!"

But ere we follow Buckingham into the presence, where he had so difficult a part to sustain, it may not be amiss to follow Christian after his brief conversation with him. On re-entering the house, which he did by a circuitous passage, leading from a distant alley, and through several courts, Christian hastened to a low matted apartment, in which Bridgenorth sat alone, reading the Bible by the light of a small brazen lamp, with the utmost serenity of countenance.

"Have you dismissed the Peverils?" said Christian, hastily.

"I have," said the Major.

"And upon what pledge—that they will not carry information against you to Whitehall?"

"They gave me their promise voluntarily, when I showed them our armed friends were dismissed. Tomorrow, I believe, it is their purpose to lodge informations."

"And why not to-night, I pray you?" said Christian.

"Because they allow us that time for escape."

"Why, then, do you not avail yourself of it? Wherefore are you here?" said Christian.

"Nay, rather, why do you not fly?" said Bridgenorth. "Of a surety, you are as deeply engaged as I."

"Brother Bridgenorth, I am the fox, who knows a hundred modes of deceiving the hounds; you are the deer, whose sole resource is in hasty flight. Therefore lose no time—begone to the country—or rather, Zedekiah Fish's vessel, the Good Hope, lies in the river, bound for Massachusetts—take the wings of the morning, and begone—she can fall down to Gravesend with the tide."

"And leave to thee, brother Christian," said Bridgenorth, "the charge of my fortune and my daughter? No, brother; my opinion of your good faith must be re-established ere I again trust thee."

"Go thy ways, then, for a suspicious fool," said Christian, suppressing his strong desire to use language more offensive; "or rather stay where thou art, and take thy chance of the gallows!"

"It is appointed to all men to die once," said Bridgenorth; "my life hath been a living death. My fairest boughs have been stripped by the axe of the forester—that which survives must, if it shall blossom, be grafted elsewhere and at a distance from my aged trunk. The sooner, then, the root feels the axe, the stroke is more welcome. I had been pleased, indeed, had I been called to bringing yonder licentious Court to a purer character, and relieving the yoke of the suffering people of God. That youth too—son to that precious woman, to whom I owe the last tie that feebly links my wearied spirit to humanity—could I have travailed with him in the good cause!—But that with all my other hopes, is broken for ever; and since I am not worthy to be an instrument in so great a work, I have little desire to abide longer in this vale of sorrow."

"Farewell, then, desponding fool!" said Christian, unable, with all his calmness, any longer to suppress his contempt for the resigned and hopeless predestinarian. "That fate should have clogged me with such confederates!" he muttered, as he left the apartment—"this bigoted fool is now nearly irreclaimable—I must to Zarah; for she, or no one, must carry us through these straits. If I can but soothe her sullen temper, and excite her vanity to action,—betwixt her address, the King's partiality for the Duke, Buckingham's matchless effrontery, and my own hand upon the helm, we may yet weather the tempest that darkens around us. But what we do must be hastily done."

In another apartment he found the person he sought—the same who visited the Duke of Buckingham's harem, and, having relieved Alice Bridgenorth from her confinement there, had occupied her place, as has been already narrated, or rather intimated. She was now much more plainly attired than when she had tantalized the Duke with her presence; but her dress had still something of the Oriental character, which corresponded with the dark complexion and quick eye of the wearer. She had the kerchief at her eyes as Christian entered the apartment, but suddenly withdrew it, and, flashing on him a glance of scorn and indignation, asked him what he meant by intruding where his company was alike unsought for and undesired.

"A proper question," said Christian, "from a slave to her master!"

"Rather say, a proper question, and of all questions the most proper, from a mistress to her slave! Know you not, that from the hour in which you discovered your ineffable baseness, you have made me mistress of your lot? While you seemed but a demon of vengeance, you commanded terror, and to good purpose; but such a foul fiend as thou hast of late shown thyself—such a very worthless, base trickster of the devil—such a sordid grovelling imp of perdition, can gain nothing but scorn from a soul like mine."

"Gallantly mouthed," said Christian, "and with good emphasis."

"Yes," answered Zarah, "I can speak—sometimes—I can also be mute; and that no one knows better than thou."

"Thou art a spoiled child, Zarah, and dost but abuse the indulgence I entertain for your freakish humour," replied Christian; "thy wits have been disturbed since ever you landed in England, and all for the sake of one who cares for thee no more than for the most worthless object who walks the streets, amongst whom he left you to engage in a brawl for one he loved better."

"It is no matter," said Zarah, obviously repressing very bitter emotion; "it signifies not that he loves another better; there is none—no, none—that ever did or can love him so well."

"I pity you, Zarah!" said Christian, with some scorn.

"I deserve your pity," she replied, "were your pity worth my accepting. Whom have I to thank for my wretchedness but you?—You bred me up in thirst of vengeance, ere I knew that good and evil were any thing better than names;—to gain your applause, and to gratify the vanity you had excited, I have for years undergone a penance, from which a thousand would have shrunk."

"A thousand, Zarah!" answered Christian; "ay, a hundred thousand, and a million to boot; the creature is not on earth, being mere mortal woman, that would have undergone the thirtieth part of thy self-denial."

"I believe it," said Zarah, drawing up her slight but elegant figure; "I believe it—I have gone through a trial that few indeed could have sustained. I have renounced the dear intercourse of my kind; compelled my tongue only to utter, like that of a spy, the knowledge which my ear had only collected as a base eaves-dropper. This I have done for years—for years—and all for the sake of your private applause—and the hope of vengeance on a woman, who, if she did ill in murdering my father, has been bitterly repaid by nourishing a serpent in her bosom, that had the tooth, but not the deafened ear, of the adder."

"Well—well—well," reiterated Christian; "and had you not your reward in my approbation—in the consciousness of your own unequalled dexterity—by which, superior to any thing of thy sex that history has ever known, you endured what woman never before endured, insolence without notice, admiration without answer, and sarcasm without reply?"

"Not without reply!" said Zarah, fiercely. "Gave not Nature to my feelings a course of expression more impressive than words? and did not those tremble at my shrieks, who would have little minded my entreaties or my complaints? And my proud lady, who sauced her charities with the taunts she thought I heard not—she was justly paid by the passing of her dearest and most secret concerns into the hands of her mortal enemy; and the vain Earl—yet he was a thing as insignificant as the plume that nodded in his cap; and the maidens and ladies who taunted me—I had, or can easily have, my revenge upon them. But there is one," she added, looking upward, "who never taunted me; one whose generous feelings could treat the poor dumb girl even as his sister; who never spoke word of her but it was to excuse or defend—and you tell me I must not love him, and that it is madness to love him!—I will be mad then, for I will love him till the latest breath of my life!"

"Think but an instant, silly girl—silly but in one respect, since in all others thou mayst brave the world of women. Think that I have proposed to thee, for the loss of this hopeless affection, a career so brilliant!—Think only that it rests with thyself to be the wife—the wedded wife—of the princely Buckingham! With my talents—with thy wit and beauty—with his passionate love of these attributes—a short space might rank you among England's Princesses.—Be but guided by me—he is now at a deadly pass—needs every assistance to retrieve his fortunes—above all, that which we alone can render him. Put yourself under my conduct, and not fate itself shall prevent your wearing a Duchess's coronet."

"A coronet of thistle-down, entwined with thistle-leaves," said Zarah.—"I know not a slighter thing than your Buckingham! I saw him at your request—saw him when, as a man, he should have shown himself generous and noble—I stood the proof at your desire, for I laugh at those dangers from which the poor blushing wailers of my sex shrink and withdraw themselves. What did I find him?—a poor wavering voluptuary—his nearest attempt to passion like the fire on a wretched stubble-field, that may singe, indeed, or smoke, but can neither warm nor devour. Christian! were his coronet at my feet this moment, I would sooner take up a crown of gilded gingerbread, than extend my hand to raise it."

"You are mad, Zarah—with all your taste and talent, you are utterly mad! But let Buckingham pass—Do you owe me nothing on this emergency!—Nothing to one who rescued you from the cruelty of your owner, the posture-master, to place you in ease and affluence?"

"Christian," she replied, "I owe you much. Had I not felt I did so, I would, as I have been often tempted to do, have denounced thee to the fierce Countess, who would have gibbeted you on her feudal walls of Castle Rushin, and bid your family seek redress from the eagles, that would long since have thatched their nest with your hair, and fed their young ospreys with your flesh."

"I am truly glad you have had so much forbearance for me," answered Christian.

"I have it, in truth and in sincerity," replied Zarah.—"Not for your benefits to me—such as they were, they were every one interested, and conferred from the most selfish considerations. I have overpaid them a thousand times by the devotion to your will, which I have displayed at the greatest personal risk. But till of late I respected your powers of mind—your inimitable command of passion—the force of intellect which I have ever seen you exercise over all others, from the bigot Bridgenorth to the debauched Buckingham—in that, indeed, I have recognised my master.

"And those powers," said Christian, "are unlimited as ever; and with thy assistance, thou shalt see the strongest meshes that the laws of civil society ever wove to limit the natural dignity of man, broke asunder like the spider's web."

She paused and answered, "While a noble motive fired thee—ay, a noble motive, though irregular—for I was born to gaze on the sun which the pale daughters of Europe shrink from—I could serve thee—I could have followed, while revenge or ambition had guided thee—but love of recallth, and by what means acquired!—What sympathy can I hold with that?—Wouldst thou not have pandered to the lust of the King, though the object was thine own orphan niece?—You smile?—Smile again when I ask you whether you meant not my own prostitution, when you charged me to remain in the house of that wretched Buckingham?—Smile at that question, and by Heaven I stab you to the heart!" And she thrust her hand into her bosom, and partly showed the hilt of a small poniard.

"And if I smile," said Christian, "it is but in scorn of so odious an accusation. Girl, I will not tell thee the reason, but there exists not on earth the living thing over whose safety and honour I would keep watch as over thine. Buckingham's wife, indeed, I wished thee; and through thy own beauty and thy wit, I doubted not to bring the match to pass."

"Vain flatterer," said Zarah, yet seeming soothed even by the flattery which she scoffed at, "you would persuade me that it was honourable love which you expected the Duke was to have offered me. How durst you urge so gross a deception, to which time, place, and circumstance, gave the lie?—How dare you now again mention it, when you well know, that at the time you mention, the Duchess was still in life?"

"In life, but on her deathbed," said Christian; "and for time, place, and circumstance, had your virtue, my Zarah, depended on these, how couldst thou have been the creature thou art? I knew thee all-sufficient to bid him defiance—else—for thou art dearer to me than thou thinkest—I had not risked thee to win the Duke of Buckingham; ay, and the kingdom of England to boot.—So now, wilt thou be ruled and go on with me?"

Zarah, or Fenella, for our readers must have been long aware of the identity of these two personages, cast down her eyes, and was silent for a long time. "Christian," she said at last, in a solemn voice, "if my ideas of right and of wrong be wild and incoherent, I owe it, first, to the wild fever which my native sun communicated to my veins; next, to my childhood, trained amidst the shifts, tricks, and feats of jugglers and mountebanks; and then, to a youth of fraud and deception, through the course thou didst prescribe me, in which, I might, indeed, hear every thing, but communicate with no one. The last cause of my wild errors, if such they are, originates, O Christian, with you alone; by whose intrigues I was placed with yonder lady, and who taught me, that to revenge my father's death, was my first great duty on earth, and that I was bound by nature to hate and injure her by whom I was fed and fostered, though as she would have fed and caressed a dog, or any other brute animal. I also think—for I will deal fairly with you—that you had not so easily detected your niece, in the child whose surprising agility was making yonder brutal mountebank's fortune; nor so readily induced him to part with his bond-slave, had you not, for your own purposes, placed me under his charge, and reserved the privilege of claiming me when you pleased. I could not, under any other tuition, have identified myself with the personage of a pute, which it has been your desire that I should perform through life."

found you capable of discharging, to an uncommon degree, a task necessary to the avenging of your father's death—I consecrated you to it, as I consecrated my own life and hopes; and you held the duty sacred, till these mad feelings towards a youth who loves your cousin"—

"Who—loves—my—cousin!" repeated Zarah, (for we will continue to call her by her real name,) slowly, and as if the words dropped unconsciously from her lips. "Well—be it so!—Man of many wiles, I will follow thy course for a little, a very little farther; but take heed—tease me not with remonstrances against the treasure of my secret thoughts—I mean my most hopeless affection to Julian Peveril—and bring me not as an assistant to any snare which you may design to cast around him. You and your Duke shall rue the hour most bitterly, in which you provoke me. You may suppose you have me in your power; but remember, the snakes of my burning climate are never so fatal as when you grasp them."

"I care not for these Peverils," said Christian—"I care not for their fate a poor straw, unless where it bears on that of the destined woman, whose hands are red in your father's blood. Believe me, I can divide her fate and theirs. I will explain to you how. And for the Duke, he may pass among men of the town for wit, and among soldiers for valour, among courtiers for manners and for form; and why, with his high rank and immense fortune, you should throw away an opportunity, which, as I could now improve it"—

"Speak not of it," said Zarah, "if thou wouldst have our truce—remember it is no peace—if, I say, thou wouldst have our truce grow to be an hour old!"

"This, then," said Christian, with a last effort to work upon the vanity of this singular being, "is she who pretended such superiority to human passion, that she could walk indifferently and unmoved thro' the halls of the prosperous, and the prison cells of the captive, unknowing and unknown—sympathizing neither with the pleasures of the one, nor the woes of the other, but advancing with sure, though silent steps, her own plans, in despite and regardless of either!"—

"My own plans?" said Zarah—"Thy plans, Christian—thy plans of extorting from the surprised prisoners, means whereby to convict them—thine own plans, formed with those more powerful than thyself, to sound men's secrets, and, by using them as matter of accusation, to keep up the great delusion of the nation."

"Such access was indeed given you as my agent," said Christian, "and for advancing a great national change. But how did you use it?—to advance your own insane passion."

"Insane!" said Zarah—"Had he been less than insane whom I addressed, he and I had ere now been far from the toils which you have pitched for us both. I had means prepared for every thing; and ere this, the shores of Britain had been lost to our sight for ever."

"The miserable dwarf, too, said Christian—"Was it worthy of you to delude that poor creature with flattering visions—lull him asleep with drugs? Was that my doing?"

"He was my destined tool," said Zarah, haughtily. "I remembered your lessons too well not to use him as such. Yet scorn him not too much. I tell you, that yon very miserable dwarf, whom I made my sport in the prison,—yon wretched abortion of nature, I would select for a husband, ere I would marry your Buckingham;—the vain and imbecile pigmy has yet the warm heart and noble feelings that a man should hold his highest honour."

"In God's name, then, take your own way," said Christian; "and, for my sake, let never man hereafter limit a woman in the use of her tongue, since he must make it amply up to her, in allowing her the privilege of her own will. Who would have thought it? But the colt has slipped the bridle, and I must needs follow, since I cannot guide her."

Our narrative returns to the Court of King Charles, at Whitehall.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

—But O!

What shall I say to thee, Lord Scroop; thou cruel, ingrateful, savage, and inhuman creature! .. Thou that didst bear the key of all my counsels, That knew'st the very bottom of my soul, That almost mightst have coin'd me into gold, Wouldst thou have practis'd on me for thy use.—Henry V.

At no period of his life, not even when that life was in imminent danger, did the constitutional gayety of Charles seem more overclouded, than when waiting for the return of Chiffinch with the Duke of Buckingham. His mind revolted at the idea, that the person to whom he had been so particularly indulgent, and whom he had selected as the friend of his lighter hours and amusements, should prove capable of having tampered with a plot apparently directed against his liberty and life. He more than once examined the dwarf anew, but could extract nothing more than his first narrative contained. The apparition of the female to him in the cell of Newgate, he described in such fanciful and romantic colours, that the King could not help thinking the poor man's head a little turned; and, as nothing was found in the kettledrum, and other musical instruments brought for the use of the Duke's band of foreigners, he nourished some slight hope that the whole plan might be either a mere jest, or that the idea of an actual conspiracy was founded in mistake.

The persons who had been despatched to watch the motions of Mr. Weiver's congregation, brought back word that they had quietly dispersed. It was known, at the same time, that they had met in arms, but this augured no particular design of aggression, at a time when all true Protestants conceived themselves in danger of immediate massacre; when the fathers of the city had repeatedly called out the Train-Bands, and alarmed the citizens of London, under the idea of an instant insurrection of the Catholics; and when, to sum the whole up, in the emphatic words of an alderman of the day, there was a general belief that they would all waken some unhappy morning with their throats cut. Who was to do these dire deeds, it was more difficult to suppose; but all admitted the possibility that they might be achieved, since one Justice of the Peace was already murdered. There was, therefore, no inference of hostile intentions against the State, to be decidedly derived from a congregation of Protestants par excellence, military from old associations, bringing their arms with them to a place of worship, in the midst of a panic so universal.

Neither did the violent language of the minister, supposing that to be proved, absolutely infer meditated violence. The favourite parables of the preachers, and the metaphors and ornaments which they selected, were at all times of a military cast; and the taking the kingdom of heaven by storm, a strong and beautiful metaphor, when used generally, as in Scripture, was detailed in their sermons in all the technical language of the attack and defence of a fortified place. The danger, in short, whatever might have been its actual degree, had disappeared as suddenly as a bubble upon the water, when broken by a casual touch, and had left as little trace behind it. It became, therefore, matter of much doubt, whether it had ever actually existed.

While various reports were making from without, and while their tenor was discussed by the King, and such nobles and statesmen as he thought proper to consult on the occasion, a gradual sadness and anxiety mingled with, and finally silenced, the mirth of the evening. All became sensible that something unusual was going forward; and the unwonted distance which Charles maintained from his guests, while it added greatly to the dulness that began to predominate in the presence-chamber, gave intimation that something unusual was labouring in the King's mind.

Thus play was neglected—the music was silent, or played without being heard—gallants ceased to make compliments, and ladies to expect them; and a sort of apprehensive curiosity pervaded the circle. Each asked the others why they were grave; and no answer was returned, any more than could have been rendered by a herd of cattle instinctively disturbed by the approach of a thunder-storm.

To add to the general apprehension, it began to be whispered, that one or two of the guests, who were desirous of leaving the palace, had been informed no one could be permitted to retire until the general hour of dismissal. And these, gliding back into the hall, communicated in whispers that the sentinels at the gates were doubled, and that there was a troop of the Horse Guards drawn up in the court—circumstances so unusual, as to excite the most anxious curiosity.

Such was the state of the Court, when wheels were heard without, and the bustle which took place denoted the arrival of some person of consequence.

"Here comes Chiffinch," said the King, "with his prey in his clutch."

It was indeed the Duke of Buckingham; nor did he approach the royal presence without emotion. On entering the court, the flambeaux which were borne around the carriage gleamed on the scarlet coats, laced hats, and drawn broadswords of the Horse Guards—a sight unusual, and calculated to strike terror into a conscience which was none of the clearest.

The Duke alighted from the carriage, and only said to the officer, whom he saw upon duty, "You are late under arms to-night, Captain Carleton."

"Such are our orders, sir," answered Carleton, with military brevity; and then commanded the four dismounted sentinels at the under gate to make way for the Duke of Buckingham. His Grace had no sooner entered, than he heard behind him the command, "Move close up, sentinels—closer yet to the gate." And he felt as if all chance of rescue were excluded by the sound.

As he advanced up the grand staircase, there were other symptoms of alarm and precaution. The Yeomen of the Guard were mustered in unusual numbers, and carried carabines instead of their halberds; and the Gentleman Pensioners, with their partisans, appeared also in proportional force. In short, all that sort of defence which the royal household possesses within itself, seemed, for some hasty and urgent reason, to have been placed under arms, and upon duty.

Buckingham ascended the royal staircase with an eye attentive to these preparations, and a step steady and slow, as if he counted each step on which he trode. "Who," he asked himself, "shall insure Christian's fidelity? Let him but stand fast, and we are secure. Otherwise"—

As he shaped the alternative, he entered the presence-chamber.

The King stood in the midst of the apartment, surrounded by the personages with whom he had been consulting. The rest of the brilliant assembly, scattered into groups, looked on at some distance. All were silent when Buckingham entered, in hopes of receiving some explanation of the mysteries of the evening. All bent forward, though etiquette forbade them to advance, to catch, if possible, something of what was about to pass betwixt the King and his intriguing statesman. At the same time, those counsellors who stood around Charles, drew back on either side, so as to permit the Duke to pay his respects to his Majesty in the usual form. He went through the ceremonial with his accustomed grace, but was received by Charles with much unwonted gravity.

"We have waited for you for some time, my Lord Duke. It is long since Chiffinch left us, to request your attendance here. I see you are elaborately dressed. Your toilette was needless on the present occasion."

"Needless to the splendour of your Majesty's Court," said the Duke, "but not needless on my part. This chanced to be Black Monday at York-Place, and my club of Pendables were in full glee when your Majesty's summons arrived. I could not be in the company of Ogle, Maniduc, Dawson, and so forth, but what I must needs make some preparation, and some ablution, ere entering the circle here."

"I trust the purification will be complete," said the King, without any tendency to the smile which always features, that, ungilded by its influence, were sh, and even severe. "We wished to ask concerning the import of a sort of musical ich you designed us here, but which miscar- e are given to understand."

ist have been a great miscarriage indeed," Duke, "since your Majesty looks so serious thought to have done your Majesty a plea- I have seen you condescend to be pleased passages,) by sending the contents of that ; but I fear the jest has been unacceptable— fire-works may have done mischief."

no mischief they were designed for, perhaps," King, gravely; "you see, my lord, we are all unsunged."

may your Majesty remain so," said the yet I see that there is something miscon- my part—it must be a matter unpardonable, little intended, since it hath displeased so a master."

ndulgent a master, indeed, Buckingham," e King; "and the fruit of my indulgence has range loyal men into traitors."

t please your Majesty, I cannot understand l the Duke.

w us, my lord," answered Charles, "and we iver to explain our meaning."

"That is but fair," said the King. "Bring our little friend from behind the chimney-board. [Hudson be- ing accordingly produced, he continued.] There stands the Duke of Buckingham. Repeat before him the tale you told us. Let him hear what were those con- tents of the bass-viol which were removed that you might enter it. Be not afraid of any one, but speak the truth boldly."

"May it please your Majesty," said Hudson, "fear is a thing unknown to me."

"His body has no room to hold such a passion; or there is too little of it to be worth fearing for," said Buckingham.—"But let him speak."

Ere Hudson had completed his tale, Buckingham interrupted him by exclaiming, "Is it possible that I can be suspected by your Majesty on the word of this pitiful variety of the baboon tribe?"

"Villain-Lord, I appeal thee to the combat!" said the little man, highly offended at the appellation thus bestowed on him.

"La you there now!" said the Duke—"The little animal is quite crazed, and defies a man who need ask no other weapon than a corking-pin to run him through the lungs, and whose single kick could hoist him from Dover to Calais without yacht or wherry. And what can you expect from an idiot, who is engoué of a common rope-dancing-girl, that capered on a packthread at Ghent in Flanders, unless they were to club their talents to set up a booth at Bartholomew-Fair?—Is it not plain, that supposing the little animal is not malicious, as indeed his whole kind bear a ge- neral and most cankered malice against those who have the ordinary proportions of humanity—Grant, I say, that this were not a malicious falsehood of his, why, what does it amount to?—That he has mistaken squibs and Chinese crackers for arms! He says not he himself touched or handled them; and judging by the sight alone, I question if the infirm old creature, when any whim or preconception hath possession of his noddle, can distinguish betwixt a blunderbuss and a black-pudding."

The horrible clamour which the dwarf made so soon as he heard this disparagement of his military skill—the haste with which he blundered out a detail of his warlike experiences—and the absurd grimaces which he made in order to enforce his story, provoked not only the risibility of Charles, but even of the statesmen around him, and added absurdity to the motley complexion of the scene. The King termi- nated this dispute, by commanding the dwarf to with- draw.

A more regular discussion of his evidence was then resumed, and Ormond was the first who pointed out, that it went farther than had been noticed, since the little man had mentioned a certain extraordinary and treasonable conversation held by the Duke's depend- ents, by whom he had been conveyed to the palace.

"I am sure not to lack my lord of Ormond's good word," said the Duke, scornfully; "but I defy him alike, and all my other enemies, and shall find it easy to show that this alleged conspiracy, if any grounds for it at all exist, is a mere sham-plot, got up to turn the odium justly attached to the Papists upon the Pro- testants. Here is a half-hanged creature, who, on the very day he escapes from the gallows, which many believe was his most deserved destiny, comes to take away the reputation of a Protestant peer—and, on what?—on the treasonable conversation of three or four German fiddlers, heard through the sound-holes of a violoncello, and that, too, when the creature was incased in it, and mounted on a man's shoulders! The urchin, too, in repeating their lan- guage, shows he understands German as little as my horse does; and if he did rightly hear, truly compre- hend, and accurately report what they said, still, is my honour to be touched by the language held by such persons as these are, with whom I have never communicated, otherwise than men of my rank do with those of their calling and capacity?—Pardon me, sire, if I presume to say, that the profound states- men who endeavoured to stifle the Popish conspiracy by the pretended Meal-tub Plot, will take little more credit by their figments about fiddles and concertos."

The assistant counsellors looked at each other; and Charles turned on his heel, and walked through the room with long steps.

At this period the Peverils, father and son, were announced to have reached the palace, and were ordered into the royal presence.

These gentlemen had received the royal mandate at a moment of great interest. After being dismissed from their confinement by the elder Bridgenorth, in the manner and upon the terms which the reader must have gathered from the conversation of the latter with Christian, they reached the lodgings of Lady Peveril, who awaited them with joy, mingled with terror and uncertainty. The news of the acquittal had reached her by the exertions of the faithful Lance Outram, but her mind had been since harassed by the long delay of their appearance, and rumours of disturbances which had taken place in Fleet-Street and in the Strand.

When the first rapturous meeting was over, Lady Peveril, with an anxious look towards her son, as if recommending caution, said she was now about to present to him the daughter of an old friend, whom he had never (there was an emphasis on the word) seen before. "This young lady," she continued, "was the only child of Colonel Mitford, in North Wales, who had sent her to remain under her guardianship for an interval, finding himself unequal to attempt the task of her education."

"Ay, ay," said Sir Geoffrey, "Dick Mitford must be old now—beyond the threescore and ten, I think. He was no chicken, though a cock of the game, when he joined the Marquis of Hertford at Nantwich with two hundred wild Welshmen.—Before George, Julian, I love that girl as if she were my own flesh and blood! Lady Peveril would never have got through this work without her; and Dick Mitford sent me a thousand pieces, too, in excellent time, when there was scarce a cross to keep the devil from dancing in our pockets, much more for these law-doings. I used it without scruple, for there is wood ready to be cut at Martindale when we get down there, and Dick Mitford knows I would have done the like for him. Strange that he should have been the only one of my friends to reflect I might want a few pieces."

Whilst Sir Geoffrey thus ran on, the meeting betwixt Alice and Julian Peveril was accomplished, without any particular notice on his side, except to say, "Kiss her, Julian—kiss her. What the devil! is that the way you learned to accost a lady at the Isle of Man, as if her lips were a red-hot horse-shoe?—And do not you be offended, my pretty one; Julian is naturally bashful, and has been bred by an old lady, but you will find him, by and by, as gallant as thou hast found me, my princess.—And now, Dame Peveril, to dinner, to dinner!—the old fox must have his belly-timber, though the hounds have been after him the whole day."

Lance, whose joyous congratulations were next to be undergone, had the consideration to cut them short, in order to provide a plain but hearty meal from the next cook's-shop, at which Julian sat like one enchanted, betwixt his mistress and his mother. He easily conceived that the last was the confidential friend to whom Bridgenorth had finally committed the charge of his daughter, and his only anxiety now was, to anticipate the confusion that was likely to arise when her real parentage was made known to his father. Wisely, however, he suffered not these anticipations to interfere with the delight of his present situation, in the course of which, many slight but delightful tokens of recognition were exchanged, without censure, under the eye of Lady Peveril, under cover of the boisterous mirth of the old Baronet, who spoke for two, ate for four, and drank wine for half-a-dozen. His progress in the latter exercise might have proceeded rather too far, had he not been interrupted by a gentleman bearing the King's orders, that he should instantly attend upon the presence at Whitehall, and bring his son along with him.

Lady Peveril was alarmed, and Alice grew pale with sympathetic anxiety; but the old Knight, who never saw more than what lay straight before him, set it down to the King's hasty anxiety to congratulate him on his escape; an interest on his Majesty's part which he considered by no means extravagant, conscious that it was reciprocal on his own side. It came upon him, indeed, with the more joyful surprise, that he had received a previous hint, ere he left the court of justice, that it would be prudent in him to go down to Martindale before presenting himself at Court,—a restriction which he supposed as repugnant to his Majesty's feelings as it was to his own.

While he consulted with Lance Outram about cleaning his buff-belt and sword-hilt, as well as time admitted, Lady Peveril had the means to give Julian more distinct information, that Alice was under her protection by her father's authority, and with his consent to their union, if it could be accomplished. She added, that it was her determination to employ the mediation of the Countess of Derby, to overcome the obstacles which might be foreseen on the part of Sir Geoffrey.

CHAPTER XLIX.

In the King's name,
Let fall your swords and daggers!—Crisle.

WHEN the father and son entered the cabinet of audience, it was easily visible that Sir Geoffrey had obeyed the summons as he would have done the trumpet's call to horse; and his dishevelled gray locks and half-arranged dress, though they showed zeal and haste, such as he would have used when Charles I. called him to attend a council of war, seemed rather indecorous in a pacific drawing-room. He paused at the door of the cabinet, but when the King called on him to advance, came hastily forward, with every feeling of his earlier and later life afloat and condensing in his memory, threw himself on his knees before the King, seized his hand, and, without even an effort to speak, wept aloud. Charles, who generally felt deeply so long as an impressive object was before his eyes, indulged for a moment the old man's rapture.—"My good Sir Geoffrey," he said, "you have had some hard measure; we owe you amends, and will find time to pay our debt."

"No suffering—no debt," said the old man; "I cared not what the rogues said of me—I knew they could never get twelve honest fellows to believe a word of their most damnable lies. I did long to beat them when they called me traitor to your Majesty—that I confess—But to have such an early opportunity of paying my duty to your Majesty, overpays it all. The villains would have persuaded me I ought not to come to Court—aha!"

The Duke of Ormond perceived that the King coloured much; for in truth it was from the Court that the private intimation had been given to Sir Geoffrey to go down to the country, without appearing at Whitehall; and he, moreover, suspected that the jolly old Knight had not risen from his dinner altogether dry-lipped, after the fatigues of a day so agitating.—"My old friend," he whispered, "you forget that your son is to be presented—permit me to have that honour."

"I crave your Grace's pardon humbly," said Sir Geoffrey, "but it is an honour I design for myself, as I apprehend no one can so utterly surrender and deliver him up to his Majesty's service as the father that begot him is entitled to do.—Julian, come forward, and kneel.—Here he is, please your Majesty—Julian Peveril—a clasp of the old block—as stout, though scarce so tall a tree, as the old trunk when at the freshest. Take him to you, sir, for a faithful servant, à rendre et à pendre, as the French say; if he fears fire or steel, axe or gallows, in your Majesty's service, I renounce him—he is no son of mine—I disown him, and he may go to the Isle of Man, the Isle of Dogs, or the Isle of Devils, for what I care."

Charles winked to Ormond, and having, with his wonted courtesy, expressed his thorough conviction that Julian would imitate the loyalty of his ancestors, and especially of his father, added, that he believed his Grace of Ormond had something to communicate which was of consequence to his service. Sir Geoffrey made his military reverence at this hint, and marched off in the rear of the Duke, who proceeded to him concerning the even's of the day.—In the mean while, having, in the first place, said that the son was not in the same genial with the father, demanded and received from him account of all the proceedings subsequent to the trial.

With the plainness and precision which the subject demanded, when treated in such a manner, Julian narrated all that had happened, down to the trial of Bridgenorth; and his Majesty was pleased with his manner, that he congratulated him on their having gained the evidence of one man of sense to these dark and mysterious events. But when Bridgenorth was brought into the scene, Julian hesitated to bestow a name; and although he mentioned the chapel had been filled with men in arms, and the language of the preacher, he added, with reserve, that notwithstanding all this, the men without coming to any extremity, and had taken place before his father and he were set at you retired quietly to your dinner in Fleet-street man," said the King, severely, "withdrawing a magistrate notice of the dangerous meeting which was held in the vicinity of our palace, and not conceal their intention of proceeding to arms?"

He blushed, and was silent. The King frowned, and sat aside to communicate with Ormond, who had the father seemed to have known nothing of the matter.

"The son, I am sorry to say," said the King, "is more unwilling to speak the truth than I have expected. We have all variety of evidence in regular investigation—a mad witness like the drunken witness like the father, and now a young man.—Young man," he continued, addressing Julian, "your behaviour is less frank than I expect in your father's son. I must know who this is with whom you held such familiar interviews. You know him, I presume?"

Julian acknowledged that he did, but, kneeling on one knee, entreated his Majesty's forgiveness for concealing his name; "he had been freed," he said, "from prison, on promising to that effect."

"As a promise, made, by your own account, without compulsion," answered the King, "and I can forgive your keeping it; it is your duty to speak—if you are afraid of Buckingham, the Duke of draw." "No reason to fear the Duke of Buckingham," said Julian; "that I had an affair with one of his men, was the man's own fault, and not mine." "Foolish!" said the King, "the light begins to dawn on me—I thought I remembered thy physiognomy. Thou art not the very fellow whom I met at the trial yonder morning?—The matter escaped me, but now I recollect thou saidst then, that the son of that jolly old three-bottle Baronet was," said Julian, "that I met your Majesty's Chiffinch's, and I am afraid had the misfortune to displease you; but"—

"More of that, young man—no more of that—collect your wits with you that beautiful creature.—Buckingham, I will hold you good for that she was the intended tenant of that house?"

"Your Majesty has rightly guessed it," said the King, "and I suspect she has put a trick upon me, by putting the dwarf in her place; for Christian Christian!" said the King, hastily—"I would bring him hither, that universal remedy. And as the wish was uttered, Christian's name was announced. "Let him attend," said the King. But hark—a thought strikes me.—Here, Peveril—yonder dancing maiden, that introduced us by the singular agility of her performance, not, by your account, a dependant on the Countess of Derby?"

"I know her such for years," answered

"Then will we call the Countess hither," said the King: "It is fit we should learn who this little fairy really is; and if she be now so absolutely at the beck of Buckingham, and this Master Christian of his—why I think it would be but charity to let her ladyship know so much, since I question if she will wish, in that case, to retain her in her service. Besides," he continued, speaking apart, "this Julian, to whom suspicion attaches in these matters from his obstinate silence, is also of the Countess' household. We will sift this matter to the bottom, and do justice to all."

The Countess of Derby, hastily summoned, entered the royal closet at one door, just as Christian and Zarah, or Fenella, were ushered in by the other. The old Knight of Martindale, who had ere this returned to the presence, was scarce controlled, even by the signs which she made, so much was he desirous of greeting his old friend; but as Ormond laid a kind restraining hand upon his arm, he was prevailed on to sit still.

The Countess, after a deep reverence to the King, acknowledged the rest of the nobility present by a slighter reverence, smiled to Julian Peveril, and looked with surprise at the unexpected apparition of Fenella. Buckingham bit his lip, for he saw the introduction of Lady Derby was likely to confuse and embroil every preparation which he had arranged for his defence; and he stole a glance at Christian, whose eye, when fixed on the Countess, assumed the deadly sharpness which sparkles in the adder's, while his cheek grew almost black under the influence of strong emotion.

"Is there any one in this presence whom your ladyship recognises," said the King graciously, "besides your old friends of Ormond and Arlington?"

"I see, my liege, two worthy friends of my husband's house," replied the Countess; "Sir Geoffrey Peveril and his son—the latter a distinguished member of my son's household."

"Any one else?" continued the King.

"An unfortunate female of my family, who disappeared from the Island of Man at the same time when Julian Peveril left it upon business of importance. She was thought to have fallen from the cliff into the sea."

"Had your ladyship any reason to suspect—pardon me," said the King, "for putting such a question—any improper intimacy between Master Peveril and this same female attendant?"

"My liege," said the Countess, colouring indignantly, "my household is of reputation."

"Nay, my lady, be not angry," said the King; "I did but ask—such things will befall in the best-regulated families."

"Not in mine, sire," said the Countess. "Besides that, in common pride and in common honesty, Julian Peveril is incapable of intriguing with an unhappy creature, removed by her misfortune almost beyond the limits of humanity."

Zarah looked at her, and compressed her lips, as if to keep in the words that would fain break from them.

"I know not how it is," said the King—"What your ladyship says may be true in the main, yet men's tastes have strange vagaries. This girl is lost in Man so soon as the youth leaves it, and is found in Saint James's Park, bouncing and dancing like a fairy, so soon as he appears in London."

"Impossible!" said the Countess; "she cannot dance."

"I believe," said the King, "she can do more feats than your ladyship either suspects or would approve of."

The Countess drew up, and was indignantly silent. The King proceeded—"No sooner is Peveril in Newgate, than, by the account of the venerable little gentleman, this merry maiden is even there also for company. Now, without inquiring how she got in, I think charitably that she had better taste than to come there on the dwarf's account.—Ah ha! I think Master Julian is touched in conscience!"

Julian did indeed start as the King spoke, for it reminded him of the midnight visit in his cell.

The King looked fixedly at him, and then proceeded—"Well, gentlemen, Peveril is carried to his trial."

and is no sooner at liberty, than we find him in the house where the Duke of Buckingham was arranging what he calls a musical mask.—Egad, I hold it next to certain, that this wench put the change on his Grace, and popt the poor dwarf into the bass-viol, reserving her own more precious hours to be spent with Master Julian Peveril.—Think you not so, Sir Christian, you, the universal referee? Is there any truth in this conjecture?”

Christian stole a glance on Zarah, and read that in her eye which embarrassed him. “He did not know,” he said; “he had indeed engaged this unrivalled performer to take the proposed part in the mask; and she was to have come forth in the midst of a shower of lambent fire, very artificially prepared with perfumes, to overcome the smell of the powder; but he knew not why—excepting that she was wilful and capricious, like all great geniuses,—she had certainly spoiled the concert by cramming in that more bulky dwarf.”

“I should like,” said the King, “to see this little maiden stand forth, and bear witness, in such manner as she can express herself, on this mysterious matter. Can any one here understand her mode of communication?”

Christian said, he knew something of it since he had become acquainted with her in London. The Countess spoke not till the King asked her, and then owned drily, that she had necessarily some habitual means of intercourse with one who had been immediately about her person for so many years.

“I should think,” said Charles, “that this same Master Julian Peveril has the more direct key to her language, after all we have heard.”

The King looked first at Peveril, who blushed like a maiden at the inference which the King’s remark implied, and then suddenly turned his eyes on the supposed mute, on whose cheek a faint colour was dying away. A moment afterwards, at a signal from the Countess, Fenella, or Zarah, stepped forward, and having knoeled down and kissed her lady’s hand, stood with her arms folded on her breast, with an humble air, as different from that which she wore in the harem of the Duke of Buckingham, as that of a Magdalen from a Judith. Yet this was the least show of her talent of versatility, for so well did she play the part of the dumb girl, that Buckingham, sharp as his discernment was, remained undecided whether the creature which stood before him could possibly be the same with her, who had, in a different dress, made such an impression on his imagination, or indeed was the imperfect creature she now represented. She had at once all that could mark the imperfection of hearing, and all that could show the wonderful address by which nature so often makes up for the deficiency. There was the lip that trembled not at any sound—the seeming insensibility to the conversation which passed around; while, on the other hand, was the quick and vivid glance, that seemed anxious to devour the meaning of those sounds, which she could gather no otherwise than by the motion of the lips.

Examined after her own fashion, Zarah confirmed the tale of Christian in all its points, and admitted that she had deranged the project laid for a mask, by placing the dwarf in her own stead; the cause of her doing so she declined to assign, and the Countess pressed her no farther.

“Every thing tends to exculpate my Lord of Buckingham,” said Charles, “from so absurd an accusation; the dwarf’s testimony is too fantastic, that of the two Peverils does not in the least affect the Duke; that of the dumb damsel completely contradicts the possibility of his guilt. Methinks, my lords, we should acquaint him that he stands acquitted of a complaint, too ridiculous to have ever been subjected to a more serious scrutiny than we have hastily made upon this occasion.”

Arlington bowed in acquiescence, but Ormond spoke plainly.—“I should suffer, sire, in the opinion of the Duke of Buckingham, brilliant as his talents are known to be, should I say that I am satisfied in my own mind on this occasion. But I subscribe to the spirit of the times; and I agree it would be highly dangerous, on such accusations as we have been able to collect, to impeach the character of a zealous Protestant like his Grace—Had he been a Catholic, under such circumstances of suspicion, the Tower had been too good a prison for him.”

Buckingham bowed to the Duke of Ormond, with a meaning which even his triumph could not disguise.—“Tu me la pagherai!” he muttered in a tone of deep and abiding resentment; but the stout old Irishman, who had long since braved his utmost wrath, cared little for this expression of his displeasure.

The King then, signing to the other nobles to pass into the public apartments, stopped Buckingham as he was about to follow them; and, when they were alone, asked with a significant tone, which brought all the blood in the Duke’s veins into his countenance, “When was it, George, that your useful friend Colonel Blood became a musician?—You are silent,” he said; “do not deny the charge, for yonder villain once seen, is remembered for ever. Down, down on your knees, George, and acknowledge that you have abused my easy temper.—Seek for no apology—none will serve your turn. I saw the man myself, among your Germans as you call them; and you know what I must needs believe from such a circumstance.”

“Believe that I have been guilty—most guilty, my liege and King,” said the Duke, conscience-struck, and kneeling down; “believe that I was misguided—that I was mad—Believe any thing but that I was capable of harming, or being accessory to harm, your person.”

“I do not believe it,” said the King; “I think of you, Villiers, as the companion of my dangers and my exile, and am so far from supposing you mean worse than you say, that I am convinced you acknowledge more than you ever meant to attempt.”

“By all that is sacred,” said the Duke, still kneeling, “had I not been involved to the extent of life and fortune with the villain Christian”—

“Nay, if you bring Christian on the stage again,” said the King, smiling, “it is time for me to withdraw. Come, Villiers, rise—I forgive thee, and only recommend one act of penance—the curse you yourself bestowed on the dog who bit you—marriage, and retirement to your country-seat.”

The Duke rose abashed, and followed the King into the circle, which Charles entered, leaning on the shoulder of his repentant peer; to whom he showed so much countenance, as led the most acute observers present, to doubt the possibility of there existing any real cause for the surmises to the Duke’s prejudice.

The Countess of Derby had in the mean while consulted with the Duke of Ormond, with the Peverils, and with her other friends; and, by their unanimous advice, though with considerable difficulty, became satisfied, that to have thus shown herself at Court, was sufficient to vindicate the honour of her house; and that it was her wisest course, after having done so, to retire to her insular dominions, without farther provoking the resentment of a powerful faction. She took farewell of the King in form, and demanded his permission to carry back with her the helpless creature who had so strangely escaped from her protection, into a world where her condition, rendered her subject to every species of misfortune.

“Will your ladyship forgive me?” said Charles. “I have studied your sex long—I am mistaken if your little maiden is not as capable of caring for herself as any of us.”

“Impossible!” said the Countess.

“Possible, and most true,” whispered the King. I will instantly convince you of the fact, though the experiment is too delicate to be made by any but your ladyship. Yonder she stands, looking as if she heard no more than the marble pillar against which she leans. Now, if Lady Derby will contrive either to place her hand near the region of the damsel’s heart, or at least on her arm, so that she can feel the sensation of the blood when the pulse increases, then do you, my Lord of Ormond, beckon Julian Peveril out of sight—I will show you in a moment that it can stir at sounds spoken.”

The Countess, much surprised, afraid of some embarrassing pleasantry on the part of Charles, yet she to suppress her curiosity, placed herself near him, as she called her little mate; and, while they stood so, contrived to place her hand on his arm.

"At this moment the King, passing near them and, as if by accident, the villain Christian has just young Peveril?"

In those evolutions of the poles, which bounded as cannon had been discharged close by the poor King, was accompanied by such a loud stream of air, as distressed, while it startled, the good-natured monarch himself. "I did but just," he said, "to walk, my pretty maiden. I only used the aid of a certain blind dandy, called Capel, to bring me to the door of my dear daughter's chamber."

"I am betrayed!" she said, with her eyes fixed on the ground—"I am betrayed!"—and it is fit that she who has been guilty in protecting treason on me, should be caught in her own snare. But no, no, my father in inquiry?—Where is Christian, who taught me to play the part of spy on this suspicious lady, until I had well nigh delivered her his bloody hands?"

"Then," said the King, "cross more sweet maiden. Let all leave the apartment who are not directly connected with these proceedings, and this Christian he again brought before us—a dastard man," he continued, addressing Christian, "but when are there you have practised, and by extraordinary means?"

"She has betrayed me, then?" said Christian—glared on to bonds and death, merely for an idle tale, which can never be successful! But know, oh," he added, addressing her sternly, "when my daughter, through thy evasions, the daughter has dared the father!"

to undertake yet glared on him with astonishment. "You said," at length she stammered forth, "I was the daughter of your slaughtered brother."

That was partly to reconcile thee to the part thou play in my damned drama of vengeance—to hide what men call the infamy of thy birth—my daughter thou art! and from the Eastern is, in which thy mother was born, you derive that to invent of passion which I laboured to train to purpose, but which, turned into another channel, became the cause of your father's destruction—daring to the Tower I suppose?"

He spoke these words with great composure, and as seemed to regard the agonies of his daughter, throwing himself at her feet, sobbed and wept bitterly.

"This must not be," said the King, moved with sympathy at this scene of misery. "If you consent, leave this country, there is a vessel in your bound for New England—Go, carry your daughter to other lands."

"I might dispute the sentence," said Christian, "and if I submit to it, it is a matter of my choice. One half hour had made me even with great women, but fortune hath cast the balance out of me. —Rah, Zarah, Pamela no more! Tell the King, who drove a small trade in cattle and horses and carried on occasionally in various other occupations but of late have been idle. He was arrested in passing a cart full of these objects of traffic. He went to his king's court in the house in question, he immediately pronounced it to be something of his own complaint and in plain words, it is to be kept, or saying again that imperfection, which he said to be the state of his complaint. Some people suppose that still in the ground which is not wonderful considering that it may frequently occur without any cause in the organs affected. But when being asked to make a discovery impermissible to so many persons but that enough, explained that after fasting the horse a few days on bread and water and then the other lightly the horse's eyes, when finding no complaint of pain, the owner of the horse, he had come to the conclusion that the horse ought to be kept."

It may be supposed the King did not speak without being fully aware of the unlimited ascendancy which he possessed over the spirit of the old Tory; for, within four weeks afterwards, the bells of Marlborough-Monstrance were ringing for the union of the families from whose estates it takes its compound name, and the beacon light of the Castle blazed high over hill and dale, and summoned all to rejoice who were within twenty miles of its gleam.

Lady of Derby, that, if the daughter of Edward Christian, the niece of her murdered victim, served her as a model, it was but for the purpose of vengeance—generally, miserably frustrated!—Then, even thy body now—thou wouldst follow yonder ungrateful stripling—thou wouldst forsake all other thoughts to gain his slightest notice; and now, thou art a forlorn outcast, ridiculed and insulted by those on whose necks you might have trusted, had you governed better, with more wisdom!—But guess, thou art still my daughter—there are other things than that which ensnare Britain."

"Stop him," said the King, "we must know by what means this madman found access to these confined in our presence."

"I refer your Majesty to your most Protestant judge, and to the most Protestant Pope, who, in order to obtain perfect knowledge of the depth of the Popish Plot, have contrived these ingenious apertures for visiting them in their cells by night or day. His Grace of Buckingham can answer your Majesty, if you are inclined to make the inquiry."

"Christian," said the Duke, "thou art the most base villain who ever breathed?"

"Of a commoner, I may," answered Christian, and led his daughter out of the presence."

"See after him, Selby," said the King; "lose not sight of him till the ship and, if he dare return to Britain, it shall be at his peril. Would to God we had as good evidence of others as dangerous! And I would also," he added, after a moment's pause, "that all our political intrigues and feverish alarms could terminate as harmlessly as now. Here is a plot without a drop of blood; and all the elements of a romance, without its conclusion. Here we have a wandering island princess, (I pray my Lady of Derby's pardon,) a dwarf, a Moorish sorcerer, an impenetrable rogan, and a repentant man of rank, and yet all ends without either hanging or marriage."

"Not altogether without the latter," said the Countess, who had an opportunity, during the evening, of much private conversation with Julian Peveril. "There is a certain Major Bridgenorth, who, since your Majesty relinquishes further inquiry into these proceedings, which he had otherwise intended to abide, designs, as we are informed, to leave England for ever. Now, this Bridgenorth, by dint of the law, hath acquired strong possession over the domains of Feveril, which he is desirous to restore to the ancient owners, with much fair land besides, conditionally, that our young Julian will receive them as the dowry of his only child and heir."

"By my faith," said the King, "she must be a disfavoured wench indeed, if Julian requires to be pressed to accept her on such far conditions."

"They love each other like lovers of the last age," said the Countess, "but the stout old Knight likes not the roundheaded alliance."

"Our royal recommendation shall put that to rights," said the King; "Sir Geoffrey Peveril, has not suffered hardship as often at our command, that we will follow our recommendation when it comes to make him amends for all his losses."

It may be supposed the King did not speak without being fully aware of the unlimited ascendancy which he possessed over the spirit of the old Tory; for, within four weeks afterwards, the bells of Marlborough-Monstrance were ringing for the union of the families from whose estates it takes its compound name, and the beacon light of the Castle blazed high over hill and dale, and summoned all to rejoice who were within twenty miles of its gleam.

It was said that very subtle wiles were used to conceal the presence committed on account of the Popish Plot, to make confidence, and that several of them were secretly put in the torture.

History of Colonel Thomas Hood. The person who was made of fighting and carrying his career the great domestic enterprise was one of those extraordinary characters, who can only exist in the blindest confusion, destruction of society and unprincipled violence which take place during civil war. The arrangement of the present volume, consisting of a long-headed digestion we cannot perhaps call upon a subject more extraordinary or interesting than the history of this enormous disaster, who explored all the depths of a great accomplished villain. As the account of tion, and, as a preliminary step, the surprising of the Castle of Dublin. The means proposed for the last purpose, which was to be the prelude to the rising, suggested the desperation of the person by whom it was contrived, and yet might probably have succeeded, from its very boldness. A declaration was drawn up by the hand of Blood himself, calling upon all persons to take arms for the liberty of the subject, and the restoration of the Solemn League and Covenant. For the surprise of the castle, it was provided, that several persons with petitions in their hands, were to wait within the walls, as if they stood to present them to the Lord Lieutenant, while about fourscore of the old daring disbanded soldiers were to remain on the outside, dressed like carpenters, smiths, shoemakers, and other ordinary mechanics. As soon as the Lord Lieutenant went in, a baker was to pass by the main guard with a large basket of white bread on his back. By making a false step, he was to throw down his burden, which might create a scramble among the soldiers, and offer the fourscore men before mentioned an opportunity of disarming them, while the others with petitions in their hands secured all within, and being once master of the castle and the Duke of Ormond's person, they were to publish their declaration. But some of the principal conspirators were apprehended about twelve hours before the time appointed for the execution of the design, in which no less than seven members of the House of Commons (for the Parliament of Ireland was then sitting) were concerned. Leckie, a minister, the brother-in-law of Blood, was, with several others, tried, condemned, and executed. Blood effected his escape, but was still so much the object of public apprehension, that a rumour having arisen during Leckie's execution, that Major Blood was at hand with a party to rescue the prisoner, every one of the guards, and the executioner himself, shifted for themselves, leaving Leckie, with the halter about his neck, standing alone under the gallows; but as no rescue appeared, the sheriff-officers returned to their duty, and the criminal was executed. Meantime Blood retired among the mountains of Ireland, where he herded alternately with fanatics and Papists, provided only they were discontented with the government. There were few persons better acquainted with the intrigues of the time than this active partisan, who was alternately Quaker, Anabaptist, or Catholic, but always a rebel, and revolutionist; he shifted from place to place, and from kingdom to kingdom; became known to the Admiral de Ruyter, and was the soul of every desperate plot.

In particular, about 1643, Mr. Blood was one of the revolutionary committee, or secret council, which continued its sittings, notwithstanding that government knew of its meetings. For their security, they had about thirty stout fellows posted around the place where they met, in the nature of a corps de garde. It fell out, that two of the members of the council, to save themselves, and perhaps for the sake of a reward, betrayed all their transactions to the ministry, which Mr. Blood soon suspected, and in a short time got to the bottom of the whole affair. He appointed those two persons to meet him at a tavern in the city, where he had his guard ready, who secured them without any noise, and carried them to a private place provided for the purpose, where he called a kind of court-martial, before whom they were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be shot two days after in the same place. When the time appointed came they were brought out, and all the necessary preparations made for putting the sentence in execution: and the new men con-

it was out of fear, or that the person was the expectation, the sentinel brought them no tidings of the prisoner or his guard, inasmuch that Mr. Blood began to think their friend so far before him, that it would be in vain to follow him. To give over an enterprise so generously undertaken, Blood's encouragement, they rode on, then success, till finding it grew towards evening, a convenient inn upon the road, in a small village near Worcester, they resolved to lie there all night. London the next morning. In that inn they in a room next the street, condoling among themselves the success of such a tedious journey, and the friend, before the conveyance came thundering up, and in with their prisoner, Captain Mason, one of that inn, as being best known to him, to get the refreshment of a dozen of drink. There Mr. Blood had a full view of his friend, and of the person with. He had bespoke a small supper while so that he had but very little time for consultation. Captain Mason's party did not intend to alight; he only gave general directions to his men to follow in whatever they saw him do. In his called for their horses, and threw down the reckoning, telling the woman of the house, that met with such good company, they were resolved Captain Mason went off first upon a sorry beast the commander of the party, and four more, tried to make an end of their liquor. Then a more single, and in a very small time after the time, Mr. Blood and one of his friends being the two that were hindmost, and soon overtook four rode some little time together, Mr. Blood, one of the two soldiers, and his friend on the left. Then, Mr. Blood laid hold of the reins of the while his friend in observation to his direction on the other hand, and having presently by word the soldiers, pulled off their bridles, and so pick their grass where they pleased. These two aware of, Mr. Blood pursued his game, intending the single trooper, but he being got to the now reduced to six, and a barber of York, that company. Mr. Blood made up, heads the whole them; of which some of the foremost, looking either drunk or mad, thought the rebuke of sufficient chastisement of such a rash presumption exercised with more contempt than fury, till, his compliments in return, he gave them to us not in jest, but in very good earnest. He was his friend that was with him in his first exploit been several rough blows dealt between the six to two, before Mr. Blood's two other friends their assistance; nay, I may safely say six to four of York, whether out of his natural propensity that his pot-valiantness had made him so as his fellow-travellers, would needs show his valour of the fray, but better had he been at a feast; for though he showed his prudence to take as he guessed by the number, yet because he was in which was often given him, not to trust him

It is to his friend's voice when he heard it, but as the thoughts of his own were so much crowded together and never held together, the Duke's previous action and resolution, which the first blow that wanted a rider and put it in for a day of his own self preservation. In this bloody conflict Mr. Blund was three times wounded, wounded by his faithful and as having committed to his own hand which the other had committed upon the walling at his first coming into the room. Being then an officer, determined and not knowing the enemy, which the previous would not give him leave to remember, he went on to fight it out on foot, of which two of the soldiers taking the advantage, seized him and drove him into a court-yard where he made a stand with a full body, his sword in one hand and his pistol in the other. One of the soldiers taking that advantage of his open body, shot him over the shoulder blade of his pistol arm, at which time he had four other pistols in his body, that he had received before, which the soldier observing, threw his discharged pistol at him with that good aim and violence, that he hit him a stunning blow just under the forehead, upon the upper part of the nose between the eyes, which for the present stunned him, that he gave himself over for a dead man, yet resolving to give his opponent a blow before he expired, such is the strange provocation and success of death, with one vigorous stroke of his sword he brought his adversary with a vengeance from his horse and laid him in a far worse condition than himself, but his horse's feet. At that time, all of anger and revenge, he was just going to make an end of the combat, by giving him the fatal stab, but that in the very act of time, Captain Maitland, having by the help of his friends, came to his assistance, where they had fought, by the death of some of the soldiers of others that opposed them, came in and bid him hold and spare the life of one that had been the victor, and then upon the road a fortunate piece of advice in the end of grace, which Mr. Blund was very much indebted to by the next assistance of the Captain, the other soldier was more mastered and the victory after a sharp fight, that lasted above two hours, was at length completed. The way he went the fight was well maintained on both sides, while two of the soldiers besides the barber were slain upon the place, three wounded, and the rest dispersed. And it was observable, that though the encounter happened in a village, there was a great number of people were spectators of the combat, all were would adventure the course of either party, as not knowing which was to the wrong or which in the right, and were therefore wary of being arbitrators in such a desperate contest, where they saw the reward of assistance to be nothing but present death. After the combat was over, Mr. Blund and his friends divided themselves and parted several ways.

Before he had engaged in this adventure, Blund had placed his wife and son in an apothecary's shop at Rufford under the name of Weston. He himself afterwards offered in practice as apothecary, under that of Aylmer, under which name he remained concealed until his wounds were cured, and the how and city again, and his accomplices were somewhat altered.

In the mean time this extraordinary man, whose spirit looked to beaming the most daring enterprise, had devised a plot, which he considered the person at whom it was aimed was of a most more malicious character than that for the delivery of Blund. It had for its object the murder of the person of the Duke of Tyrone, his secret enemy in the streets of London. In this same he thought he only meant to gratify his revenge, while others suppose that he might hope to extend some important advantage by detaining his horse in his hands as a promise. The Duke's historian, Charles gives the following account of this extraordinary enterprise. The Prince of Wales came this year 1579 into England and being invited on the 6th to an entertainment in the city of London, his Grace attended him thither. As he was returning homeward in a dark night and going up Mr. James's Street at the end of which being the palace of the London House, where he then lived, he was attacked by Blund and five of his accomplices. The Duke always used to go attended with six footmen, but as they were too heavy a load to ride upon a coach, he always had iron chains behind it to keep them from getting up, and continued the practice to his dying day, even after this attempt of assassination. Three or four men used to walk on both sides of the coach, one against the coach, but by some crafty rascal or other, they were all stopped and cut off the way, so that the Duke was taken out of his coach by Blund and his men, and mounted on a horse behind one of the horses in his company. The Duke's horse drove on to the London House and told the porter that the Duke had been seized by two men who had carried him down Firkindly. The porter immediately ran that way and Mr. James's Street, running to be at that time in the court of the house, followed with all possible haste, having first ordered the family and ordered the servants to come after him as fast as they could. Blund it seems, that to gratify the desire of his patron, who had set him upon this work, or to glut his own revenge by reviving a grace to the same ignominious death, which his accomplices at the treasonable design upon Blund, had suffered had taken a strong fancy into his head to hang the Duke at Tyburn. Nothing could have saved the Duke's life, but that extravagant imagination and passion of the villain who leaving the Duke mounted and trussed to one of his comrades rode on before and as he went, actually led a rope to the gallows and then rode back to see what was become of his accomplices, when he met riding off in a great way. The horseman in whom the Duke was tied was a man of great strength, but being embarrassed by his Grace's hanging, could not advance as fast as he desired. He was however, got a good way beyond Berkeley, now Devonshire, when some night-riders, when the Duke having got his horse under the moon, unharnessed him, and they both fell down under the wall where they were struggling, when the Duke and Mr. Clarke came up. The villain then descended the wall, and seeing the night-riders, and some of the neighbourhood, and seeing some standing towards them, got on horseback, and galloped with one of his comrades, saved their pistols at the Duke, first aimed him, as taking their aim in the dark and in a hurry, rode off as fast as they could to save themselves. The Duke now sixty years of age, was quite spent with struggling, so that when Mr. Clarke and the porter came up, they knew him rather by feeling his star than by any sound of voice he could utter, and they were forced to carry him home, and lay him on a bed to recover his spirits. He received some wounds and bruises in the struggle, which confined him within doors for some days. The King, when he heard of this intended assassination of the Duke of Tyrone, expressed a great resentment on that occasion, and issued out a proclamation for the discovery and apprehension of the subjects concerned in the attempt.

Blund however, lay concealed, and with his usual voracious, escaped apprehension. While thus lurking he entertained and digested an exploit, striking the same strictly which had characterized the undertakings he had formerly been engaged in, there was also to be traced in his new device something of that peculiar disposition which inclined him to be desirous of adding to the murder of the Duke of Tyrone, the singular industry of putting him to death at Tyburn. With something of the same spirit he was resolved to show his contempt of mortality, and all its terrors, by stealing the crown sceptre and other articles of the regalia out of the office in which they were deposited, and enriching himself and his party's associates with the proceeds of the spoils. This feat by which Blund is now chiefly remembered, is like all his transactions marked with a daring strain of courage and duplicity, and the most of his undertakings were very likely to have proved successful. John Bayly, Esq. in his History and Antiquities of the Tower of London, gives the following distinct account of this curious exploit. At this period Sir Robert Talbot was Keeper as it was called, of the Jewel House.

It was soon after the appointment of Sir Gilbert Talbot, that the Regalia in the Tower first became objects of public inspection, which King Charles allowed in recompense of the reduction in the maintenance of the master's office. The public which arose from showing the jewels to strangers, Sir Gilbert assigned a sum of a salary to a person whom he had appointed to the care of them. This was an old confidential servant of his father's, one Talbot Edwards, whose name is handed down in history as keeper of the regalia, when the attempt was made to steal the crown was made in the year 1579, the following account of which is chiefly derived from a relation which Mr. Edwards himself made of the transaction.

About three weeks before the sad attempt, Blund made his attempt, upon the crown he came in the Tower in the habit of a person with a long cloak, cap and canonical girdle, accompanied by a woman whom he called his wife. They desired to see the regalia and just as their wishes had been granted, the lady feigned sudden indisposition, she called forth the two officers of Mrs. Edwards, the keeper's wife, who, having previously invited her into their house to repose herself, she soon recovered and on their departure professed themselves thankful for their civility. A few days after Blund came again bringing a present in Mrs. Edwards of four pieces of white gloves from his pretended wife, and having thus begun the acquaintance, they made frequent visits to improve it. After a short time, to their satisfaction, he begged and refused returned again, and in conversation with Mrs. Edwards said that his wife could dispose of nothing but the business of these good people in the Tower, that she had long studied and at length bestowed herself of a handsome way of requital. You have quoth he a pretty young gentleman for a son or daughter, and I have a young nephew who has two or three hundred a year in land and is at my disposal. If your daughter be free, and you approve of it, I'll bring him here to see her, and we will endeavour to make it a match. This was easily consented to by old Mr. Edwards, who invited the person to dine with him on that day, he readily accepted the invitation, and taking upon him to my grace performed it with great seeming devotion, and casting up his eyes, concluded it with a prayer for the King, Queen and royal family. After dinner he went up to see the regalia, and observing a handsome row of pistols hanging there, expressed a great desire to buy them to present to a young lord, who was his nephew, a preference which he thought of detaching the house against the period intended for the execution of his design. At his departure, which was a canonical benediction of the good company, he appointed a day and hour to bring his young nephew to see his mistress, which was the very day that he made his daring attempt. The good old gentleman had got up ready to receive his guest, and the daughter was in her best dress to entertain her expected lover, when behold, Parsons Blund with three more came to the great hall, all armed with rapier blades in their hands, and every one a dagger, and a brace of pocket pistols. Two of his companions entered with him, on pretence of seeing the regalia, and the third stood at the door as if to look after the young lady, a piece of a more charming description, but in reality as a watch. The daughter, who thought it not modest to come down in the way called went the maid to take a view of the company and bring a short piece of her girdle, and the servant came saying that he was the intended benefactor who stood at the door being the youngest of the party returned to smooth the history of her young mistress with the idea she had formed of his person. Blund told Mr. Edwards that they would not go up stairs till his wife came and desired him to show his nephew the crown to see the time till then, and they had all so far entered the room, and the door as usual, that than a clank was thrown over the old man's head, and a gag put in his mouth. Time passed they told him that their resolution was to have the crown taken, and say, or had if he would quietly submit to it, they would spare his life, otherwise he was to expect no mercy. He thereupon endeavoured to make all the noise he possibly could, to be heard above, they then knuckled him down with a wooden mallet, and told him, that, if not he would be quietly, they would him was now becoming ancient, and had even rition, something an overstrained and fantastic as pondered it peculiarly the object of ridicule, four old fashions, it began to fall out of usage, and the weapons of military could be employed against it, with- out exciting the disgust and horror with which they would have been rejected at an early period, as a species of blasphemy. In the fourteenth century a tribe of scoffers had arisen, who pre- tended to supply what was natural & useful in chivalry by other resources and threw ridicule upon the extravagant and exclu- sive principles of honour and virtue which were openly treated as absurd because, in fact they were cast in a mould of per- fection too lofty for the practice of fallible beings. If an ingenu- ous and high spirited youth proposed to frame himself on his father's prime idea of honour he was vulgarly derided as if he had brought to the field the good old knight's Dermidarte or two- handed sword, ridiculous from its antique make and shape, although its blade might be the Eden's temper, and its orna- ments of pure gold.

In like manner the principles of chivalry were cast aside, and their aid supplanted by baser stimulants. Instead of the high spirit which pressed every man forward in the defence of his country Louis XI substituted the extortions of the ever ready mercenary soldier and persuaded his subjects, among whom the mercenary class began to make a figure that it was better to leave to mercenaries the risks and labours of war and to supply the Crown with the means of paying them than to peril themselves in defence of their own substance. The merchants were easily persuaded by this reasoning. The hour did not yet arrive, in the days of Louis XI, when the landed gentry and nobles could be in like manner excluded from the ranks of war; but the wily monarch commenced that system which, acted upon by his successors at length, threw the whole military de- fence of the state into the hands of the Crown.

He was equally forward in altering the principles which were wont to regulate the intercourse of the sexes. The doctrine of chivalry had established in theory at least, a system in which Beauty was the governing and remunerating divinity. Valour her slave who caught his courage from her eye and gave his life for her slightest service. It is true, the system here, as in other branches was stretched to fantastic extravagance, and cases of scandal not unfrequently arose. Still they were gene- rally such as those mentioned by Burke, where frailty was de- prived of half its guilt, by being purified from all its grossness. In Louis XIth's practice it was far otherwise. He was a low voluptuary seeking pleasure without ornament and despising the set from whom he desired to obtain it. His mistresses were of inferior rank as little to be compared with the elevated though faulty character of Agnes Morel as Louis was to his heroic father who freed France from the threatened yoke of England. In like manner by selecting his favourites and minis- ters from among the dregs of the people, Louis showed the slight regard which he paid to eminent station and high birth, and although this might be not only excusable but meritorious, when the monarch's flat promoted obscure talent or called forth modest worth it was very different when the King made his favourite associates of such men as Tristan l'Hermite, the Chief of his Marshals or police and it was evident that such a prince could no longer be as his descendant Francis elegantly designed himself, "the first gentleman in his domi- nions."

Nor were Louis's sayings and actions in private or public, of a kind which could redeem such gross offences against the char- acter of a man of honour. His word, generally accounted the most sacred test of a man's character, and the least impossi- bility of which is a capital offence by the code of honour was forfeited without scruple on the slightest occasion, and often accompanied by the perpetration of the most enormous crimes. If he broke his own personal and pledged faith, he did not treat that of the public with more ceremony. His sending an inferior person disguised as a herald to Edward IV, was in those days when heralds were esteemed the sacred deposita- ries of public and national faith a daring imposition of which few save the unscrupulous prince would have been guilty.

In short, the manners sentiments and actions of Louis XI, were such as were inconsistent with the principles of chivalry and his caustic wit was sufficiently disposed to ridicule a sys- tem adopted on what he considered as the most absurd of all bases since it was founded on the principle of devoting toil, talents and time to the accomplishment of objects from which no personal advantage could in the nature of things be obtained.

It is more than probable that in thus renouncing almost open- ly the use of religion honour and morality by which mankind at large felt themselves influenced Louis sought to obtain great advantages in his negotiations with parties who might esteem themselves free bound while he himself enjoyed liberty. He started from the gun he might suppose like the racer who has got rid of the weight is with which his competitors are still encumbered, and expects to succeed of course. But Providence seems al- ways to unite the existence of peculiar danger with some cir- cumstance which may put those exposed to the peril upon their guard. The constant suspicion attached to any public person who becomes badly emitted for breach of faith, is to him what the rattle is to the poisonous serpent and men come at last to calculate, not so much on what their antagonist says, as upon that which he is like to do. A degree of mistrust which tends to counteract the intrigues of such a faithless char- acter, more than his freedom from the scruples of common-

Even himself, and to make his work will furnished two violators.

It was not the latest singular circumstance of this course of imposture, that bodily health and terrestrial felicity seemed to be his only objects. Making any mention of his sins when talking on the state of his health, was strictly prohibited; and when at his command a priest recited a prayer to Saint Eutropius, in which he recommended the King's welfare both in body and soul, Louis raised the two last words to be omitted, saying it was not prudent to importune the blessed saint by too many requests at once. Perhaps he thought by being silent on his crimes, he might suffer them to pass out of the recollection of the celestial patrons whose aid he invoked for his body.

So great were the well merited tortures of this tyrant's death-bed, that Philip des Comines enters into a regular comparison between them and the numerous cruelties inflicted on others by his order and, considering both, comes to express an opinion, that the worldly pangs and agony suffered by Louis were such as might compensate the crimes he had committed and that, after a reasonable quarantine in purgatory, he might in mercy be found duly qualified for the superior regions.

Facion also has left his testimony against this prince, whose mode of living and governing he has described in the following remarkable passage:

"Pygmalion, tourmenté par une soif insatiable des richesses, se rend de plus en plus misérable et odieux à son sujet. C'est un crime à Tyr que d'avoir de grands biens ; l'évarice le rend débauché, soupçonneux, cruel ; il persécute les riches, et il craint les pauvres.

"C'est un crime encore plus grand à Txy d'avoir de la vertu que Pygmalion suppose que les bons ne peuvent souffrir ses in justices et ses infamies, la vertu le condamne, il s'agit et s'agit contre elle. Tout l'agite, l'inquète, le rongé, il a peur de son ombre, il ne dort ni nuit ni jour, les Dieux, pour le con fondre, l'accablent de trésors dont il n'ose jouir. Ce qu'il cherche pour être heureux est précisément ce qui l'empêche de l'être. Il regrette tout ce qu'il donne, et craint toujours de perdre, il se tourmente pour ennuier

"On ne le voit presque jamais ; il est seul, triste, abattu, au fond de son palais. Ses ans mêmes n'ontent ni aborder, de peur de lui devenir suspects. Une garde terrible tient toujours des épées nues et des piques levées autour de sa maison. Trente chambres qui communiquent les unes aux autres, et dont chacune a une porte de fer avec six gros verrous, sont le lieu où il se renferme, on ne sait jamais dans laquelle de ces chambres il couche, et on assure qu'il ne couche jamais deux nuits de suite dans la même, de peur d'y être égaré. Il ne console ni les deux pleurs, ni l'amitié encore plus douce. Si on lui parle de chercher la joie, il sent qu'elle fuit loin de lui, et qu'elle refuse d'entrer dans son cœur. Ses yeux creux sont pleins d'un feu épris et farouche s'il sent dans une chose errant de tous côtés il prête l'oreille au moindre bruit, et au sent tout ému, il est pâle, désolé, et les noirs soupirs sont peints sur son visage toujours ridé. Amidst so great an abundance of materials, select such as should be most intelligible and reader, and the author had to regret that the liberal use of the power of departing from the real felt by no means confident of having brought a pleasing compact, and sufficiently intelligible, mapping of the plot is that which all who read the feudal system can easily understand, though absolutely fictitious. The right of a feudal superior more universally acknowledged than is to interfere in the marriage of a female vassal. It exists as a contradiction; both of the city, and to declare that marriage shall be free while the royal jurisprudence in case of a fief passing to a vassal grants an interest in the superior of the fief to his companion in marriage. This is according to principle that the superior was, by his own grant of the fief and is still interested that the vassal shall place no one there who may be a bad lord. On the other hand, it might be said that this right of dictating to the vassal to the choice of a husband, is only competent to whom the fief is originally derived. There is least improbability in a vassal of Burgundy by the King of France, to whom the fief himself was vassal, nor is it a great stretch to affirm, that Louis, unscrupulous as he was, at the design of betraying the fugitive into some snare prove inconvenient, if not dangerous, to German and vassal of Burgundy.

I may add, that the romance of QUENTIN acquired a popularity at home more extensive than any of its predecessors, found also unusual success where the historical allusions awakened no

Thus while I drink my gin and water my bow is to of his usual but diminished while I drink my gin and water, my members of part hang on my new lands—while my revenue is to be increased in the shop, the mighty arms hang on the floor in the shop, a good friend in the village. sign substitutes which empire and love of change had rendered fashionable. I cannot but confess with shame, that my home-bred stomach longs for the genuine stock, after the fashion of Duff's, but from the griddle, brown without, and scarlet when the knife is applied and that all the delicacies of Vary's art, with his thousand various orthographies of Stitch de Mince, do not supply the vacancy. Then my mother's man cannot learn to delight in thin potatoes, and in those days when mail was bad for nothing, I am convinced that a double strand of John Barleycorn must have converted the poor domestic creature, small beer "into a liquor twenty times more generous than the acid substantiated tipple, which have borne the honoured name of wine, though, in substance and quality, much similar to poor three water. Their higher wine, indeed, are well enough—there is nothing to except against in their Chateau Margot, or Shillery yet I cannot but remember the generous qualities of my much old Operta. May down to the garden and his paddie though they are both among animals, and play ten thousand monkey tricks which are diverting enough, yet there was more sound humour in the wish with which our village Parkwood used to communicate the news of the marriage, than all Antoine's gambols could have expressed in a week, and more of human and dog like sympathy in the wag of old Trusty's tail, than if his rival, Tontin, had stood on his hind-legs for a level month.

These signs of repentance come perhaps a little late, and I am that I must be entirely candid with my dear friend the Public, that they have been somewhat nurtured by the power of my more than to the general Popish faith by a certain whirling point in our neighbourhood, and the marriage of my aunt Dorothy to a dragoon captain of horse, a colonial member of the Legion of Honour and who would, he asserts as have been a Field Marshal by this time, had our old friend Bonaparte continued to live and to triumph. For the matter of history I must own her head had been on thirty turned at Edinburgh with five years a night, that though I somewhat disapproved the means and end of her conversion, I was at the same time glad to see that she took a serious thought of her kind, for as there was little loss in the matter for the "country" took her off my hands for a very reasonable pension. But aunt Dorothy's marriage on earth was a very different matter from Christian's oriental expedition. In the first place, there were two thousand three hundred and ten to my family as if the marriage had been drawn over the nation's step—for when the house could have thought aunt Dorothy would have married! Above all, who would have thought a woman of fifty years experience would have married a French aristocrat, his best branch of robe corresponding with the upper branch, as I saw just of a few extended companions had been placed perpetually upon the top of another while the space on which the hinges revolved quite sufficed to represent the body. All he said was another jetane and calico trousers. He might have recommended a pair of real (coats in 1814 for half the wealth which she surrendered to the military warren. Now ever there is no more to be said upon the matter especially as she had a new length of quoting Rousseau for treatment and so let that pass.

Having thus expostulated my bile against a land which is notwithstanding a very pretty land and which I cannot blame because I bought it, and it did just suit me I come to the more immediate purpose of this introduction and which my dear old Public, if I do not reckon too much on the rectitude of your favour, (though, to say truth, consistency and uniformity of their are scarce to be reckoned upon by those who count your good graces) may perhaps go far to make me amends for the loss and damage I have sustained by bringing aunt Dorothy to the country of thick driven clouds and low dark mistletoe, badness lambs, (I assure you the place is as my friend Lord L— said, a complete ghost for all legs and wings) and fine sentiments. If she had taken from the half-pay list a resting Highlandman, or a dashing son of Erin I should never have mentioned the subject, but as the affair has happened it is almost possible not to meet such a gratuitous plundering of our own land for hours and centuries. But he treated my dark spirit, and let us settle our dear Public to a more pleasing theme to us a more interesting one to others.

By dint of drinking and ill, as above mentioned, and making a race in which I am no novice, my Public are to be informed that I gradually slipped and smothered myself into a certain degree of acquaintance with an homme connu if not one of the few few old specimens of nobility who are still to be found in France—who, like exalted status of an antiquated and almost worthless, still command a certain portion of awe and veneration in the eyes even of those by whom another one or other are violently reduced.

On visiting the coffee house of the village, I was, at first, struck with the singular dignity and gravity of this gentleman's manner, his absolute attachment to shoes and stockings, up to the top of half boots and pantaloons, the croix de Saint Louis at his button hole and a small white cockade in the loop of his old-fashioned waistcoat. There was something interesting in his whole appearance, and broader, his gravity among the lively group around him, seemed, like the shade of a tree in the glare of a setting landscape, more interesting from its rarity. I made such advances towards acquaintance as the circum-

For there, to be the truest selection of what the differences in growth and maturity among the plants are, one can use plants growing in nature. The varied characters of a large range, produced by nature, at the mouth of a river, where a flood of water, unobstructed, flows, is almost as if it had washed on of some common soil.

one of walnut-tree, curiously carved, and brought to me by time, neatly resembling that of a ripe chestnut, of common deal, employed to repair and supply the vacancies occasioned by violence and devastation. On these were deposited the wrecks, or rather the precious remnant of a splendid library.

My father had been a man of information, and his name was famous, even in the Court of Louis XIV., where he was in some degree considered as the fashion, for the time, and liberal in the indulgence of their taste, had added to a curious old Gothic library, which had come from their ancestors, that there were few collections which could be compared to that of Hautlieu. It had, however, been dispersed, in consequence of an ill-judged sale, the present Marquis, in 1790, to defend his Chateau from the revolutionary mob. Luckily, the Curé, who, by his calm and moderate conduct, and his evangelical virtues, much interest among the neighbouring peasantry, was able to buy, for the petty sum of a few guineas, at the vulgar rate of a glass of brandy, volumes which had cost large sums, but which were carried off by the ruffians who pillaged the Castle. He hurriedly purchased as many of the books as his funds could reach, and to his care it was owing that they were rescued from the fire in which I found them. It was no wonder, that the good Curé had some pride and pleasure in his collection to strangers.

as Dr. Ferriar feelingly sings—curious and richly painted missals, manuscripts of 1380, 1385, and even earlier, and works in Gothic type, printed in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. But of these I intend to give a more detailed account, should the Marquis grant his permission.

In the meantime, it is sufficient to say, that, delighted with the day I had spent at Hautlieu, I frequently repeated my visit, and that the key of the octangular tower was always at my command. In those hours I became deeply enamoured of a part of French history which, although most important to that of Europe at large, and illustrated by an inimitable old historian, I had never sufficiently studied. At the same time, to gratify the feelings of my excellent host, I occupied myself occasionally with some family memorials, which had fortunately been preserved, and which contained some curious particulars respecting the connexion with Scotland, which first found me favour in the eyes of the Marquis de Hautlieu.

I pondered on these things, more so, until my return to Britain, to beef and sea-coal fires, a change of residence which took place since I drew up these Gallic reminiscences. At length, the result of my meditations took the form of which my readers, if not startled by this preface, will presently be enabled to judge. Should the Public receive it with favour, I shall not regret having been for a short time an Abbe.

THE CONTRAST

Look here upon this picture, and on this,
The counterpart of two brothers.—Shakespeare

A latter part of the fifteenth century prepared a of future events, that ended by raising France at state of formidable power which has ever been, from time to time, the principal object of eye to the other European nations. Before that she had to struggle for her very existence with English, already possessed of her fairest provinces, the utmost exertions of her King, and the galy of her people, could scarcely protect her rethe from a foreign yoke. Not so with other na-on. The princes who possessed the great fief-prouce, and, in particular the Duke of Burly and Bretagne, had come to view their border-as liberty that they had no scruple in lifting standard against their lords and sovereign. The King of France, on the slightest pretext, when one, they regarded as absolute power, and their own time, and the House of Burgundy possessed of down as called together with the fairest and on part of Flanders, was itself so wealthy, and wealthy, as to yield nothing to the crown, either climber in its strength.

Members of the grand feudatories, each dissemied of the crown assumed so much independence in defiance from the sovereign power, the extent of the strength of his chosen, enabled him in fact, and those petty tyrants, no longer acto the spirit of the law, perpetrated with im-unity the wildest excesses of fantastic oppression locally. In Auvergne alone, a report was made that they have banished of these independent to, to whom murder, murder and rapine, were and ordinary and familiar crimes.

And thus, every springing out of the village knights of Flanders and Brabant, and the Chappars and Flays.

every court displayed, invited to France every valiant adventurer, and it was seldom that, when and headlong spirit of enterprise, in actions for which his happier native country afforded no free stage.

At this period, and as if to save this fair realm from the various wars with which it was menaced, the tutoring throne was ascended by Louis XI., whose character evil as it was in itself, not, embodied, and in a great degree neutralized, the mischief of the time—so persons of opposing qualities are met, in adverse books of medicine, to have the power of counteracting each other.

There enough for every useful and political purpose, Louis had not a spark of that romantic valor, or of the pride generally associated with it, which fought on for the point of honour when the point of utility had been long gained. Calm, crafty and profoundly astute to his own interest, he made every sacrifice, both of pride and passion, which could interfere with it. He was careful in disguising his real sentiments and purposes from all who approached him, and frequently used the expressions, "that the king knew not how to reign, who knew not how to dissimulate, and that, for himself, if he thought his very cap knew his secrets, he would throw it into the fire." No man of his own, or of any other time, better understood how to avail himself of the freedom of others, and when to avoid giving any advantage by the untimely indulgence of his own.

He was by nature vindictive and cruel, even to the extent of finding pleasure in the frequent executions which he commanded. But, as no touch of mercy ever induced him to spare, when he could with safety condemn, so no contempt of vengeance ever stimulated him to a premature violence. He seldom sprung on his prey till it was fairly within his grasp, and till all hope of escape was vain, and his movements were so studiously disguised, that his enemies were generally what first announced to the world the object he had been manœuvring to attain.

In like manner, the aversion of Louis gave way to apparent profusion, when it was necessary to bribe the favorites or ministers of a rival prince for averting any impending attack, or to break up any alliance considered against him. He was fond of beauty and pleasure, but neither beauty nor the chase, though both were ruling passions, ever withdrew him from the most regular attendance to public business and the affairs of his kingdom. His knowledge of mankind was profound, and he had sought it in the private walks of life, in which he often personally engaged, and though naturally proud and haughty, he humiliated not, with an attention to the arbitrary divisions of society which was then thought something particularly unusual, to raise from the lowest rank men whom he employed on the most important occasion, and knew as well how to choose them, that he was rarely disappointed in their qualities.

Yet there were contradictions in the character of this artful and able monarch, for human nature is rarely uniform. Himself the most false and untruthful of mankind, some of the greatest errors of his life arose from too rash a confidence in the honour and integrity of others. When these errors took place, they seem to have arisen from an over refined system of policy, which induced Louis to assume the appearance of unobtrusive confidence in those whom it was his object to overreach, for, in his general conduct, he was as jealous and suspicious as any tyrant who ever breathed.

Two other points may be noticed to complete the sketch of this formidable character, by which he rose among the rude chivalrous sovereigns of the period to the rank of a leader among wild beasts, who, by superior wisdom and policy, by distribution of food, and some discipline by blows, came finally to pre-was yet another circumstance which increased the intimacy of Louis towards his overgrown hotheaded favourite which he never meant to, and was under the frequent necessity of doing with him, and even of enduring bursts of insolence, injurious to the royal dignity, being able to treat him otherwise than as his own of Burgundy."

It is about the year 1488, when their feuds were at their height, though a dubious and hollow truce, as it happened, existed for the time between the present narrative opens. The person introduced on the stage will be found indeed to ask and condone the illustration of whose it scarcely called for a dissertation on the relations of two great princes; but the passions, and their quarrels, and their reconciliations, the fortunes of all who approach them; and, found, on proceeding farther in our story, a preliminary Chapter is necessary for continuing the history of the individual whose adventures we are about to relate.

CHAPTER II.

THE WANDERER.

"The world is my arena, which I will sweep out—
—JAMES FENNELL."

It was upon a delicious summer morning, before had assumed its smothering power, and while the sun yet cooled and perfumed the air, that a coming from the north-eastward, approached of a small river, or rather a large brook, the Cher, near to the royal Castle of Pithou, whose dark and multiplied battlements lay back-ground over the extensive forest with they were surrounded. These woodlands of a noble chase, or royal park, fenced by an ivy, turned, in the Latin of the middle ages, in, which gives the name of Pithou to so many in France. The castle and village of it so particularly speak, was called Pithou-lez, to distinguish it from others, and was built two miles to the southward of the fair town of Bourges, the capital of ancient Touraine, whom it has been termed the garden of France.

On bank of the above-mentioned brook, opposite that which the traveller was approaching, a, who appeared in deep conversation, seemed, up to him, to watch his motions; for as they was much more elevated, they could remark considerable distance.

The age of the young traveller might be about 18, or betwixt that and twenty, and his features, which were very prepossessing, did not, belong to the country in which he was now. His short grey cloak and hose were of Flemish than of French fashion, while the fine bonnet, with a single sprig of holly and a feather, was already recognised as the head-gear. His dress was very neat, and with the precision of a youth conscious of being a fine person. He had at his back a satchel, signed to contain a few necessities, a hawk-staff on his left hand, though he carried no dog in his right a stout hunter's pole. Over his shoulder hung an embroidered scarf which sustained a small pouch of scarlet velvet, such as was used by fowlers of distinction to carry their food, and other matters belonging to that dapper sport. This was crossed by another sash, to which was hung a hunting knife, and a dagger. Instead of the hose of the previous buskins of half-dressed deer's skin, which his form had not yet attained its full, he was tall and active, and the lightness of, with which he advanced, showed that his mode of travelling was pleasure rather than him. His complexion was fair, in spite of a shade of darker hue, with which the foreign perhaps constant exposure to the atmosphere of his country, had, in some degree, discoloured.

His features, without being quite regular, were frank, open, and pleasing. A half smile, which seemed to arise from a happy exuberance of animal spirits, showed, now and then, that his teeth were well set, and as pure as ivory; whilst his bright blue eye, with a corresponding gaiety, had an appropriate glance for every object which it encountered, expressing good humour, lightness of heart, and determined resolution.

He received and returned the salutation of the few travellers who frequented the road in those dangerous times, with the air which suited each. The strolling sportsman, half soldier, half brigand, measured the youth with his eye, as if balancing the prospect of booty with the chance of desperate resistance; and read such indications of the latter in the fearless glance of the passenger, that he changed his ruffing purpose for a surly "Good morrow, comrade," which the young Scot answered with as martial, though a less sullen tone. The wandering pilgrim, or the begging friar, answered his reverend greeting with a paternal benediction; and the dark-eyed peasant girl looked after him for many a step after they had passed each other and interchanged a laughing good-morrow. In short, there was an attraction about his whole appearance not easily escaping attention, and which was derived from the combination of fearless frankness and good-humour, with sprightly looks, and a handsome face and person. It seemed, too, as if his whole demeanour bespoke one who was entering on life with no apprehension of the evils with which it is beset, and small means for struggling with its hardships, except a lively spirit and a courageous disposition; and it was with such weapons that youth most readily sympathizes, and for whom chiefly age and experience feel affectionate and pitying interest.

The youth whom we have described, had been long visible to the two persons who loitered on the opposite side of the small river which divided him from the park and the castle, but as he descended the rugged bank to the water's edge, with the light step of a roe which visits the fountain, the younger of the two said to the other, "It is our man—it is the Bohemian! If he attempts to cross the ford, he is a lost man—the water is up, and the ford impassable."

"Let him make that discovery himself, gossip," said the elder personage; "it may, perchance, save a rope, and break a proverb."

"I judge him by the blue cap," said the other, "for I cannot see his face.—Hark, sir—he hallooed to know whether the water be deep."

"Nothing like experience in this world," answered the other—"let him try."

The young man, in the meanwhile, receiving no hint to the contrary, and taking the silence of those to whom he applied as an encouragement to proceed, entered the stream without farther hesitation than the delay necessary to take off his buskins. The elder person, at the same moment, hallooed to him to beware, adding, in a lower tone, to his companion, "Mere folly, gossip—you have made another mistake—this is not the Bohemian chatterer."

But the intimation to the youth came too late. He either did not hear or could not profit by it, being already in the deep stream. To one less alert, and practised in the career of swimming, death had been certain, for the brook was both deep and strong.

"By Saint Anne! but he is a proper youth," said the elder man—"Run, gossip, and help your blunder, by giving him aid, if thou canst. He belongs to thine own troop—if old saws speak truth, water will not drown him."

Indeed the young traveller swam so strongly, and buffeted the waves so well, that notwithstanding the strength of the current, he was carried but a little way down from the ordinary landing place.

By this time the younger of the two strangers was hurrying down to the shore to render assistance, while the other followed him at a greater pace, saying to himself as he approached, "I know water would never drown that young fellow.—By my hallooing, he is secure, and grips his pole!—If I make not the more haste he will beat my gossip for the only charitable action which I ever saw him perform, or attempt to perform, in the whole course of his life."

There was some reason to suspect such a conclusion of the adventure, for the bonny Scot had already accused the younger Sarrasinian, who was hastening to his assistance, with these awful words—"Dis-appearing dog! why did you not answer when I called to know if the passage was fit to be attempted? May the foul fiend catch me, but I will teach you the respect due to strangers on the next occasion!"

There was accompanied with that significant flourish with his pole which is called le moultain, because the artist, holding it in the middle, brandishes the two ends in every direction, like the sails of a windmill in motion. His opponent, seeing himself thus menaced, laid hand upon his sword, for he was one of those who on all occasions are more ready for action than for speech; but his more considerate comrade who came up, commanded him to forbear, and, turning to the young man, accused him in turn of precipitation in plunging into the swollen ford, and of intemperate violence in quarrelling with a man who was hastening to his assistance.

The young man, on hearing himself thus reproved by a man of advanced age and respectable appearance, immediately lowered his weapon, and said he would be sorry if he had done them injustice; but, in reality, it appeared to him as if they had suffered him to put his life in peril for want of a word of timely warning, which could be the part neither of honest men nor of good Christians, far less of respectable burghers, such as they seemed to be.

"Fair son," said the elder person, "you seem, from your accent and complexion, a stranger; and you should recollect your dialect is not so easily comprehended by us, as perhaps it may be uttered by you."

"Well, father," answered the youth, "I do not care much about the ducking I have had, and I will readily forgive your being partly the cause, provided you will direct me to some place where I can have my clothes dried, for it is my only suit, and I must keep it somewhat decent."

"For whom do you take us, fair son?" said the elder stranger, in answer to this question.

"For substantial burghers, unquestionably," said the youth; "or, hold—you, master, may be a money-broker or a corn-merchant; and thus man a butcher, or grazier."

"You have let our capacities rarely," said the elder, smiling. "My business is indeed to trade in as much money as I can; and my gossip's dealings are somewhat of kin to the butcher's. As to your accommodation, we will try to serve you; but I must first know who you are, and whither you are going, for, in these times, the roads are filled with travellers on foot and horseback, who have any thing in their head but honesty and the fear of God."

The young man cast another keen and penetrating glance on him who spoke, and on his silent companion, as if doubtful whether they, on their part, merited the confidence they demanded; and the result of his observation was as follows.

The eldest, and most remarkable of these men, in dress and appearance resembled the merchant or shopkeeper of the period. His jerkin, hose, and cloak, were of a dark uniform colour, but worn so threadbare, that the acute young Scot conceived that the wearer must be either very rich or very poor, probably the former. The fashion of the dress was close and short—a kind of garments which were not then held decorous among gentry, or even the superior class of citizens, who generally wore loose gowns which descended below the middle of the leg.

The expression of this man's countenance was partly attractive, and partly forbidding. His strong features, sunk cheeks, and hollow eyes, had, nevertheless, an expression of shrewdness and humour congenial to the character of the young adventurer. But then, those same sunken eyes, from under the shroud of thick black eyebrows, had something in them that was at once commanding and sinister. Perhaps this effect was increased by the low fur cap, much depressed on the forehead, and adding to the shade from under which those eyes peered out; but it is certain that the young stranger had some difficulty to reconcile his looks with the meanness of his appearance in other respects. His cap, in particular, in which all men of any quality displayed either a branch of gold or of silver, was ornamented with a paltry tangle of the Virgin, in lead, such as the poorest sort of pilgrims bring from Loretto.

His comrade was a stout formed, middle-aged man, more than ten years younger than his companion, with a down-looking visage, and a very ominous smile when by chance he gave way to that impulse, which was never, except in reply to certain secret signs that suited to pass between him and the rider stranger. This man was armed with a sword and dagger; and underneath his plain habit, the Scotman observed that he concealed a jacron, or frangible shirt of linked mail, which, as being often worn by those, even of peaceful professions, who were called upon at that perilous period to be frequently abroad, confirmed the young man in his conjecture, that the wearer was by profession a butcher, grazier, or something of that description, called upon to be much abroad.

The young stranger, comprehending in one glance the result of the observation which has taken so much time to express, answered, after a moment's pause, "I am ignorant whom I may have the honour to address," making a slight reverence at the same time, "but I am indifferent who knows that I am a knight of Scotland; and that I come to seek my fortune in France, or elsewhere, after the custom of my countrymen."

"Pardieu-dieu! and a gallant custom it is," said the elder stranger. "You seem a fine young squallid, and at the right age to prosper, whether among men or women. What say you? I am a merchant, and want a lad to assist in my traffic—I suppose you are too much a gentleman to assist in such mechanical drudgery?"

"Fair sir," said the youth, "if your offer be exactly made of which I have my doubts—I am bound to thank you for it, and I thank you accordingly; but I fear I should be altogether unfit for your service."

"What!" said the merchant, "I warrant thou knowest better how to draw the bow, than how to draw a bill of exchange—canst handle a broadsword better than a pen 'hal'?"

"I am, master," answered the young Scot, "a bowman, and therefore, as we say, a bowman. His master, that I have been in a convent, where the good fathers taught me to read and write, and even to cipher."

"Pardieu-dieu! that is too magnificent," said the merchant. "By our lady of Lindrum, thou art a prodigy, man!"

"Rest you merry, fair master," said the youth, who was not much pleased with his new acquaintance's familiarity. "I must go dry myself, instead of standing dripping here, answering questions."

The merchant only laughed louder as he spoke, and answered, "Pardieu-dieu! the proverb never fails for coming an Arrouse—but come, youngster, you are of a country I have a regard for, having traded in Scotland in my time—an honest pair of fellows they are; and if you will come with us to the village, I will bestow on you a cup of burnt sack and a warm breakfast, to warm for your drunching. But, adieu! what do you with a hunting-glove on your hand? Know you not there is no hawking permitted in a royal chase?"

"I was taught that lesson," answered the youth, "by a rascally forester of the Duke of Burgundy. I did but fly the falcon I had brought with me from Scotland, and that I reckoned on for bringing me to some note, at a haven near Pervonne, and the rascally scold shot my bird with an arrow."

"What did you do?" said the merchant.

"Rest him," said the youngster, brandishing his staff, "as near to death as one Christian man should hold another—I wanted not to have his blood on my hands."

"Know you," said the burgess, "that had you fallen blowments of hogs, hares, quivers, and other emblems of hunting, surrounded the walls, and were mingled with the heads of deer, wolves, and other animals considered beasts of sport. The whole adornments took an appropriate and sylvan character, and the mass itself, being considerably shortened, proved to be of that sort which is called a haunting mass, because in use before the noble and powerful, who, while naming at the solemnity are usually impatient to commence their favourite sport.

Yet, during this brief ceremony, Durward's companion seemed to pay the most rigid and scrupulous attention, while Durward, not quite so much occupied with religious thoughts, could not forbear his own mind, for having entertained suspicious derogatory to the character of an good and as humble a man. Far from now holding him as a companion and accomplice of robbers, he had much to do to forbear regarding him as a saint like personage.

When mass was ended, they retired together from the chapel, and the elder said to his young comrade, "It is but a short walk from hence to the village—you may now break your fast with an unprejudiced conscience—follow me."

Turning to the right, and proceeding along a path which seemed gradually to ascend, he recommended to his companion by no means to quit the track, but, on the contrary, to keep the middle of it as nearly as he could. Durward could not help asking the cause of this precaution.

"You are now near the Court, young man," answered his guide; "and, Pardieu-dieu! there is some difference between walking in this region and on your own healthy hills. Every yard of the ground, excepting the path which we now occupy, is somewhat dangerous, and wellnigh impracticable, by snares and traps, armed with erythe blades, which shred off the unwary passenger's limb as shrewdly as a hedge-bill lops a hawthorn spray, and enthralls that would pierce your foot through, and put falls deep enough to bury you in them for ever; but you are now within the precincts of the royal domain, and we shall presently see the front of the Chateau."

"Were I the King of France," said the young man, "I would not take so much trouble with traps and guns, but would try instead to govern so well, that no man should dare to come near my dwelling with a bad intent, and for those who came there in peace and good-will, why, the more of them the more we should be."

His companion looked around, uttering an alarmed gaze, and said, "Hush, hush, for Varlet with the Velvet Pouch! for I forgot to tell you, that one great danger of these precincts is, that the very leaves of the trees are like so many ears, which carry all which is spoken to the King's own cabinet."

"I care little for that," answered Quentin Durward; "I bear a Scottish tongue in my hand, bold enough to speak my mind to King Louis's face. God bless him—and, for the ears you talk of, if I could see them growing on a human head, I would crop them out of it with my wood-knife."

CHAPTER III.

THE CASTLE.

Fall to the midst a mighty pile arose,
Where men-grated gain'd their strength and scope;
To each, crowding deep—and, strong and steep,
The battled walls rose, the fosse sunk deep.
There round the fortress roll'd the dragon stream,
And high in middle air the warlike towers gleam'd.

While Durward and his new acquaintance thus spoke, they came in sight of the whole front of the Castle of Fleiss-les-Tours, which, even in those dangerous times, when the great found themselves obliged to reside within places of fortified strength, was distinguished for the extreme and jealous care with which it was watched and defended.

From the verge of the wood where young Durward halted with his companion, in order to take a view of this royal residence, extended, or rather stretched, by a very gentle elevation, an open space, devoid of trees and bushes of every description excepting one gigantic and half withered old tree. This space was left open, according to the usual fortification in all ages, in order that an enemy should not approach the walls under cover, or escape from the battlements, and beyond it stood the castle itself.

There were three external walls, battlements and turreted from space to space, and at each of the second enclosure rising higher than the first, being built so as to command the exterior defence case it was won by the enemy; and being on the same manner, itself commanded by the and innermost barrier. Around the external wall, as the Frenchman informed his young comrade (for, as they stood lower than the foundation of wall, he could not see it,) was sunk a ditch of twenty feet in depth, supplied with water by a head on the river Cher, or rather on one of its tributary branches. In front of the second enclosure wall, there ran another fosse, and a third, between the second and the innermost enclosure. The top of the outer and inner circuit of this triple wall was strongly fringed with palisades of iron, on the purpose of what are called chevaux-de-fr modern fortification, the top of each palisade was divided into a cluster of sharp spikes, which served to render any attempt to climb over an act of destruction.

From within the innermost enclosure arose Castle itself, containing buildings of different size crowded around, and united with the ancient grim-looking donjon-keep, which was older than any of them, and which rose, like a black Eddystone, high into the air, while the absence of windows larger than shot holes, irregularly disposed for defence, gave the spectator the same unpleasant feeling which we experience on looking at a man. The other buildings seemed scarcely adapted for the purposes of comfort, for the were opened to an inner and enclosed court-yard, on the whole external front looked much more like of a prison than a palace. The reigning King even increased this effect, for, desirous that the distance which he himself had made to the fortifications should be of a character not easily distinguish from the original building, (for like many persons, he loved not that his suspicions should be observed,) the darkest-coloured brick and lime were employed, and most mingled with the lime to give the whole Castle the same uniform of extreme and rude antiquity.

These formidable places had but one entrance, least Durward saw none along the spacious except where, in the centre of the first and outer boundary, arose two strong towers, the usual style of a gateway; and he could observe they ancient companions, portcullis and drawbridge—of the first was lowered, and the last raised. The entrance-towers were visible on the second and bounding wall, but not in the same line with it on the outward circuit, because the passage did not run through the whole three enclosures at same point, but, on the contrary, there was a road to proceed nearly thirty yards between the first and second wall, exposed, if their purpose was to be, to missiles from both; and again, when the second boundary was passed, they must make a lateral digression from the straight line, in order to gain the portal of the third and innermost enclosure so that before passing the outer court, which was the front of the building, two narrow and deep defiles were to be traversed under a flanking charge of artillery, and three gates, defended in strongest manner known to the age, were successively forced.

Coming from a country alike desolated by the war and internal strife,—a country, too, where equal and mountainous obstacles, abounding in steep and torrents, afforded so many situations of strength,—young Durward was sufficiently aware various contrivances by which men, in endeavouring to secure their dwellings, are owned to his companion, that he did not mean in the power of art to do as nature had done so little; and, as we have hinted, was merely the gentle elevation ascending upwards where they were standing.

His surprise, his companion told him one of the Castles, except the angle by which the portal might be safely entered, like the thickets through which they proceeded with every species of hidden and guile, to entrap the wretch who ventured without a guide, that upon a constructed certain cradles of iron, & walls, from which the sentinels, who posted there, could, without being struck, take deliberate aim at any who attempted to enter without the proper signal of the day, and that the Archers of the performed that duty day and night, for earned high pay, rich clothing, and good profit at the hands of King Louis.

"Well, young man," he continued, "did not strong a fortress, and do you think bold enough to storm it?"

He looked long and steadily on the place, which interested him so much, that he, in the eagerness of youthful curiosity, of his dress. His eye glanced, and his mind to his cheek like that of a daring man, in an honourable arena, as he replied, "certainly, and strongly guarded; but there duty to brave men."

"any in your country who could do such the elder, rather scornfully, affirm that," answered the youth; "but stands that, as a good cannon, would be a deed."

"and the answer," perhaps you are youthful?"

and if I were to boast where there is no crowd young Durward; "but my father old an act, and I trust I am no backward of his companion, smiling, "you might do it, and your kindred withal, in the of a Scottish Archer of King Louis's Life-guard on yonder walls—these born on of the horn heard in your country."

I King Louis, and the youth, in reply, and my safety to the faith of the three high gentlemen, throw down my banner fill up the moat, call in my noble peers, and live as became me, amid breaking alliant tournaments, and feasting of days and dancing of nights with ladies, and fear of a fire than I have of a fly."

men again smiled, and turning his back, which, he observed, they had approached nearly, he led the way again into the more broad and better path than they drew. "This," he said, "leads us to the city, as it is called, where you, as a strong reasonable and honest accommodation down toward him the fine city of Tours, name to the rich and beautiful garden of Plessis, or Plessis of the Park, as it called, from its vicinity to the royal residence chase with which it is encircled, will ever and as convenient hospitality."

"you, kind master, for your information," said, "but my stay will be so short here, not in a morsel of meat, and a drink of other than water, my necessities in Plessis-park or the pool, will be amply supplied."

answered his companion, "I thought you said to me in this quarter."

I have—my mother's own brother," answered; "and as pretty a man, being he of Angou, as ever planted his foot on her-up to the Castle, where you might be taken for a spy."

"Now by my father's hand!" and the youth, "I taken for a spy"—By Heaven, he shall brook cold sun that brands me with such a charge!—But for my uncle's name, I care not who knows it—it is Lady—Lamy—an honest and noble name."

"And so it is, I doubt not," said the old man; "but there are three of the name in the Scottish Guard."

"My uncle's name is Ladovic Lamy," said the young man.

"Of the three Lamas," answered the merchant, "two are called Ladovic."

"They call my kinsman Ladovic with the Bear," said Quentin—"Our family names are so common in a Scottish house, that where there is no land in the name, we always give a to-name."

"A nom de guerre, I suppose you to mean," answered his companion, "and the man you speak of, we, I think, call La Balafré, from that scar on his face—a proper man and a good soldier. I wish I may be able to help you to an interview with him, for he belongs to a set of gentlemen whose duty is strict, and who do not often come out of garrison, unless in the immediate attendance on the King's person.—And now, young man, answer me one question. I will wager you are desirous to take service with your uncle in the Scottish Guard. It is a great thing, if you propose so, especially as you are very young, and some years' experience is necessary for the high office which you aim at."

"Perhaps I may have thought on some such thing," said Durward, cautiously, "but if I did, the fancy is off."

"How so, young man?" said the Frenchman, something sternly—"Do you speak thus of a charge which the most noble of your countrymen feel themselves ashamed to be admitted to?"

"I wish them joy of it," said Quentin, composedly,—"To speak plain, I should have liked the service of the French King full well; only, dress me as thou, and find me as high as you will, I love the open air better than being shut up in a cage or a swallow's nest yonder, as you call these same grated pepper boxes. Besides," he added, in a lower tone, "to speak truth, I love not the Castle when the seven-trees bear such scorns as I see yonder."

"I guess what you mean," said the Frenchman; "but speak yet more plainly."

"To speak more plainly, then," said the youth, "there grows a fair oak some eight-feet or so from yonder Castle—and on that oak hangs a man in a gray jerkin, such as this which I wear."

"Ay and indeed!" said the man of France—"Pardieu-dieu! see what it is to have youthful eyes! Why, I did see something, but only took it for a roven among the branches. But the sight is no way strange, young man, when the summer fades into autumn, and moonlight nights are long, and roads become unsafe, you will see a cluster of ten, or of twenty such scorns, hanging on that old daddled oak.—But what then?—they are so many banners displayed to scare knaves; and for each roven that hangs there, an honest man may reckon that there is a thief, a traitor, a robber on the highway, a piller and oppressor of the people, the sewer in France. These, young man, are signs of our Sovereign's justice."

"I would have hung them farther from my palace, though, were I King Louis," said the youth.—"In my country, we hang up dead corpses where living corpses haunt, but not in our gardens or peasant houses. The very scent of the carrion—though reached my nostrils at the distance where we stood."

"If you live to be an honest and loyal servant of your Prince, my good youth," answered the Frenchman, "you will know there is no perfume to match the scent of a dead traitor."

"I shall never wish to live till I lose the scent of my nostrils or the sight of my eyes," said the Scot.—

"Show me a living traitor, and here are my hand and my weapon; but when life is out, hatred should not live longer.—But here, I fancy, we come upon the vilhis name?" said the answer; "we will cut for you; for it is not such for you to go ings, where I hope to show you that neither drinking nor disgust have spoiled mine appetite for my breakfast. So, my good friend, to the hostelry, with all the speed you may - Yet, ere I accept of your hospitality, let me know by what name to call you."

"Men call me Maître Pierre," answered his companion. - I deal in no titles. A plain man, that can live on some own good - that is my designation."

"So be it, Maître Pierre," said Quentin, "and I am happy my good chance has thrown us together; for I want a word of reasonable advice, and can be thankful for it."

While they spoke thus, the tower of the church, and a tall wooden crucifix, rising above the trees, showed that they were at the entrance of the village.

But Maître Pierre, deflecting a little from the road, which had now joined an open and public causeway, said to his companion, that the inn to which he intended to introduce him stood somewhat secluded, and received only the better sort of travellers.

"If you mean those who travel with the better-filled purses," answered the Scot, "I am none of the number, and will rather stand my chance of your slayers on the highway, than of your slayers in the hostelry."

"Pardieu-dieu!" said his guide, "how cautious your countrymen of Scotland are! An Englishman, now, throws himself headlong into a tavern, eats and drinks of the best, and never thinks of the reckoning till his belly is full. But you forget, Master Quentin, since Quentin is your name, you forget I owe you a breakfast for the wetting which my mistake procured you. It is the penance of my offence towards you."

"In truth," said the light-hearted young man, "I had forgot wetting, offence, and penance and all. I have walked my clothes dry or nearly so, but I will not refuse your offer of kindness; for my dinner yesterday was a light one and supper I had none. You seem an old and respectable burgess, and I see no reason why I should not accept your courtesy."

The Frenchman smiled aside, for he saw plainly that the youth, while he was probably half famished, had yet some difficulty to reconcile himself to the thought of feeding at a stranger's cost, and was endeavouring to subdue his inward pride by the reflection, that, in such slight obligations, the stranger performed as complimentary a part as he by whom the courtesy was offered.

In the meanwhile they descended a narrow lane, overshadowed by tall alms, at the bottom of which a gateway admitted them into the court yard of an inn of unusual magnitude, calculated for the accommodation of the nobles and knights who had business at the neighbouring Castle, where very seldom, and only when such hospitality was altogether unavoidable, did Louis XI permit any of his Court to have apartments. A scutcheon bearing the fleur-de-lis, hung over the principal door of the large irregular building; but there was about the yard and the offices little or none of the bustle which in those days, when attendants were maintained both in public and in private houses, marked that business was alive, and custom plenty. It seemed as if the stern and austere character of the royal mansion in the neighbourhood had communicated a portion of its solemn and terrible gloom even to a place designed, according to universal custom elsewhere, for the temple of social indulgence, merry society, and good cheer.

Maître Pierre, without calling any one, and even without approaching the principal entrance, lifted the latch of a side door, and led the way into a large room, where a fire was blazing on the hearth, and arrangements made for a substantial breakfast.

"My group has been careful," said the Frenchman to the host. "You must be cold, and I have commanded a fire; you must be hungry, and you shall have breakfast presently."

He wheeled, and the landlord entered, - answered Maître Pierre's bon jour with a reverence, - but in no respect showed any part of the growing humour properly belonging to a French publican of all ages.

"I expected a gentleman," said Maître Pierre, "to enter breakfast - Has he done so?"

In answer, the landlord only bowed; and while he continued to bring, and arrange upon the table the various articles of a comfortable meal, expressed their wants by a single word. And breakfast merited such eulogiums as French are wont to confer upon their repales, as this will be informed in the next Chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

THE BREAKFAST.

Should Quentin's what satisfaction? what food? (Pierre's)

We left our young stranger in France more comfortably than he had found himself among the territories of the ancient Gauls. The fact, as we hinted in the conclusion of the last chapter, was edifying. There was a paste de Pe over which a gastronomer would have writhed and die, like Homer's lotus-eaters, forgetful native country, and all social obligations. Its vast walls of magnificent crust seemed like the bulwarks of some rich metropolitan city, bloom of the wealth which they are designed for. There was a delicate ragout, with its petit point de sel which Geronimo loved, and 3 men do not hear. There was ham, a ham, which had once supported a noble wife the neighbouring wood of Mountchar. To the most exquisite whole bread, made into little loaves called boules (where the bakers use French name of boulangers) of which the crumb so melting, that, even with water alone, it was been a delicacy. But the water was not all there was a flask of leather called safran, contained about a quart of exquisite vin de St. So many good things might have created a under the ribs of death. What effect, then, they have produced upon a youngster of twenty, who (for the truth must be told) had little for the two last days, save the crust from which chance afforded him an opportune plucking, and a very moderate portion of bread? He threw himself upon the ragout, a plate was presently vacant - he attacked the paste, marched deep into the bowels of the luncheon, and he returned to the charge again and as the satisfaction of some lust, and the arm of Maître Pierre.

The last or indeed, probably because he had not the surface of a kinder action than he had of of, seemed delighted with the aspects of the Scot, and when at length he observed it returned began to languish reconstructed to tell him to new efforts, by ordering confessions, and any other light dances he could think of, to the youth to continue his meal. While it passed, Maître Pierre's countenance expressed of good humour almost amounting to being which appeared remote from its ordinary caustic, and severe character. The aged man ways sympathetic with the enjoyments of youth with its exertions of every kind, when the spectator rests on its natural poise, and disturbed by inward envy or idle emulation.

Quentin Durward also, while thus engaged, could do no otherwise than discover a continuance of his entertainment which he had found so unrepentant, mended when it was under the influence of the vin de Montreuil, and was kindness in the tone with which he repaid Maître Pierre, that he amused himself with it at his appetite, without eating any thing himself.

"I am doing penance," said Maître Pierre, "you may not eat any thing before noon, save soup, store and a cup of water - But remember this added, turning to the innkeeper, "bring them to me."

The innkeeper left the room, and Maître proceeded, "Well, have I kept faith with you earning the breakfast I promised you?"

"The best meal I have eaten," said the young man, "since I left Glen-boulain."

"Glen—what?" demanded Maitre Pierre; "are you going to raise the devil, that you use such long-winded words?"

"Glen-houlakin," answered Quentin, good-humouredly, "which is to say, the Glen of the Midgea, the name of our ancient patrimony, my good sir. We have bought the right to laugh at the sound, if I please."

"I have not the least intention to offend," said the man; "but I was about to say, since you like your present meal so well, that the Scottish Archers the guard eat as good a one, or a better, every day."

"No wonder," said Durward, "for if they be shut in the swallows' nests all night, they must needs have a curious appetite in the morning."

"And plenty to gratify it upon," said Maitre Pierre. "They need not, like the Burgundians, chouse a bare cask, that they may have a full belly—they dress like monks, and feast like abbots."

"It is well for them," said Durward.

"And wherefore will you not take service here, young man? Your uncle might, I dare say, have you placed on the file when there should a vacancy occur. And, hark in your ear, I myself have some use and interest, and might be of some use to you. You are a ride, I presume, as well as draw the bow?"

"Our race are as good horsemen as ever put a steel shoe into a steel stirrup; and I know not but I might accept of your kind offer. Yet, look you, food and raiment are needful things, but, in my case, I think of honour, and advancement, and brave deeds of arms. Your King Louis—God bless him, he is a friend and ally of Scotland—but he lies idle in this castle, or only rides about from one ford to another; and gains cities and provinces by politic embassies, and not in fair fighting. Now, for me, I am of the Douglasses' mind, who always kept the fields, because they loved better to hear the lark sing than the mouse squeak."

"Young man," said Maitre Pierre, "do not judge rashly of the actions of sovereigns. Louis seeks to spare the blood of his subjects, and cares not for his own. He showed himself a man of courage at Antwerp."

"Ay, but that was some dozen years ago or more," answered the youth.—"I should like to follow a man that would keep his honour as bright as his sword, and always venture foremost in the very front of the battle."

"Why did you not tarry at Brussels, then, with the Duke of Burgundy? He would put you in the way to have your bones broken every day; and, better than fail, would do the job for you himself—especially if he heard that you had beaten his father."

"Very true," said Quentin; "my unhappy chance has shut that door against me."

"Nay, there are plenty of dare-devils abroad, with whom mad youngsters may find service," said his adviser. "What think you, for example, of William la Marck?"

"What!" exclaimed Durward, "serve Him with a beard—serve the wild Boar of Ardennes—a captain of pillagers and murderers, who would take a man's life for the value of his guberdine, and who pays priests and pilgrims as if they were so many ice-knights and men-at-arms? It would be a blot on my father's scutcheon for ever."

"Well, my young hot-blood," replied Maitre Pierre, "if you hold the Sanglier too unscrupulous, wherefore not follow the young Duke of Gueldres?"

"Follow the foul fiend as soon," said Quentin. "Hark in your ear—he is a burden too heavy for strength to carry—hell gapes for him! Men say that

* This was Adolphus, son of Arnold and of Catherine de Clugny. The present story has little to do with him, though one of the most atrocious characters of his time. He made war against his father; in which unnatural strife he made the old man prisoner, and used him with the most brutal violence, promising, it is said, even to the length of striking him with his sword. Arnold, in resentment of this usage, disinherited the ungrateful wretch, and sold to Charles of Burgundy whatever he had over the duchy of Gueldres and earldom of Zutphen. Mary of Burgundy, daughter of Charles, restored these counties to the unnatural Adolphus, who was slain in the war 1477.

he keeps his own father imprisoned, and that he has even struck him—Can you believe it?"

Maitre Pierre seemed somewhat disconcerted with the naïve horror with which the young Scotsman spoke of filial ingratitude, and he answered, "You know not, young man, how short a while the relations of blood subsists among those of elevated rank;" then changed the tone of feeling in which he had begun to speak, and added, gayly, "besides, if the Duke has beaten his father, I warrant you his father hath beaten him of old, so it is but a clearing of scores."

"I marvel to hear you speak thus," said the Scot, colouring with indignation; "gray hairs such as yours ought to have fitter subjects for jesting. If the old Duke did beat his son in childhood, he beat him not enough; for better he had died under the rod, than have lived to make the Christian world ashamed that such a monster had ever been baptized."

"At this rate," said Maitre Pierre, "as you weigh the characters of each prince and leader, I think you had better become a captain yourself; for where will one so wise find a chieftain fit to command him?"

"You laugh at me, Maitre Pierre," said the youth, good-humouredly, "and perhaps you are right; but you have not named a man who is a gallant leader, and keeps a brave party up here under, whom a man might seek service well enough."

"I cannot guess whom you mean."

"Why, he that hangs like Mahomet's coffin (a curse be upon Mahomet!) between the two loadstones—he that no man can call either French or Burgundian, but who knows to hold the balance between them both, and makes both of them fear and serve him, for as great princes as they be."

"I cannot guess whom you mean," said Maitre Pierre, thoughtfully.

"Why, whom should I mean but the noble Louis de Luxembourg, Count of Saint Paul, the High Constable of France? Yonder he makes his place good, with his gallant little army, holding his head as high as either King Louis or Duke Charles, and balancing between them, like the boy who stands on the midst of a plank, while two others are swinging on the opposite ends."†

"He is in danger of the worst fall of the three," said Maitre Pierre. "And hark ye, my young friend, you who hold pillaging such a crime, do you know that your politic Count of Saint Paul was the first who set the example of burning the country during the time of war? and that before the shameful devastation which he committed, open towns and villages, which made no resistance, were spared on all sides?"

"Nay, faith," said Durward, "if that be the case, I shall begin to think no one of these great men is much better than another, and that a choice among them is but like choosing a tree to be hung upon. But this Count de Saint Paul, this constable, hath possessed himself by clean conveyance of the town which takes its name from my honoured saint and patron, Saint Quentin,"‡ (here he crossed himself,) "and methinks, were I dwelling there, my holy patron would keep some look-out for me—he has not so many named after him as your more popular saints—and yet he must have forgotten me, poor Quentin Durward, his spiritual god-son, since he lets me go one day without food, and leaves me the next morning to the harbourage of Saint Julian, and the chance courtesy of a stranger, purchased by a ducking in the renowned river Cher, or one of its tributaries."

"Blaspheme not the saints, my young friend,"

† This part of Louis XIth's reign was much embarrassed by the intrigues of the Constable St. Paul, who affected independence, and carried on intrigues with England, France, and Burgundy, at the same time. According to the usual fate of such variable politicians, the Constable ended by drawing upon himself the animosity of all the powerful neighbours whom he had in their turn amused and deceived. He was delivered up by the Duke of Burgundy to the King of France, tried, and hastily executed for treason, A. D. 1475.

‡ It was by his possession of this town of Saint Quentin that the Constable was able to carry on those political intrigues which finally cost him so dear.

said Maitre Pierre. "Saint Julian is the faithful patron of travellers; and, peradventure, the blessed Saint Quentin had done more and better for thee than thou art aware of."

As he spoke, the door opened, and a girl, rather above than under fifteen years old, entered with a platter covered with damask, on which was placed a small saucer of the dried plums which have always added to the reputation of Tours, and a cup of the curiously chased plate which the goldsmiths of that city were anciently famous for executing with a delicacy of workmanship that distinguished them from the other cities of France, and even excelled the skill of the metropolis. The form of the goblet was so elegant, that Durward thought not of observing closely whether the material was of silver, or, like what had been placed before himself, of a baser metal, but so well burnished as to resemble the richer ore.

But the sight of the young person by whom this service was executed, attracted Durward's attention far more than the petty minutiae of the duty which she performed.

He speedily made the discovery, that a quantity of long black tresses, which, in the maiden fashion of his own country, were unadorned by any ornament, except a single chaplet lightly woven out of ivy leaves, formed a veil around a countenance, which, in its regular features, dark eyes, and pensive expression, resembled that of Melpomene, though there was a faint glow on the cheek, and an intelligence on the lips and in the eye, which made it seem that gayety was not foreign to a countenance so expressive, although it might not be its most habitual expression. Quentin even thought he could discern that depressing circumstances were the cause why a countenance so young and so lovely was graver than belongs to early beauty; and as the romantic imagination of youth is rapid in drawing conclusions from slight premises, he was pleased to infer, from what follows, that the fate of this beautiful vision was wrapped in silence and mystery.

"How now, Jacqueline!" said Maitre Pierre, when she entered the apartment—"Wherefore this? Did I not desire that Dame Perette should bring what I wanted?—Pasques-dieu!—Is she, or does she think herself, too good to serve me?"

"My kinswoman is ill at ease," answered Jacqueline, in a hurried yet an humble tone; "ill at ease, and keeps her chamber."

"She keeps it alone, I hope?" replied Maitre Pierre, with some emphasis; "I am ricux routier, and none of those upon whom feigned disorders pass for apologies."

Jacqueline turned pale, and even tottered at the answer of Maitre Pierre; for it must be owned, that his voice and looks, at all times harsh, caustic, and unpleasing, had, when he expressed anger or suspicion, an effect both sinister and alarming.

The mountain chivalry of Quentin Durward was instantly awakened, and he hastened to approach Jacqueline, and relieve her of the burden she bore, and which she passively resigned to him, while with a timid and anxious look, she watched the countenance of the angry burgess. It was not in nature to resist the piercing and pity-craving expression of her looks, and Maitre Pierre proceeded, not merely with an air of diminished displeasure, but with as much gentleness as he could assume in countenance and manner, "I blame not thee, Jacqueline, and thou art too young to be—what it is pity to think thou must be one day—a false and treacherous thing, like the rest of thy giddy sex. No man ever lived to man's estate, but he had the opportunity to know you all.* Here is a Scottish cavalier will tell you the same."

Jacqueline looked for an instant on the young stranger, as if to obey Maitre Pierre, but the glance, momentary as it was, appeared to Durward a pathetic appeal to him for support and sympathy; and with the promptitude dictated by the feelings of youth, and the romantic veneration for the female sex inspired by his education, he answered hastily, "That he would throw down his gage to any antagonist, of equal rank and equal age, who should presume to say such a countenance, as that which he now looked upon, could be animated by other than the purest and the truest mind."

The young woman grew deadly pale, and cast an apprehensive glance upon Maitre Pierre, in whom the bravado of the young gallant seemed only to excite laughter, more scornful than applause. Quentin, whose second thoughts generally corrected the first, though sometimes after they had found utterance, blushed deeply at having uttered what might be construed into an empty boast, in presence of an old man of a peaceful profession; and, as a sort of just and appropriate penance, resolved patiently to submit to the ridicule which he had incurred. He offered the cup and trencher to Maitre Pierre with a blush in his cheek, and a humiliation of countenance which endeavoured to disguise itself under an embarrassed smile.

"You are a foolish young man," said Maitre Pierre, "and know as little of women as of princes,—whose hearts," he said, crossing himself devoutly, "God keeps in his right hand."

"And who keeps those of the women, then?" said Quentin, resolved, if he could help it, not to be borne down by the assumed superiority of this extraordinary old man, whose lofty and careless manner possessed an influence over him of which he felt ashamed.

"I am afraid you must ask of them in another quarter," said Maitre Pierre, composedly.

Quentin was again rebuffed, but not utterly disconcerted. "Surely," he said to himself, "I do not pay this same burgess of Tours all the deference which I yield him, on account of the miserable obligation of a breakfast, though it was a right good and substantial meal. Dogs and hawks are attached by feeding only—man must have kindness, if you would bind him with the cords of affection and obligation. But he is an extraordinary person; and that beautiful emanation that is even now vanishing—surely a thing so fair belongs not to this mean place, belongs not even to the money-gathering merchant himself, though he seems to exert authority over her, as doubtless he does over all whom chance brings within his little circle. It is wonderful what ideas of consequence these Flemings and Frenchmen attach to wealth—so much more than wealth deserves, that I suppose this old merchant thinks the civility I pay to his age is given to his money—I, a Scottish gentleman of blood and coat-armour, and he a mechanic of Tours!"

Such were the thoughts which hastily traversed the mind of young Durward; while Maitre Pierre said, with a smile, and at the same time patting Jacqueline's head, from which hung down her long tresses, "This young man will serve me, Jacqueline—thou mayst withdraw. I will tell thy negligent kinswoman she does ill to expose thee to be gazed at unnecessarily."

"It was only to wait on you," said the maiden, "I trust you will not be displeased with my kinswoman, since"—

"Pasques-dieu!" said the merchant, interrupting her, but not harshly, "do you bandy words with me, you brat, or stay you to gaze upon the youngster here?—Begone—he is noble, and his services will suffice me."

Jacqueline vanished; and so much was Quentin Durward interested in her sudden disappearance, that it broke his previous thread of reflection, and he complied mechanically, when Maitre Pierre said, in the tone of one accustomed to be obeyed, as he threw himself carelessly upon a large easy-chair, "Place that tray beside me."

The merchant then let his dark eyebrows sink over his keen eyes, so that the last became scarce visible, or but shot forth occasionally a quick and vivid ray, like those of the sun setting behind a dark cloud, through which its beams are occasionally darted, but singly, and for an instant.

* It was a part of Louis's very unamiable character, and not the best part of it, that he entertained a great contempt for the understanding, and not less for the character, of the fair sex.

"That is a beautiful creature," said the old man at last, raising his head, and looking steadily and firmly at Quentin, when he put the question—"a lovely girl, is the servant of an Auberge?—she might grace a board of an honest bourgeois; but 'tis a vile sedition, a base crime."

It sometimes happens that a chance shot will dole out a noble castle in the air, and the architect on whose quincunx entertain little good-will towards a who fires it, although the damage on the offender's part may be wholly unintentional. Quentin was disconcerted, and was disposed to be angry—he must know not why—with this old man, for accusing him that the beautiful creature was neither one or less than what her occupation announced a servant of the Auberge—an upper servant, indeed, of probably a suzerain of the landlord, or such like, still a domestic, and obliged to comply with the caprice of the customers, and particularly of Maître Pierre, who probably had sufficiency of whims, and as rich enough to ensure their being attended to. The thought, the lingering thought, again returned to him, that he ought to make the old gentleman understand the difference between their conditions, to call on him to mark, that, how rich soever he might be, his wealth put him on no level with a Durward of Ghent bourgeois. Yet, whenever he looked at Maître Pierre's countenance with such a purpose, he was, notwithstanding the downcast look, pinched features, and mean and rusty dress, something that prevented the young man from asserting the superiority over the merchant which he conceived could be his. On the contrary, the oftener and so fixedly Quentin looked at him, the stronger became his anxiety to know who or what this man really was; and he set him down internally for at least a Sydenham or high magistrate of Tours, or one of those, in some way or other, in the full habit of giving and receiving deference.

Quentin, the merchant again sunk into reverie, from which he raised himself only to make a sign of the cross devoutly, and to eat some of the hot bread, with a morsel of biscuit. He then signed Quentin to give him the cup, adding, however, by way of question, as he presented it—"You are noble, are you?"

"I surely am," replied the Scot, "if fifteen decades make me so—do I told you before. But do not trouble yourself on that account, Maître Pierre—I've always been taught it is the duty of the young against the more aged."

"An excellent maxim," said the merchant, availing himself of the youth's assistance in handing the cup, and sipping it from a ewer which seemed of the same materials with the goblet, without any of those regards to point of propriety which, perhaps, Quentin had expected to excite.

"The devil take the ease and familiarity of this old bourgeois," said Durward once more to himself; "he uses the attendance of a noble Scottish gentleman with as little ceremony as I would that of a Flemish from Ghent-ville."

The merchant, in the meanwhile, having finished his cup of water, sent to his companion, "From this it with which you seemed to relish the Vin de sapin, I fancy you would not care much to pledge in this elemental liquor. But I have an elixir out of me which can convert even the rock water in the richest wines of France."

So he spoke, he took a large purse from his bosom, took out the lot of the sea-otter, and streamed a shower of small silver pieces into the goblet, until the p. which was but a small one, was more than half full.

"You have reason to be more thankful, young man," said Maître Pierre, "both to your patron Saint Quentin, and to Saint Julian, then you seemed to be it now. I would advise you to bestow alms in this way. Remain in this hostelry until you see your cousin, Le Balafre, who will be relieved from guard this afternoon. I will cause him to be acquainted at his place and you here, for I have business in the town."

Quentin Durward would have said something to have excused himself from accepting the profuse liberality of his new friend; but Maître Pierre, bending his dark brow, and erecting his stooping figure into an attitude of more dignity than he had yet seen him assume, said, in a tone of authority, "No reply, young man, but do what you are commanded."

With these words, he left the apartment, making a sign, as he departed, that Quentin must not follow him.

The young Scotsman stood astounded, and knew not what to think of the matter. His first most natural, though perhaps not most dignified impulse, drove him to peep into the silver goblet, which amazingly was more than half full of silver pieces, to the number of several scores, of which perhaps Quentin had never called twenty his own at one time during the course of his whole life. But could he reconcile it to his dignity as a gentleman, to accept the money of this wealthy plebeian?—This was a trying question; for though he had secured a good breakfast, it was no great reserve upon which to travel either back to Digne, in case he chose to hazard the wrath, and enter the service, of the Duke of Burgundy, or to Saint Paul, for to one of those powers, if not to the King of France, he was determined to offer his services. He perhaps took the wisest resolution in the circumstances, in resolving to be guided by the advice of his uncle; and, in the meantime, he put the money into his velvet hawking pouch, and called for the landlord of the house, in order to restore the silver cup—resolving, at the same time, to ask him some questions about this liberal and authoritative merchant.

The man of the house appeared presently; and, if not more communicative, was at least more loquacious than he had been formerly. He positively declined to take back the silver cup. It was none of his, he said, but Maître Pierre's, who had bestowed it on his guest. He had, indeed, four silver basins of his own, which had been left him by his grandmother, of happy memory, but no more like the beautiful carving of that in his guest's hand, than a peach was like a turnip,—that was one of the famous cups of Tours, wrought by Martin Dominique, an artist who might brag all Paris.

"And, pray, who is this Maître Pierre," said Durward, interrupting him, "who confers such valuable gifts on strangers?"

"Who is Maître Pierre?" said the host, dropping the words as slowly from his mouth as if he had been distilling them.

"Ay," said Durward, hastily and peremptorily, "who is this Maître Pierre, and why does he throw about his treasures in this fashion? And who is this butcherly looking fellow whom he sent forward to order breakfast?"

"Why fast we, as to who Maître Pierre is, you should have asked the question of himself; and for the gentleman who ordered breakfast to be made ready, may God keep us from his closer acquaintance!"

"There is something mysterious in all this," said the young Scot. "This Maître Pierre tells me he is a merchant."

"And if he told you so," said the innkeeper, "surely he is a merchant."

"What commodities does he deal in?"

"O, many a fair matter of traffic," said the host; "and especially he has set up silk manufactories here, which match those rich baies—that the Venetians bring from India and Cathay. You might see the rows of Mulberry trees as you came hither, all planted by Maître Pierre's command, to feed the silk-worms."

"And that young person who brought in the confections, who is she, my good friend?" said the guest.

"My lodger, sir, with her guardian, some sort of aunt or kinswoman, as I think," replied the innkeeper.

"And do you usually employ your guests in waiting on each other?" said Durward; "for I observed that Maître Pierre would take nothing from your hand, or that of your attendant."

"Rich men may have their fancies, for they can pay for them," said the landlord; "this is not the first time that Maître Pierre has found the true way to make gentlemen serve at his beck."

The young Scotsman felt somewhat offended at the insinuation; but, disguising his resentment, he asked whether he could be accommodated with an apartment at this place for a day, and perhaps longer.

"Certainly," the innkeeper replied; "for whatever time he was pleased to command it."

"Could he be permitted," he asked, "to pay his respects to the ladies, whose fellow-lodger he was about to become?"

The innkeeper was uncertain. "They went not abroad," he said, "and received no one at home."

"With the exception, I presume, of Maître Pierre?" said Durward.

"I am not at liberty to name any exceptions," answered the man, firmly, but respectfully.

Quentin, who carried the notions of his own importance pretty high, considering how destitute he was of means to support them, being somewhat mortified by the innkeeper's reply, did not hesitate to avail himself of a practice common enough in that age.

"Carry to the ladies," he said, "a flask of vernat, with my humble duty; and say, that Quentin Durward, of the house of Glen-houlak, a Scottish cavalier of honour, and now their fellow-lodger, desires the permission to dedicate his homage to them in a personal interview."

The messenger departed, and returned, almost instantly, with the thanks of the ladies, who declined the proffered refreshment, and with their acknowledgments to the Scottish cavalier, regretted that, residing there in privacy, they could not receive his visit.

Quentin bit his lip, took a cup of the rejected vernat, which the host had placed on the table. "By the mass, but this is a strange country," said he to himself, "where merchants and mechanics exercise the manners and munificence of nobles, and little travelling damsels, who hold their court in a cabaret, keep their state like dispossessed princesses! I will see that black-browed maiden again, or it will go hard, however;" and having formed this prudent resolution, he demanded to be conducted to the apartment which he was to call his own.

The landlord presently ushered him up a turret staircase, and from thence along a gallery, with many doors opening from it, like those of cells in a convent; a resemblance which our young hero, who recollected, with much envy, an early specimen of a monastic life, was far from admiring. The host paused at the very end of the gallery, selected a key from the large bunch which he carried at his girdle, opened the door, and showed his guest the interior of a turret-chamber, small, indeed, but which, being clean and solitary, and having the pallet bed, and the few articles of furniture, in unusually good order, seemed, on the whole, a little palace.

"I hope you will find your dwelling agreeable here, fair sir," said the landlord.—"I am bound to pleasure every friend of Maître Pierre."

"O happy ducking!" exclaimed Quentin Durward, cutting a caper on the floor, so soon as his host had retired: "Never came good luck in a better or a wetter form. I have been fairly deluged by my good fortune."

As he spoke thus, he stepped toward the little window, which, as the turret projected considerably from the principal line of the building, not only commanded a view of a very pretty garden, of some extent, belonging to the inn, but overlooked, beyond its boundary, a pleasant grove of those very mulberry trees, which Maître Pierre was said to have planted for the support of the silk-worm. Besides, turning the eye from these more remote objects, and looking straight along the wall, the turret of Quentin was opposite to another turret, and the little window at which he stood commanded a similar little window, in a corresponding projection of the building. Now, it would be difficult for a man twenty years older than Quentin, to say why this locality interested him more than either the pleasant garden or the grove of mulberry trees; for, alas! eyes which have been used for forty years and upwards, look with indifference on little turret-windows, though the lattice be half open to admit the air, while the shutter is half closed to exclude the sun, or perhaps a too curious eye—say, even though there hang on the one side of the casement a lace, partly mantled by a light veil of emerald silk. But, at Durward's happy age, such accidents as a painter would call them, form sufficient foundation for a hundred airy visions and mysterious conjectures, at recollection of which the full-grown man smiles while he sighs, and sighs while he smiles.

As it may be supposed that our friend Quentin wished to learn a little more of his fair neighbour, the owner of the lace and veil,—as it may be supposed he was at least interested to know whether she might not prove the same whom he had seen in humble attendance on Maître Pierre, it must of course be understood, that he did not produce a broad staring visage and person in full front of his own casement. Durward knew better the art of bird-catching, and it was to his keeping his person skilfully withdrawn on one side of his window, while he peeped through the lattice, that he owed the pleasure of seeing a white, round, beautiful arm, take down the movement, and that his ears had presently after their share in the reward of his dexterous management.

The maid of the little turret, of the veil, and of the lace, sang exactly such an air as we are accustomed to suppose flowed from the lips of the high-born dame of chivalry when knights and troubadours listened and languished. The words had neither so much ornament, or fancy, as to withdraw the attention from the music, nor the music so much of art, as to draw off feeling of the words. The one seemed fitted to the other, and if the song had been recited without the notes, or the air played without the words, neither would have been worth noting. It is, therefore, scarcely fair to put upon record lines intended not to be said or read, but only to be sung. But such scraps of old poetry have always had a sort of fascination for us; and as the tune is lost for ever, unless Bishop happens to find the notes, or some lark teaches Stephen to warble the air—we will risk our credit, and the taste of the Lady of the Lake, by presenting the verses, simple and even rude as they are.

"Ah! County Day, the hour is nigh,
The sun has left the inn,
The orange flower perfumes the breeze,
The breeze is on the inn,
The lark, his lay who thrills all day,
His wish'd his partner nigh;
Sweet, bird, and flower, breathe the breeze,
But where is County Day?"

"The village maid stands through the shade,
Her shepherd's dart to hand;
To beauty she, by beauty high,
Sings high-born Cavalier
The air of Love, all eyes above,
How reigns o'er earth and sky,
And high and low the influence flows—
But where is County Day?"

Whatever the reader may think of this simple ditty, it had a powerful effect on Quentin, when sung by a heavenly air, and sung by a sweet and melting voice, the notes mingling with the gentle breeze which wafted perfumes from the garden, and the figure of the songstress being so partially and so securely visible, as threw a veil of mysterious fascination over the whole.

At the close of the air, the listener could not help showing himself more boldly than he had yet done, in a rash attempt to see more than he had yet been able to discover. The music mysteriously ceased—the casement was closed, and a dark curtain, dropped on the inside, put a stop to all farther observation on the part of the neighbour in the next turret.

Durward was mortified and surprised at the consequence of his precipitance, but comforted himself with the hope, that the Lady of the Lake could under easily forego the practice of an retirement which seemed so familiar to her, nor readily resolve to renounce the pleasures of fresh air and an open window, for the childish purpose of preserving for her own comfort the sweet music which she created. There came, perhaps, a little feeling of personal vanity to mingle with these consolatory reflections. If, as he shrilly there was a beautiful dark tressed damsel of the one turn, he could not but be content a handsome young, roving, bright look, a cavalier of Britain, was the tenant of and romantic, those prudent instructors, the youth, that if damsels were shy, they neither void of interest nor of curiosity in their affairs.

Quentin was engaged in these vain reflections of attendant or chamberlain of the man that a cavalier desired to speak with.

CHAPTER V.

THE MAN-AT-ARMS.

of strange mien, and humped like the post, to British reputation came to the country's mouth.

As You Like It.

After who awaited Quentin Durward's departure from the apartment where he had breakfasted, of those of whom Louis XI. had long since they held in their hands the fortunes of the throne were intrusted the direct custody of the royal person.

The Sixth had constituted this celebrated Archers, as they were called, of the Scots-guard, with better reason than can be imagined for establishing round the throne a strong and mercenary troops. The divisions of the French had more than half of France, with the wavering and uncertain faith of the to yet acknowledged his cause, rendered it and unable to commit his personal safety to him. The Scottish nation was the herald of the English, and the enemy, and, as the natural allies of France. They were known, faithful, their ranks were more to them the experienced population of country, than which none in Europe could be better adventurers. Their high claims, too, gave them a good title to approach of a monarch more closely than other the comparative smallness of their numbers the possibility of their mutinying, and matters where they ought to be servants.

On the other hand, the French monarchs made it to conclude the affection of the select soldiers, by allowing them honorary privilage pay, which lost most of them discipline military profession in supporting their caprice. Each of them ranked as a gentleman in honour; and their near approach to the king gave them dignity in their own eyes, as portages in those of the nation of France, sumptuously armed, equipped, and mounted and was entitled to allowance for a squire, page, and two valets, one of whom was called, from the large knife which he wore to them whom in the middle his master had the ground. With these followers, and a long equipage, an Archer of the Scottish was a person of quality and importance; and being generally filled up by those who had all in the service as pages or valets, the noblest Scottish families were often sent to a game of cards and relation in these capacities of preference should occur when and his companion, not being noble or this promotion, were recruited from persons quality; but as their pay and appointments limit, their masters were easily able to accompany their wandering countrymen the and most courageous to wait upon them in cities.

And, as we shall more frequently call him, by which name he was generally known, was upwards of six feet high, roguish compact in person, and hard favoured countenance, which latter attribute was much in a large and ghastly scar, which, beginning above the nose, and narrowly meeting his right eye, gave the cheek-bone, and descended from thence almost to the tip of his ear, exhibiting a deep scar, which was sometimes scarlet, sometimes purple, sometimes blue, and sometimes approaching to black, but always hideous, because at variance with the complexion of the face in whatever state it changed to be, whether agitated or still, flushed with unusual passion, or in its ordinary state of weather-beaten and sunburnt swarthiness.

His dress and arms were splendid. He wore his national bonnet, crested with a tuft of feathers, and with a Virgin Mary of massive silver for a brooch. These brooches had been presented to the Scottish Guard, in consequence of the King, in one of his fits of superstitious piety, having devoted the sword of his guard to the service of the Holy Virgin, and, as some say, carried the matter so far as to draw out a commission to Our Lady as their Captain General. The Archer's gorget, arm pieces, and gauntlets, were of the finest steel, curiously enlaid with silver, and his hauberk, or shirt of mail, was as clear and bright as the frostwork of a winter morning upon fern or heath. He wore a loose surcoat, or camock, of rich blue velvet, open at the sides like that of a herald, with a large white St. Andrew's cross of embroidered silver bearing it both before and behind; his knees and legs were protected by busks of mail and shoes of steel. A broad silver pendant, called the Mirvy of God, hung by his right side; the he drew for his two-handed sword, richly embroidered being upon his left shoulder, but his real weapon, he at present carried in his hand that unwieldy weapon, which the realm of his service fastened him to by a side.

Quentin Durward thought like the Scottish youth of the period, he had been early taught to look upon arms and war though he had never seen a more martial looking, or more completely equipped and accomplished man at arms, than now mounted him in the person of his mother's brother, called Ludovic with the Moor, or Le Halastré; yet he could not but shrink a little from the grim expression of his countenance, while with its rough mustaches, he brushed first the one and then the other cheek of his kinsman, welcomed his nephew to France, and, in the same breath, asked what news from Scotland.

"Little good tidings, dear uncle," replied young Durward; "but I am glad that you know me so readily."

"I would have known thee, boy, in the lanes of Bordeaux, had I met thee marching there like a crane on a pair of stilts.* But at thee down—on thee down—if there is sorrow to hear of, we will have wine to make us hear it.—Ho! old Pinch Measure, our good host, bring us of thy best, and that is an instant."

The well known sound of the Scottish French was as familiar in the taverns near Plume, as that of the Swiss-French in the modern guinguettes of Paris; and promptly—ay, with the promptitude of fear and reverence, was it heard and obeyed. A flagon of champagne stood before them, of which the older took a draught, while the nephew helped himself only to a moderate sip, to acknowledge his uncle's courtesy, saying, in excuse, that he had already drunk wine that morning.

"That had been a rare good apology in the mouth of thy mother for nephew," said Le Halastré; "you must fear the wine-pot less, if you would wear beads on your face, and write yourself moine. But come—come—unbuckle your Scottish road bag—give us the news of Glen-houlakin—How doth my sister?"

"Dead, fair uncle," answered Quentin, sorrowfully.

"Dead?" echoed his uncle, with a tone rather marked by wonder than sympathy—"why, she was five years younger than I, and I was never better in my life. Dead? the thing is impossible. I have never had so much as a headache, unless after revelling out my two or three days' surlough with the brethren of the joyous countess—and my poor mother is dead? And your father, fair nephew, hath he married again?"

And ere the youth could reply, he read the answer in his surprise at the question, and said, "What!

* The stilts or stiles, which in Scotland are used to pass rivers. They are employed by the property of the country near Glasgow, to traverse these depths of lochs and called Canals.

no?—I would have sworn that Allan Durward was no man to live without a wife. He loved to have his house in order—he loved to look on a pretty woman too; and was somewhat strict in life withal—matrimony did all this for him. Now, I care little about these comforts; and I can look on a pretty woman without thinking on the sacrament of wedlock—I am scarce holy enough for that."

"Alas! dear uncle, my mother was left a widow a year since, when Glen-houlakin was harried by the Ogilvies. My father, and my two uncles, and my two elder brothers, and seven of my kinsmen, and the harper, and the tasker, and some six more of our people, were killed in defending the castle; and there is not a burning hearth or a standing stone in all Glen-houlakin."

"Cross of Saint Andrew!" said Le Balafre; "that is what I call an onslaught! Ay, these Ogilvies were ever but sorry neighbours to Glen-houlakin—an evil chance it was; but fate of war—fate of war.—When did this mishap befall, fair nephew?" With that he took a deep draught of wine, and shook his head with much solemnity, when his kinsman replied, that his family had been destroyed upon the festival of Saint Jude last by-past.

"Look ye there," said the soldier; "I said it was all chance—on that very day, I and twenty of my comrades carried the Castle of Roche-noir by storm, from Amaury Bras-de-fer, a captain of free lances, whom you must have heard of. I killed him on his own threshold, and gained as much gold as made this fair chain, which was once twice as long as it now is—and that minds me to send part of it on a holy errand.—Here, Andrew—Andrew!"

Andrew, his yeomen, entered, dressed like the Archer himself in the general equipment, but without the armour for the limbs—that of the body more coarsely manufactured—his cap without a plume, and his cassock made of serge, or ordinary cloth, instead of rich velvet. Untwining his gold chain from his neck, Balafre twisted off, with his firm and strong set teeth, about four inches from the one end of it, and said to his attendant, "Here, Andrew, carry this to my gossip, jolly Father Boniface, the monk of Saint Martin's—greet him well from me, by the same token that he could not say God save ye when we last parted at midnight—Tell my gossip, that my brother and sister, and some others of my house, are all dead and gone, and I pray him to say masses for their souls as far as the value of these links will carry him, and to do on trust what else may be necessary to free them from Purgatory. And hark ye, as they were just-living people, and free from all heresy, it may be that they are well-nigh out of limbo already, so that a little matter may have them free of the fetlocks; and in that case, look ye, ye will say I desire to take out the balance of the gold in curses upon a generation called the Ogilvies of Angus-shire, in what way soever the church may best come at them. You understand all this, Andrew?"

The coutelier nodded.

"Then look that none of the links find their way to the wine-house ere the Monk touches them; for if it so chance, thou shalt taste of saddle-girth and stirrup-leather, till thou art as raw as Saint Bartholomew.—Yet hold, I see thy eye has fixed on the wine measure, and thou shalt not go without tasting."

So saying, he filled him a brimful cup, which the coutelier drank off, and retired to do his patron's commission.

"And now, fair nephew, let us hear what was your own fortune in this unhappy matter."

"I fought it out among those who were older and stouter than I was, till we were all brought down," said Durward, "and I received a cruel wound."

"Not a worse slash than I received ten years since myself," said Le Balafre.—"Look at this now, my fair nephew," tracing the dark crimson gash which was imprinted on his face—"An Ogilvie's sword never ploughed so deep a furrow."

"They ploughed deep enough," answered Quentin, sadly; "but they were tired at last, and my mother's entreaties procured mercy for me, when I was found to retain some spark of life; but although a learned monk of Aberbrothick, who chanced to be our guest at the fatal time, and narrowly escaped being killed in the fray, was permitted to bind my wounds, and finally to remove me to a place of safety, it was only on promise, given both by my mother and him, that I should become a monk."

"A monk!" exclaimed the uncle—"Holy Saint Andrew! that is what never befell me. No one, from my childhood upwards, ever so much as dreamed of making me a monk—And yet I wonder when I think of it; for you will allow that, bating the reading and writing, which I could never learn, and the psalmody, which I could never endure, and the dress, which is that of a mad beggar—Our Lady forgive me!—[here he crossed himself]—and their fasts, which do not suit my appetite, I would have made every whit as good a monk as my little gossip at Saint Martin's yonder. But I know not why, none ever proposed the station to me.—O so, fair nephew, you were to be a monk, then—and wherefore, I pray you?"

"That my father's house might be ended, either in the cloister or in the tomb," answered Quentin, with deep feeling.

"I see," answered his uncle—"I comprehend cunning rogues—very cunning!—They might have been cheated, though; for, look ye, fair nephew, I myself remember the canon Robersart who had taken the vows, and afterwards broke out of cloister, and became a captain of Free Companions. He had a mistress, the prettiest wench I ever saw, and three beautiful children—There is no trusting monks, fair nephew,—no trusting them—they may become soldiers and fathers when you least expect it—but on with your tale."

"I have little more to tell," said Durward, "except that, considering my poor mother to be in some degree a pledge for me, I was induced to take upon me the dress of a novice, and conformed to the cloister rules, and even learned to read and write."

"To read and write!" exclaimed Le Balafre, who was one of that sort of people who think all knowledge is miraculous which chances to exceed their own—"To write, say'st thou, and to read! I cannot believe it—never Durward could write his name that ever I heard of, nor Lealy either. I can answer for one of them—I can no more write than I can fly. Now, in Saint Louis's name, how did they teach you?"

"It was troublesome at first," said Durward, "but became more easy by use; and I was weak with my wounds and loss of blood, and desirous to gratify my preserver, Father Peter, and so I was the more easily kept to my task. But after several months' languishing, my good kind mother died, and as my health was now fully restored, I communicated to my benefactor, who was also Sub-Prior of the Convent, my reluctance to take the vows; and it was agreed between us, since my vocation lay not to the cloister, that I should be sent out into the world to seek my fortune, and that, to save the Sub-Prior from the anger of the Ogilvies, my departure should have the appearance of flight; and to colour it, I brought off the Abbot's hawk with me. But I was regularly dismissed, as will appear from the hand and seal of the Abbot himself."

"That is right—that is well," said his uncle. "Our King cares little what other theft thou mayst have made, but hath a horror at any thing like a breach of the cloister. And, I warrant thee, thou hadst no great treasure to bear thy charges?"

"Only a few pieces of silver," said the youth; "for to you, fair uncle, I must make a free confession."

"Alas!" replied Le Balafre, "that is hard. Now, though I am never a hoarder of my pay, because it doth ill to bear a charge about one in these perilous times, yet I always have (and I would advise you to follow my example) some odd gold chain, or bracelet, or carcanet, that serves for the ornament of my person, and can at need spare a superfluous link or two, or it may be a superfluous stone for sale, that can answer any immediate purpose.—But you may ask, fair kinsman, how you are to come by such toys as this?"—(he shook his chain with complacent triumph)—"They hang not on every bush—they grow not in the side like the daffodils, with whose stalks children's knights' collars. What then?—you may get me where I get this, in the service of the good King of France, where there is always wealth to be found, & none has but the heart to seek it, at the risk of a life or so."

"I understood," said Quentin, evading a question which he felt himself as yet scarcely competent, that the Duke of Burgundy keeps a more noble steed than the King of France, and that there is more money to be won under his banners—that good blows & struck there, and deeds of arms done; while the good Christian King, they say, gains his victories by a diplomatist's tongue."

"You speak like a foolish boy, fair nephew," answered he with the Bear; "and yet, I bethink me, long I came hither I was nearly as simple. I did never think of a King but what I supposed him sitting under the high dam, and feasting amid a high vassals and Palatines, eating blanc-manger, with a great gold crown upon his head, or else charging at the head of his troops like Charlemagne in a ruminator, or like Robert Bruce or William Wallace in our own true histories, such as Barbour and a Minstrel. Hark in thine ear, man—it is all nonsense in the water. Policy—policy does it all, as what is policy, you will say? It is an art that such King of ours has thrust out, to fight with other men's swords and to wage his soldiers out of other men's purses. Ah! it is the wisest Prince that ever set purple on his back—and yet he weareth not much of that neither—I see him often go plainer than I would deem him to do."

"But you must not my exception, fair uncle," answered young Durward; "I would serve, since ere I must in a foreign land, somewhere where a new deed, were it my hap to do one, might work a change."

"I understood you, my fair nephew," said the great man-at-arms; "I understood you passing all; but you are unwise in these matters. The Duke of Burgundy is a hot-brained, impetuous, judging, non-ribbed dare-all. He charges at the head of his nobles and brave knights, his banners of Arms and Hamlet, think you, if you were here, or if I were there myself, that we could be sent farther forward than the Duke and all his own nobles of his own land? If we were not up with them, we had a chance to be turned on the 'rarest Marshal's hands, for being slow in making it, if we were chosen of them, all would be called off, and we might be thought to have deserved or pay; and grant that I was a spear's-length or so; the best which is both difficult and dangerous in such a case where all do their best, why, my lord says, as his Flemish tongue, when he saw a man blow struck, 'He! gut getroffen! a good lance—a heavy blow—gave him a storm to drink our health; at another rank, my lands, my treasures, come to be stronger in such a service—all goes to the child of the end."

"And where should it go, in Heaven's name, fair uncle?" demanded young Durward.

"To him that protects the children of the soil," said Balafre, drawing up his gigantic height. "Thus says King Louis—'My good French peasant—my good English Boheemian—get you in your tools, my plough and your harrow, your pruning knife and your hoe—here is my gallant Scot that will get for you, and you shall only have the trouble to my him—And you, my most serene duke, my illustrious count, and my most highly married, & on you up our fiery courage till it is wanted, for it is apt to burst out of the scabbard, and to hurt its master, here is my company of ordnance—here are my French lances—here are, above all, my Scottish Archers, of whom honest Ludovic with the Bear, who will get me well or better than you, with all that undisciplined valor, which, in your fathers' time, has won many and famous.' Now, are you not in which I place states a cavalier of fortune holds the highest rank, and must come to the highest honour?"

"I think I understand you, fair uncle," answered he nephew; "but, in my mind, however content be won where there is no risk. Sure, this is—I pray you pardon me—an easy and almost slothful life, to sit round an elderly man whom no one thinks of harming, to spend summer-day and winter-night up in your battlements, and shut up all the while in iron cages, for fear you should desert your points—uncle, uncle, it is but the hawk upon his perch, who is never carried out to the fields?"

"Now, by Saint Martin of Tours, the boy has some spirit! a right touch of the Lady in him; much like myself, though always with a little more folly in it. Hark ye, youth—Long live the King of France!"

"I would a day but there is some commission on hand, by which some of his followers may win both coin and credit. Think not that the bravest and most dangerous deeds are done by day-light. I could tell you of arms, of seeking castles, making prisoners, and the like, where one who shall be nameless both run higher risk, and gained greater favour, than any desperado in the train of desperate Charles of Burgundy. And if it please his Majesty to remain behind, and in the background, while such things are doing, he hath the more leisure of spirit to edify, and the more liberality of hand to reward the adventures, whose dangers, perhaps, and whose feats of arms, he can better judge of, than if he had personally shared them. O, 'tis a dangerous and most politic monarch!"

His nephew panned, and then said, in a low but impressive tone of voice, "The good Father Peter used often to teach me there might be much danger in deeds by which little glory was acquired. I need not say to you, fair uncle, that I do in covert suppose that these secret commissions must needs be honourable."

"For whom or for what take you me, fair nephew?" said Balafre, somewhat sternly; "I have not been trained, indeed, in the cloister, neither can I write nor read. But I am your mother's brother; I am a loyal Lady. Think you that I am like to be returned to you any thing unworthy? The best knight in France, De Guiselin himself, if he were alive again, might be proud to number my deeds among his achievements."

"I cannot doubt your warranty, fair uncle," said the youth; "you are the only adviser my nephew has left me. But is it true, as some say, that this King keeps a menagerie Court here at his Castle of Pleasure? No repair of nobles or courtiers, none of his grand favourites in attendance, none of the high officers of the crown; half solitary sports, shared only with the menials of his household; secret councils, to which only low and obscure men are invited; rank and nobility depressed, and men raised from the lowest origin to the kingly favour—all this seems unregarded, resembles not the manners of his father, the noble Charles, who tore from the hands of the English him this more than half-conquered kingdom of France?"

"You speak like a giddy child," said Le Balafre; "and even as a child, you harp over the same notes on a new string. Look you, if the King employs Oliver Dain, his barber, to do what Oliver can do better than any pair of them all, is not the kingdom the richer? If he bids his stout Provost-Marshal, Tristan, arrest such or such a mischievous burgher, take off such or such a turbulent noble, the deed is done and no more of it; when, were the commission given to a duke or peer of France, he might purchase and the King back a defiance in exchange. If again, the King pleases to give to plain Ludovic le Balafre a commission which he will execute, instead of employing the High Constable, who would perhaps betray it, doth it not show wisdom? Above all, doth not a monarch of such conditions best suit cavaliers of fortune, who must go where their services are most highly prized, and most frequently in demand?"

"No, no, child, I tell thee Louis knows how to choose his confidants, and what to charge them with; trusting, as they say, the burden to each man's back. He is not like the King of Castile, who choked of thirst, because the great butler was not beside to hand his cup.—But hark to the bell of Saint Martin's! I must hasten back to the Castle.—Farewell—think much of yourself, and at eight to-morrow morning present yourself before the drawbridge, and ask the sentinel for me. Take heed you step not off the straight and beaten path in approaching the portal! There are such traps and snap-haunches as may cost you a limb, which you will sorely miss. You shall see the King, and learn to judge him for yourself—farewell.”

So saying, Balafre hastily departed, forgetting, in his hurry, to pay for the wine he had called for, a shortness of memory incidental to persons of his description, and which his host, overawed, perhaps, by the nodding bonnet and ponderous two-handed sword, did not presume to use any efforts for correcting.

It might have been expected that, when left alone, Durward would have again betaken himself to his turret, in order to watch for the repetition of those delicious sounds which had soothed his morning reverie. But that was a chapter of romance, and his uncle's conversation had opened to him a page of the real history of life. It was no pleasing one, and for the present the recollections and reflections which it excited, were qualified to overpower other thoughts, and especially all of a light and soothing nature.

Quentin resorted to a solitary walk along the banks of the rapid Cher, having previously inquired of his landlord for one which he might traverse without fear of disagreeable interruption from snares and pitfalls, and there endeavoured to compose his turmoiled and scattered thoughts, and consider his future motions, upon which his meeting with his uncle had thrown some dubiety.

CHAPTER VI.

THE BOHEMIANS.

See rantingly, see wantonly,
See dauntingly good he,
He play'd a spring and danced a round
Beneath the gallows-tree!—Old Song.

THE manner in which Quentin Durward had been educated, was not of a kind to soften the heart, or perhaps to improve the moral feeling. He, with the rest of his family, had been trained to the chase as an amusement, and taught to consider war as their only serious occupation, and that it was the great duty of their lives stubbornly to endure, and fiercely to retaliate, the attacks of their feudal enemies, by whom their race had been at last almost annihilated. And yet there mixed with these feuds a spirit of rude chivalry, and even courtesy, which softened their rigour; so that revenge, their only justice, was still prosecuted with some regard to humanity and generosity. The lessons of the worthy old monk, better attended to, perhaps, during a long illness and adversity, than they might have been in health and success, had given young Durward still farther insight into the duties of humanity towards others; and, considering the ignorance of the period, the general prejudices entertained in favour of a military life, and the manner in which he himself had been bred, the youth was disposed to feel more accurately the moral duties incumbent on his station than was usual at the time.

He reflected on his interview with his uncle with a sense of embarrassment and disappointment. His hopes had been high; for although intercourse by letters was out of the question, yet a pilgrim, or an adventurous trafficker, or a crippled soldier, sometimes brought Lesly's name to Glen-houlakin, and all united in praising his undaunted courage, and his success in many petty enterprises which his master had intrusted to him. Quentin's imagination had filled up the sketch in his own way, and assimilated his successful and adventurous uncle (whose exploits probably lost nothing in the telling) to some of the champions and knights-errant of whom minstrels sang, and who won crowns and kings' daughters by dint of sword and lance. He was now compelled to rank his kinsman greatly lower in the scale of chivalry; but blinded by the high respect paid to parents, and those who approach that character—moved by every early prejudice in his favour—inexperienced besides, and passionately attached to his mother's memory, he saw not, in the only brother of that dear relation, the character he truly held, which was that of an ordinary mercenary soldier, neither much worse nor greatly better than many of the same profession whose presence added to the distracted state of France.

Without being wantonly cruel, Le Balafre was, from habit, indifferent to human life and human suffering; he was profoundly ignorant, greedy of booty, unscrupulous how he acquired it, and profuse in expending it on the gratification of his passions. The habit of attending exclusively to his own wants and interests, had converted him into one of the most selfish animals in the world; so that he was seldom able, as the reader may have remarked, to proceed far in any subject without considering how it applied to himself, or, as it is called, making the case his own, though not upon feelings connected with the golden rule, but such as were very different. To this must be added, that the narrow round of his duties and his pleasures had gradually circumscribed his thoughts, hopes, and wishes, and quenched in a great measure the wild spirit of honour, and desire of distinction in arms, by which his youth had been once animated. Balafre was, in short, a keen soldier, hardened, selfish, and narrow-minded; active and bold in the discharge of his duty, but acknowledging few objects beyond it, except the formal observance of a careless devotion, relieved by an occasional debauch with brother Boniface, his comrade and confessor. Had his genius been of a more extended character, he would probably have been promoted to some important command, for the King, who knew every soldier of his body-guard personally, reposed much confidence in Balafre's courage and fidelity; and, besides, the Scot had either wisdom or cunning enough perfectly to understand, and ably to humour, the peculiarities of that sovereign. Still, however, his capacity was too much limited to admit of his rising to higher rank, and though smiled on and favoured by Louis on many occasions, Balafre continued a mere Life-guard's-man, or Scottish Archer.

Without seeing the full scope of his uncle's character, Quentin felt shocked at his indifference to the disastrous extirpation of his brother-in-law's whole family, and could not help being surprised, moreover, that so near a relative had not offered him the assistance of his purse, which, but for the generosity of Maitre Pierre, he would have been under the necessity of directly craving from him. He wronged his uncle, however, in supposing that this want of attention to his probable necessities was owing to avarice. Not precisely needing money himself at that moment, it had not occurred to Balafre that his nephew might be in exigencies; otherwise, he held a near kinsman as much a part of himself, that he would have provided for the weal of the living nephew, as he endeavoured to do for that of his deceased sister and her husband. But whatever was the motive, the neglect was very unsatisfactory to young Durward, and he wished more than once he had taken service with the Duke of Burgundy before he quarrelled with his forester. "Whatever had then become of me," he thought to himself, "I should always have been able to keep up my spirits with the reflection, that I had, in case of the worst, a stout back-friend in this uncle of mine. But now I have seen him, and, wo worth him, there has been more help in a mere mechanical stranger, than I have found in my own mother's brother, my countryman and a cavalier! One would think the slash, that has carved all comeliness out of his face, had let at the same time every drop of gentle blood out of his body."

Durward now regretted he had not had an opportunity to mention Maitre Pierre to La Balafre in the hope of obtaining some farther account of that personage; but his uncle's questions had followed fast on each other, and the summons of the great bell of Saint Martin of Tours had broken off their conference rather suddenly. That old man, he thought to himself, was crabbed and dogged in appearance, sharp and scornful in language, but generous and liberal in his actions; and such a stranger is worth a cold kinsman—"What says our old Scotch proverb?"

and from, than from hundred. I will that man, which, methinks, should be no less, more so as so wealthy as mine host here. He will give me good advice for my own, at least; and if he goes to strange countries such as, I know not but he may be as well a service as that of those Guards of None of whom, my dear son?" said one of them.

And you, friend, if you would show words to us, in the name of God, our Lady of us, and Saint Martin of Tours, and trouble about your Maître Pierre, which may be unspeakable for the devil, for aught we know."

And finding himself much the weaker party, he went down to walk on without reply; quentyn, who at first shrunk from him in his supposed talent for society and grape-look heart of grace as he got to a distance, uttered a few cries and curses, finally emphasis with a shower of stones, almost a distance as to do him or no harm of their displeasure. Quentyn, as he passed, began to think, in his turn, either that "lay under a spell, or that the people of of strangers then amongst himself. The matter is dark, belonging to a person who had but too much sense to be a fool. It was left for him to my father, and with a strange sense of adventure, which he told. The weapon is now in my possession.

Touraine were the most stupid, brutal, and inhospitable of the French peasants. The next incident which came under his observation did not tend to diminish this opinion.

On a slight eminence, rising above the rapid and beautiful Cher, in the direct line of his path, two or three large chestnut trees were so happily placed as to form a distinguished and remarkable group; and beside them stood three or four peasants, motionless, with their eyes turned upwards and fixed, apparently, upon some object amongst the branches of the tree next to them. The meditations of youth are seldom so profound as not to yield to the slightest impulse of curiosity, as easily as the lightest pebble, dropped casually from the hand, breaks the surface of a limpid pool. Quentyn hastened his pace, and ran lightly up the rising ground, time enough to witness the ghastly spectacle which attracted the notice of those gaze—which was nothing less than the body of a man, convulsed by the last agony, suspended on one of the branches.

"Why do you not get me him down?" said the young Scot, whose hand was so ready to assist affliction, as to maintain his own honour when he deemed it so.

One of the peasants, turning on him an eye from which fear had banished all expression but its own, and a face as pale as clay, pointed to a mark cut upon the bark of the tree, having the same rude resemblance to a fleur-de-lis which certain talismanic scratches, well known to our revenue officers, bear to a broad arrow. Neither understanding nor heeding the import of this symbol, young Durward sprang lightly as the sunce up into the tree, drew from his pouch that most necessary implement of a Highlander or woodman, the trusty alone axe, and, calling to those below to receive the body on their hands, set the rope sounder in less than a minute after he had perceived the casualty.

But his humanity was disarmed by the by-standers. So far from rendering Durward any assistance, they seemed terrified at the audacity of his action, and took to flight with one consent, as if they feared their merely looking on might have been construed into accession to his daring deed. The body, unsupported from beneath, fell heavily to earth, in such a manner, that Quentyn, who promptly afterwards jumped down, had the mortification to see that the last sparks of life were extinguished. He gave not up his charitable purpose, however without further efforts. He freed the wretched man's neck from the fatal noose, undid the doublet, threw water on the face, and practised the other ordinary remedies resorted to for recalling suspended animation.

While he was thus humanely engaged, a wild clamour of tongues, speaking a language which he knew not, arose around him; and he had scarcely time to observe that he was surrounded by several men and women of a singular and foreign appearance, when he found himself roughly seized by both arms, while a naked knife, at the same moment, was offered to his throat.

"Pale slave of Elia?" said a man, in imperfect French, "are you robbing him you have murdered?—But we have you—and you shall atone it."

There were harrows drawn on every side of him as these words were spoken, and the grim and distorted countenances which glared on him, were like those of wolves rushing on their prey.

Still the young Scot's courage and promptness of mind were his out. "What mean ye, my masters?" he said; "if that be your friend's body, I have just now cut him down, in pure charity, and you will do better to try to remove his life, than to murder an innocent stranger to whom he owes his chance of escape."

The women had by this time taken possession of the dead body, and continued the attempts to recover animation which Durward had been making use of, though with the like had success, as that, desisting from their fruitless efforts, they seemed to abandon themselves to all the Oriental expressions of grief:

"That knife," a woman of dark without stamp or mark, scarcely used by the Highlander, who seldom carried without such an ally weapon, though it is now rarely used.

the women making a piteous wailing, and tearing their long black hair, while the men seemed to read their garments, and to sprinkle dust upon their heads. They gradually became so much engaged in their mourning rites, that they bestowed no longer any attention on Durward, of whom innocently they were probably excused from circumstances. It would certainly have been his wisest plan to have left these wild people to their own customs, but he had been bred in almost ruthless contempt of danger, and felt all the eagerness of youthful curiosity.

The singular assemblage, both male and female, wore turbans and caps, more similar, in general appearance, to his own bonnet, than to the hats commonly worn in France. Several of the men had curled black beards, and the complexion of all was nearly as dark as that of Africans. One or two, who seemed their chiefs, had some tawdry ornaments of silver about their necks and in their ears, and wore showy scarfs of yellow, or scarlet, or light green, but their legs and arms were bare, and the whole group seemed wretched and equalled in appearance. There were no weapons among them that Durward saw, except the long knives with which they had lately menaced him, and one short crooked sabre, or Moorish sword, which was worn by an active-looking young man, who often laid his hand upon the hilt, while he surpassed the rest of the party in his extravagant expressions of grief, and seemed to mingle with them threats of vengeance.

The disordered and yelling group were so different in appearance from any band whom Quentin had yet seen, that he was on the point of concluding them to be a party of Saracens, of those "heathen hounds," who were the opponents of gentle knights and Christian monarchs, in all the romances which he had heard or read, and was about to withdraw himself from a neighbourhood so perilous, when a galloping of horses was heard, and the supposed Saracens, who had ranged by this time the body of their comrades upon their shoulders, were at once charged by a party of French soldiers.

The sudden apparition changed the measured wailing of the mourners into irregular shrieks of terror. The body was thrown to the ground in an instant, and those who were around it, showed the utmost and most distressing activity in escaping, under the impulse as it were of the horses, from the point of the lances which were levelled at them, with exclamations of "Down with the accursed heathen thrave—take and kill—bind them like beasts—spare them like wolves!"

These cries were accompanied with corresponding acts of violence; but such was the shortness of the fight, the ground being rendered unfavourable to the horsemen by thickets and bushes, that only two were struck down and made prisoners, one of whom was the young fellow with the sword, who had previously offered some resistance. Quentin, whose fortune seemed at this period to have chosen for the best of his shafts, was at the same time saved by the soldiers, and his arms, in spite of his remonstrances, bound down with a cord, those who approached him showing a readiness and despatch in the operation, which proved them to be no novices in matters of police.

Looking anxiously to the leader of the horsemen, from whom he hoped to obtain liberty, Quentin knew not exactly whether to be pleased or alarmed upon recognizing in him the down-looking and silent companion of Maître Pierre. True, whatever crime these strangers might be accused of, the officer might know from the history of the morning, that he, Durward, had no connection with them whatever, but it was a more difficult question, whether this ally was to be either a favourable judge or a willing witness in his behalf, and he felt doubtful whether he would mend his condition by making any direct application to him.

But there was little leisure for hesitation. "Tyrus-Eschellus and Petit André," said the down-looking officer to two of his band, "these same men stand here quite convenient. I will teach these godless, thieving scoundrels, to interfere with the King's justice, when it has visited any of their accursed race. He mount, my children, and do your office bravely."

Tyrus-Eschellus and Petit André were in an instant on foot, and Quentin observed that they had each, at the crupper and pommel of his saddle, a coil or two of rope, which they hastily unrolled, and showed that, in fact, each coil formed a halter, with the fatal noose adjusted, ready for execution. The blood ran cold in Quentin's veins, when he saw these cords adroitly and perceived that it was proposed to put one round his own neck. He called on the officer loudly, reminding him of their meeting that morning, claiming the right of a free-born Scotsman, in a friendly and allied country, and denied any knowledge of the persons along with whom he was seized, or of the magnitude.

The officer whom Durward thus addressed, never deigned to look at him while he was speaking, and took no notice whatever of the claim he preferred to prior acquaintance. He barely turned to one of the peasants who were now coming forward, either to volunteer their services against the prisoner, or out of curiosity and not grossly, "Was yonder young fellow with the vagabonds?"

"That he was, sir, and it pleases your worship," answered one of the clowns, "to say the very best blasphemously to cut down the man whom his Majesty's justice most deservedly hangs, as we told your worship."

"I'll swear by God, and Saint Martin of Tours, to have seen him with these gang," said another, "when they pillaged our village."

"Nay, but, father," said a boy, "yonder heathen was black, and this youth is fair; yonder one had short curled hair, and this hath long fair locks."

"A child," said the peasant, "and perhaps you will say yonder one had a green coat and the other a grey jerkin. But his worship, the Provost, knows that they can change their accomplishments as easily as their gowns, so that I am still minded he was the same."

"It is enough that you have seen him intermeddle with the course of the King's justice, by attempting to remove an executioner's water," said the officer—"Tyrus-Eschellus and Petit André, dispatch."

"Stay, my lord officer," exclaimed the peasant in mortal agony—"hear me speak—let me not die guiltily—my blood will be required of you by my countrymen in this world, and by Heaven's justice in that which is to follow."

"I will answer for my actions in both," said the Provost, coldly, and spoke a sign with his left hand to the executioners; then, with a smile of triumph and majesty, touched with his forefinger his right eye, which hung suspended in a scorf, disfigured probably by the blow which Durward had dealt him that morning.

"Miserable, vindictive wretch!" answered Quentin, surprised by that action that private revenge was the only motive of this man's rigour, and that he mercy whatever was to be expected from him.

"The poor youth raves," said the executioner—"speak a word of comfort to him ere he makes his trundle, Tyrus-Eschellus; thou art a comfortable man in such cases, when a confessor is not to be had. Give him one minute of ghastly advice, and dispatch matters in the next. I must proceed on the route—Soldiers, follow me!"

The Provost rode on, followed by his guard, carrying two or three who were left to guard at the execution. The unhappy youth sat after him as if almost darkened by despair, and thought he had in every tramp of his horse's retreating hoofs the last slight chance of his escape vanished. He looked around him in agony, and was surprised, even at that moment, to see the singular indifference of his fellow-prisoners. They had previously testified every sign of fear, and made every effort to escape; but now when assured, and destined apparently to inevitable death, they awaited its arrival with the utmost composure. The count of his fellow-prisoners, grown paler, a more yellow tinge to their swarthy cheeks, but no further equalled their features, nor quenched the stubborn brightness of their eye. They seemed flames, which, after all their wild and awful attempts at escape are exhausted, die with a silent and an solitude, which wolves and bears, the fiercest yet of the chase, do not exhibit.

They were undaunted by the conduct of the fatal executioners, who went about their work with more resolution than their master had recommended.

which probably arose from their having acquired what a kind of pleasure in the discharge of their office. We pause an instant to describe them, since, under a tyranny, whether despotic or papal, the character of the hangman becomes a subject of grave importance.

These functionaries were essentially different in appearance and manners. Louis used to call the Provost, termed them, Jean-gas piers, and Jean-rôt.

Trou-Eschelle was a tall, thin, ghastly man, with peculiar gravity of visage, and a large round nose, the use of which he was accustomed to press as often to those officers on whom he did his duty.

had one or two Latin texts continually in his mouth on the nothingness and vanity of human life; and had it been regular to have enjoyed such a plenty, he might have held the office of confessor to the king in commendation with that of executioner. Petit-André, on the contrary, was a joyous-looking, and active little fellow, who rolled about in execution of his duty as if it were the most diverting occupation in the world. He seemed to have a sort of fond passion for his victims, and always spoke of them kindly and affectionate terms. They were his poor dear fellows, his pretty dears, his gumps, his good fathers, as their age or sex might be, and as Trou-Eschelle endeavoured to inspire them with a philosophical or religious regard to fatality, Petit-André sought to refresh them with a jest or two, as if induce them to pass from life as something that is tedious, contemptible, and not worthy of serious consideration.

cannot tell why or wherefore it was, but there are excellent persons, notwithstanding the variety of their talents, and the rare occurrence of such among ranks of their profession, were both more utterly tainted than, perhaps, any creatures of their kind, neither better or worse, and the only doubt of those who have sought of them was, whether the grave and their Trou-Eschelle, or the frisky, comical, alert Petit-André, was the object of the greatest fear or of a deeper execration. It is certain they bore the law in both particulars over every hangman in France, unless it were perhaps their master, Trou-Eschelle, the renowned Provost Marshal, or his son, Louis XI.

It must not be supposed that these reflections were Quentin Durward's making. Life, death, time, and truth, were swimming before his eyes—a swimming of overwhelming prospect, from which human nature recoiled in its weakness, though human pride said that he have borne up. He addressed himself to God of his fathers; and when he did so, the little dark and unroofed chapel, which now held almost all its space but himself, rushed on his recollection. "Our God preserve pass my hundred graves in our own land," he thought; "but I have lived the favours and the of a foreign land like an executioner's slave!" The words gushed involuntarily from his eyes. His father, Trou-Eschelle, who had never been greatly consoled him in his heaven's dispensation for death, spoke to him as he lay, Petit-André remarked the soul was happy that left the world, while the man was in the world. Petit-André clasped the other shoulder, called out, "I charge my father, if you must, against the darkness, let the hell open its eyes, for all the devils are in there, twisting the law at the same time, to give point to his joke. As

* One of these two persons, I learned from the Chronique de Louis XI, but too late to avail myself of the information. The words were commonly have been called Petit-Jean, then Petit-André. This was certainly the name of the son of Henry III., master executioner of the High Court of Justice by Quentin Durward was executed by him, with such dignity, that the king, who stood off, with the ground at his feet, with the body. This was a talk.

the youth turned his dismayed looks, first on one and then on the other, they made their meaning plainer by gently urging him forward to the fatal tier, and adding that he of good courage, for it would be over in a moment.

In this fatal predicament, the youth cast a distracted look around him. "Is there any good Christian who hears me," he said, "that will tell Ludovic Lesly of the Scottish Guard, called in this country Le Balafré, that his nephew is here basely murdered?"

The words were spoken in good time, for an Archer of the Scottish Guard, attracted by the preparations for the execution, was standing by, with one or two other chance-passengers, to witness what was passing.

"Take heed what you do," he said to the executioners: "if this young man be of Scottish birth, I will not permit him to have foul play."

"Heaven forbid, Sir Cavalier," said Trou-Eschelle; "but we must obey our orders," drawing Durward forward by one arm.

"The worst play is over the fence," said Petit-André, pulling him onward by the other.

But Quentin had heard words of comfort, and, exerting his strength, he suddenly shook off both the flayers of the law and with his arms still bound, ran to the Scottish Archer. "Stand by me, countryman," he said in his own language, "for the love of Scotland! and be not André! I am innocent—I am your own native landman. Stand by me, as you shall answer at the last day!"

"By Saint Andrew! they shall make at you through me," said the Archer, and unsheathed his sword.

"Cut my bonds, countryman," said Quentin, "and I will do something for myself."

Thus was done with a touch of the Archer's weapon; and the liberated captive, springing suddenly on one of the Provost's guard, wrested from him a halberd with which he was armed; "And now," he said, "Come on, if you dare!"

The two officers whispered together.

"Rule thou after the Provost-Marshal," said Trou-Eschelle, "and I will detain them here, if I can.—Soldiers of the Provost's guard, stand to your arms."

Petit-André mounted his horse and left the field, and the other Marshal's-man in attendance drew together as hastily at the command of Trou-Eschelle, that they suffered the other two prisoners to make their escape during the confusion. Perhaps they were not very anxious to detain them; for they had of late been satiated with the blood of such wretches, and, like other ferocious animals, were, through long slaughter, become tired of carnage. But the worst was, that they thought themselves immediately called upon to attend to the safety of Trou-Eschelle; for there was a jealousy, which occasionally led to open quarrels between the Scottish Archers and the Marshal's-guard, who executed the orders of their Provost.

"We are strong enough to beat the proud Scots twice over, if it be your pleasure," said one of these soldiers to Trou-Eschelle.

But that cautious official made a sign to him to remain quiet, and addressed the Scottish Archer with great civility. "Surely, sir, this is a great insult to the Provost-Marshal, that you should presume to interfere with the course of the King's justice, duty and lawfully committed to his charge; and it is no act of justice to me—who am in lawful possession of my criminal. Neither is it a well-meant kindness to the youth himself, seeing that fifty opportunities of hanging him may occur, without his being found in so happy a state of preparation as he was before your ill-advised interference."

"If my young countryman," said the Scot, smiling, "be of opinion I have done him an injury, I will return him to your charge without a word more dispute."

"No, no!—for the love of Heaven, no!" exclaimed Quentin. "I would rather you sweep my head off with your long sword—it would better become my birth, than to die by the hands of such a foul churl."

"Hear how he revileth!" said the flincher of the law. "Alas! how soon our best resolutions pass away!—he was in a blessed frame for departure but now, and in two minutes he has become a contemner of authorities."

"Tell me at once," said the Archer, "what has this young man done?"

"Interfered," answered Trois-Eschelles, with some earnestness, "to take down the dead body of a criminal, when the fleur-de-lys was marked on the tree where he was hung with my own proper hand."

"How is this, young man?" said the Archer; "how came you to have committed such an offence?"

"As I desire your protection," answered Durward, "I will tell you the truth as if I were at confession. I saw a man struggling on the tree, and I went to cut him down out of mere humanity. I thought neither of fleur-de-lys nor of clove-gilliflower, and had no more idea of offending the King of France than our Father the Pope."

"What a murrain had you to do with the dead body then?" said the Archer. "You'll see them hanging, in the rear of this gentleman, like grapes on every tree, and you will have enough to do in this country if you go a-gleaning after the hangman. However, I will not quit a countryman's cause if I can help it. —Hark ye, Master Marshal's-man, you see this is entirely a mistake. You should have some compassion on so young a traveller. In our country at home he has not been accustomed to see such active proceedings as yours and your master's."

"Not for want of need of them, Signior Archer," said Petit-André, who returned at this moment. —"Stand fast, Trois-Eschelles, for here comes the Provost-Marshal; we shall presently see how he will relish having his work taken out of his hand before it is finished."

"And in good time," said the Archer, "here come some of my comrades."

Accordingly, as the Provost Tristan rode up with his patrol on one side of the little hill which was the scene of the altercation, four or five Scottish Archers came as hastily up on the other, and at their head the Balafre himself.

Upon this urgency, Lesly showed none of that indifference towards his nephew of which Quentin had in his heart accused him; for he no sooner saw his comrade and Durward standing upon their defence, than he exclaimed, "Cunningham, I thank thee.—Gentlemen—comrades, lend me your aid—It is a young Scottish gentleman—my nephew—Lindesay—Guthrie—Tyrie, draw, and strike in!"

There was now every prospect of a desperate scuffle between the parties, who were not so disproportioned in numbers, but that the better arms of the Scottish cavaliers gave them an equal chance of victory. But the Provost-Marshal, either doubting the issue of the conflict, or aware that it would be disagreeable to the King, made a sign to his followers to forbear from violence, while he demanded of Balafre, who now put himself forward as the head of the other party, "What he, a cavalier of the King's Body Guard, purposed by opposing the execution of a criminal?"

"I deny that I do so," answered the Balafre. —"Saint Martin! there is, I think, some difference between the execution of a criminal, and the slaughter of my own nephew?"

"Your nephew may be a criminal as well as another, Signor," said the Provost-Marshal; "and every stranger in France is amenable to the laws of France."

"Yes, but we have privileges, we Scottish Archers," said Balafre; "have we not, comrades?"

"Yes, yes," they all exclaimed together. "Privileges—privileges! Long live King Louis—long live the bold Balafre—long live the Scottish Guard—and death to all who would infringe our privileges!"

"Take reason with you, gentlemen cavaliers," said the Provost-Marshal; "consider my commission."

"We will have no reason at your hand," said Cunningham; "our own officers shall do us reason. We will be judged by the King's grace, or by our own Captain, now that the Lord High Constable is not in presence."

"And we will be hanged by none," said Lindesay,

"but Sandie Wilson, the auld Marshal's-man of our ain body."

"It would be a positive cheating of Sandie, who is as honest a man as ever tied noose upon hemp, did we give way to any other proceeding," said the Balafre. "Were I to be hanged myself, no other should tie up-pet about my craig."

"But hear ye," said the Provost-Marshal, "this young fellow belongs not to you, and cannot share what you call your privileges."

"What we call our privileges, all shall admit to be such," said Cunningham.

"We will not hear them questioned!" was the universal cry of the Archers.

"Ye are mad, my masters," said Tristan l'Hermite —"No one disputes your privileges; but this youth is not one of you."

"He is my nephew," said the Balafre, with a triumphant air.

"But no Archer of the Guard, I think," retorted Tristan l'Hermite.

The Archers looked on each other in some uncertainty.

"Stand to it yet, comrade," whispered Cunningham to Balafre—"Say he is engaged with us."

"Saint Martin! you say well, fair countryman," answered Lesly; and, raising his voice, swore that he had that day enrolled his kinsman as one of his own retinue.

This declaration was a decisive argument.

"It is well, gentlemen," said the Provost Tristan, who was aware of the King's nervous apprehension of disaffection creeping in among his Guards—"You know, as you say, your privileges, and it is not my duty to have brawls with the King's Guards, if it is to be avoided. But I will report this matter for the King's own decision; and I would have you to be aware, that, in doing so, I act more mildly than perhaps my duty warrants me."

So saying, he put his troop into motion, while the Archers, remaining on the spot, held a hasty consultation what must next be done.

"We must report the matter to Lord Crawford, our Captain, in the first place, and have the young fellow's name put on the roll."

"But, gentlemen, and my worthy friends and preservers," said Quentin, with some hesitation, "I have not yet determined whether to take service with you or no."

"Then settle in your own mind," said his uncle. "whether you choose to do so, or be hanged—for I promise you, that, nephew of mine as you are, I see no other chance of your 'escaping the gallows'."

This was an unanswerable argument, and reduced Quentin at once to acquiesce in what he might have otherwise considered as no very agreeable proposal; but the recent escape from the halter, which had been actually around his neck, would probably have reconciled him to a worse alternative than was proposed.

"He must go home with us to our caserne," said Cunningham; "there is no safety for him out of our bounds, whilst these man-hunters are prowling about."

"May I not then abide for this night at the hostelry where I breakfasted, fair uncle?" said the youth—thinking, perhaps, like many a new recruit, that even a single night of freedom was something gained.

"Yes, fair nephew," answered his uncle, ironically, "that we may have the pleasure of fishing you out of some canal or moat, or perhaps out of a loop of the Loire, knit up in a sack, for the greater convenience of swimming—for that is like to be the end on't.—The Provost-Marshal smiled on us when we parted," continued he, addressing Cunningham, "and that is a sign his thoughts were dangerous."

"I care not for his danger," said Cunningham; "such game as we are beyond his bird-bolts. But I would have thee tell the whole to the Devil's Oliver, who is always a good friend to the Scottish Guard, and will see Father Louis before the Provost can, for he is to shave him to-morrow."

"But hark you," said Balafre, "it is ill going to Oliver empty-handed, and I am as bare as the birch in December."

"we all," said Cunningham—"Oliver must take our Scottish words for once. We will put up something handsome among us against pay-day; and if he expects to share, let him wait, for the pay-day will come about all the now for the Chateau," said Balafré; "and we shall tell us by the way how he brought the Marshal on his shoulders, that we may be able to frame our report both to Crawford and the Bohemians.—In a former volume of this edition of the Novels, (Guy Mannering,) the reader will find a description of the gipsies as they are found in Scotland.—It is known that this extraordinary variety of the human race, in nearly the same primitive state, speaking the same language, in almost all the kingdoms of Europe, and concerning themselves in the same manner, and the people around them remaining separated from them by certain distinctions, in which they correspond with each other, maintain their pretensions to be considered as a distinct race. Their first appearance in Europe took place in the beginning of the fifteenth century, when various bands of this singular race appeared in the different countries of Europe. They were of Egyptian descent, and their features attested that they were of Eastern origin. The account given by these singular people, that it was appointed to them, as a penance, to wander about for a certain number of years. This apology was probably being most congenial to the superstitions of the people which they visited. Their appearance, however, and their conduct, strongly contradicted the allegation that they travelled for religious motives.

Their dress and accoutrements were at once showy and squallid. They acted as captains and leaders of any horde, and appeared as their commanders, were arrayed in the most showy colours, such as scarlet or light blue, and were well mounted; assumed the title of dukes and affected considerable consequence. The rest of the horde were miserable in their diet and apparel, fed without any variety of food, and clad in animals which had died of disease, and were clad in scanty rags, which hardly sufficed for the ordinary common decency. Their complexion was positively reaching to that of the Hindoos.

Their manners were as depraved as their appearance was poor. The men were in general thieves, and the women abandoned character. The few arts which they possessed, were of a slight and idle, though ingenious nature. They practised working in iron, but never at scale. Many were good sportsmen, good musicians, in a word, of all those trivial arts, the practice of which is little better than mere idleness. But their industry ascended into industry. Two or three other arts seem to have distinguished them in all countries. Some were adepts in reading fortunes, by palmistry and by astrology; some sometimes respect, but oftener drew them into their power as sorcerers; and lastly, the universal accusation against them, of stealing children, subjected them to doubt and execration. From this it happened, that a notion set up by these wanderers, of being pilgrims on a penance, although it was at first admitted, and in some places obtained them protection from the governments, was afterwards discredited, and they were considered as incorrigible vagabonds; they incurred almost everywhere sentence of banishment, and, where suffered to remain, were rather obnoxious than of protection from the law.

A curious and accurate account of their arrival in France is given in the Journal of a Doctor of Theology, which is published by the learned Pasquier. The following is the account:—"On August 27th, 1427, came to Paris twelve persons, (penance doers,) as they called themselves, a duke, an earl, and ten men, all on horseback, and all selves good Christians. They were of Lower Egypt, and that, not long before, the Christians had subdued them, and obliged them to embrace Christianity on pain of death. Those who were baptized were great lords of their own country, and had a king and queen there.—After their conversion, the Saracens overran the country, and obliged them to renounce Christianity. When the Emperor, the King of Poland, and other Christian princes, heard of this, they fell upon them, and obliged the whole of them, great and small, to quit the country, and go to the sea, who enjoined them seven years' penance to the world, without lying in a bed.

They had been wandering five years when they came to France, and were the principal people, and soon after the common name of 120, reduced (according to their own account) to 1200, when they went from home, the rest being the king and queen. They were lodged by the way, at a distance from the city, at Chapel St. Denis. All of them had their ears bored, and wore two silver rings, which they said were esteemed ornaments in their country. The men were black, their hair curled; the women were black, their only clothes a large old duffle garment, which they wore over their shoulders with a cloth or cord, and under it a miter. In short, they were the most poor miserable people that had ever been seen in France; and, notwithstanding this, there were among them women who, by looking at their hands, told their fortunes, and what was in the pockets of their money, and got it out of them, by telling these things through airy magic, and

The Recruiting Officer.

An attendant upon the Archers having been dismounted, Quentin Durward was accommodated with his horse, and, in company of his martial countrymen, rode at a round pace towards the Castle of Plessis, about to become, although on his own part involuntarily, an inhabitant of that gloomy fortress, the outside of which had, that morning, struck him with so much surprise.

In the meanwhile, in answer to his uncle's repeated interrogations, he gave him an exact account of the accident which had that morning brought him into so much danger. Although he himself saw nothing in his narrative save what was affecting, he found it was received with much laughter by his escort.

"And yet it is no good jest either," said his uncle, "for what, in the devil's name, could lead the senseless boy to meddle with the body of a cursed misbelieving Jewish Moorish pagan?"

"Had he quarrelled with the Marshals-men about a pretty wench, as Michael of Moffat did, there had been more sense in it," said Cunningham.

"But I think it touches our honour, that Tristan and his people pretend to confound our Scottish bonnets with these pilfering vagabonds' tocques and turbans, as they call them," said Lindesay—"If they have not eyes to see the difference, they must be taught by rule of hand. But it's my belief, Tristan but pretends to mistake, that he may snap up the kindly Scots that come over to see their kinsfolks."

"May I ask, kinsman," said Quentin, "what sort of people these are of whom you speak?"

"In troth you may ask," said his uncle, "but I know not, fair nephew, who is able to answer you."

"Not I, I am sure, although I know, it may be, as much as other people; but they have appeared in this country by these gipsies, the Bishop of Paris ordered a friar, called Le Petit Jacobin, to preach a sermon, excommunicating all the men and women who had had recourse to these Bohemians on the subject of the future, and shown their hands for that purpose. They departed from Paris for Pontoise in the month of September.

Pasquier remarks upon this singular journal, that however the story of a penance savours of a trick, these people wandered up and down France, under the eye, and with the knowledge, of the magistrates, for more than a hundred years; and it was not till 1561, that a sentence of banishment was passed against them in that kingdom.

The arrival of the Egyptians (as these singular people were called) in various parts of Europe, corresponds with the period in which Timur or Tamerlane invaded Hindostan, affording its natives the choice between the Koran and death. There can be little doubt that these wanderers consisted originally of the Hindostanee tribes, who, displaced, and flying from the sabres of the Mahomedans, undertook this species of wandering life, without well knowing whither they were going. It is natural to suppose the band, as it now exists, is much mingled with Europeans, but most of these have been brought up from childhood among them, and learned all their practices.

It is strong evidence of this, that when they are in closest contact with the ordinary peasants around them, they still keep their language a mystery. There is little doubt, however, that it is a dialect of the Hindostanee, from the specimens produced by Grellman, Hoyland, and others, who have written on the subject. But the author has, besides their authority, personal occasion to know that an individual, out of mere curiosity, and availing himself with patience and assiduity of such opportunities as offered, has made himself capable of conversing with any gipsy whom he meets, or can, like the royal Hal, drink with any tinker in his own language. The astonishment excited among these vagrants on finding a stranger participant of their mystery, occasions very ludicrous scenes. It is to be hoped this gentleman will publish the knowledge he possesses on so singular a topic.

There are prudential reasons for postponing this disclosure at present; for although much more reconciled to society since they have been less the objects of legal persecution, the gipsies are still a ferocious and vindictive people.

But notwithstanding this is certainly the case, I cannot but add, from my own observation of nearly fifty years, that the manners of these vagrant tribes are much ameliorated;—that I have known individuals amongst them who have united themselves to civilized society, and maintain respectable characters, and that great alteration has been wrought in their cleanliness and general mode of life.

land within a year or two, just as a flight of locusts might do."

"Ay," said Lindsey, "and Jacques Bonhomme, (that is our name for the present, young man, you will learn our way of talk in time,) boasts Jacques, I say, cares little what wind either brings them or the locusts, so he but knows any gale that would carry them away again."

"Do they do so much evil?" asked the young man.

"Evil! why, boy, they are heathens, or Jews, or Mohammedans at the least, and neither worship Our Lady nor the Saints"—(cursing himself)—"and steal what they can lay hands on, and sing and tell for times," added Cunningham.

"And they say there are some goodly wenches amongst these women," said Guthrie; "but Cunningham knows that best."

"How, brother?" said Cunningham; "I trust ye mean me no reproach?"

"I am sure I said ye none," answered Guthrie.

"I will be judged by the company," said Cunningham.—"Ye said as much as that I, a Scottish gentleman, and living within pale of holy church, had a fair friend among these off-scourings of Heathenry."

"Nay, nay," said Balafre, "he did but jest. We will have no quarrels among comrades."

"We must have no such jesting then," said Cunningham, murmuring as if he had been speaking to his own heart.

"Be there such vagabonds in other lands than France?" said Lindsey.

"Ay, in good sooth, are there—tribes of them have appeared in Germany, and in Spain, and in England," answered Balafre. "By the blessing of good Saint Andrew, Scotland is free of them yet."

"Scotland," said Cunningham, "is too cold a country for locusts, and too poor a country for thieves."

"Or perhaps John Highlander will suffer no thieves to thrive there but his own," said Guthrie.

"I let you all know," said Balafre, "that I come from the braes of Angus, and have gentle Highland kin in Glen-isa, and I will not have the Highlanders slandered."

"You will not deny that they are cattle-lifters?" said Guthrie.

"To drive a sprog, or so, is no thievery," said Balafre, "and that I will maintain when and how you dare."

"For shame, comrade," said Cunningham, "who quarrel now!—the young man should not see such mad misconstruction.—Come, here we are at the Chateau. I will bestow a runclet of wine to have a rouse in friendship, and drink to Scotland, Highland and Lowland both, if you will meet me at dinner at my quarters."

"Agreed—agreed," said Balafre; "and I will bestow another, to wash away unkindness, and to drink a health to my nephew on his first entrance to our corps."

At their approach, the wicket was opened, and the drawbridge fell. One by one they entered; but when Quentin appeared, the sentinels crossed their pikes, and commanded him to stand, while bows were bent, and harquebusses aimed at him from the walls—a sign of vigilance used, notwithstanding that the young stranger came in company of a party of the garrison, nay, of the very body which furnished the sentinels who were then upon duty.

La Balafre, who had remained by his nephew's side on purpose, gave the necessary explanations, and, after some considerable hesitation and delay, the youth was conveyed under a strong guard to the Lord Crawford's apartment.

This Scottish nobleman was one of the last relics of the gallant band of Scottish lords and knights who had so long and so truly served Charles VI. in those bloody wars which decided the independence of the French crown, and the expulsion of the English. He had fought, when a boy, abreast with Douglas and with Buchan, had ridden beneath the banner of the Maid of Arc, and was perhaps one of the last of those associates of Scottish chivalry who had so willingly drawn their swords for the flam-de-lys, against their "avid enemies of England." Changes which had taken place in the Scottish kingdom, and perhaps his having become habituated to French climate and manners, had induced the old Baron to resign all thoughts of returning to his native country, the rather that the high office which he held in the household of Louis, and his own firm and loyal character, had gained a considerable ascendancy over the King, who, though in general no ready believer in human virtue or honour, trusted and confided in those of the Lord Crawford, and allowed him the greater influence, because he was never known to interfere excepting in matters which concerned his charge.

Balafre and Cunningham followed Durward and the guard to the apartment of their officer, by whose dignified appearance, as well as with the respect paid to him by these proud soldiers, who seemed to respect no one else, the young man was much and strongly impressed.

Lord Crawford was tall, and through advanced age had become gaunt and thin; yet retaining in his frame the strength, at least, if not the elasticity of youth, he was able to endure the weight of his arms during a march as well as the youngest man who rode in his band. He was hard-favoured, with a scarred and weather-beaten countenance, and an eye that had looked upon death as his playfellow in thirty pitched battles, but which nevertheless expressed a calm contempt of danger, rather than the ferocious courage of a mercenary soldier. His tall erect form was at present wrapped in a loose chamber-gown, secured around him by his buff belt, on which was suspended his richly-hilted poniard. He had round his neck the collar and badge of the order of Saint Michael. He sat upon a couch covered with dark hide, and with spectacles on his nose, (then a recent invention,) was labouring to read a huge manuscript, called the Ramer de la Guerre, a code of military and civil policy which Louis had compiled for the benefit of his son the Dauphin, and upon which he was desirous to have the opinion of the experienced Scottish warrior.

Lord Crawford laid his book somewhat carelessly aside upon the entrance of these unexpected visitors, and demanded, in his broad national dialect, "What in the foul fiend's name, they lacked now?"

La Balafre, with more respect than perhaps he would have shown to Louis himself, stated at full length the circumstances in which his nephew was placed, and humbly requested his Lordship's protection. Lord Crawford listened very attentively. He could not but smile at the simplicity with which the youth had interfered in behalf of the hanged criminal, but he shook his head at the account which he received of the ruffle betwixt the Scottish Archers and the Provost-Marshal's guard.

"How often," he said, "will you bring me such ill-winded pines to ravel out? How often must I tell you, and especially both you, Ludovic Leoly, and you, Archibald Cunningham, that the foreign soldier should bear himself modestly and decorously towards the people of the country, if you would not have the white dogs of the town at your heels! However, if you must have a bargain, I would rather it were with that lot of a Provost than any one else; and I blame you less for this onslaught than for other frayes that you have made, Ludovic, for it was but natural and kindlike to help your young kinsman. These simple bears must come to no shafts neither; so give me the roll of the company yonder down from the shelf, and we will even add his name to the troop, that he may enjoy the privilege."

"May it please your Lordship"—said Durward—

* Such disputes between the Scots Guards, and the other constituted authorities of the ordinary military corps, often occurred. In 1474 two Scotsmen had been rebuffed in raising John Prescott a Schewinger, of a large sum of money. They were accordingly apprehended by Philip de Four Provost, with some of his followers. But ere they could lodge one of them, called Mortimer, in the prison of the Chancelier, they were attacked by two Archers of the King's Scottish Guard, who rescued the prisoner.—See Chronique de Jean de Troyes, at the end, post, 1474.

"Is the lad crazed?" exclaimed his uncle—"Would you speak to his Lordship, without a question asked?"

"Patience, Ludovic," said Lord Crawford, "and let us hear what the bairn has to say."

"Only this, if it may please your Lordship," replied Quentin, "that I told my uncle formerly I had some doubts about entering this service. I have now to say, that they are entirely removed, since I have seen a noble and experienced commander under whom I am to serve; for there is authority in your look."

"Weel said, my bairn," said the old Lord, not insensible to the compliment; "we have had some experience, had God sent us grace to improve by it, both in service and in command. There you stand, Quentin, in our honourable corps of Scottish Body-guards, an esquire to your uncle, and serving under his lance. Trust you will do well, for you should be a right mant-arm, if all be good that is upcome,* and you are one of a gentle kindred.—Ludovic, you will see that our kinsman follow his exercise diligently, for we will have spears breaking one of these days."

"By my hilts, and I am glad of it, my Lord—this case makes cowards of us all. I myself feel a sort of decay of spirit, closed up in this cursed dungeon of Castle."

"Well, a bird whistled in my ear," continued Lord Crawford, "that the old banner will be soon dancing in the field again."

"I will drink a cup the deeper this evening to that very tune, said Balfré."

"Thou wilt drink to any tune," said Lord Crawford; "and I fear me, Ludovic, you will drink a bitter rowst of your own brewing one day."

Loosely, a little abashed, replied, "that it had not been so wont for many a day; but his Lordship knew the use of the company, to have a carouse to the health of a new comrade."

"True," said the old leader, "I had forgot the occasion. I will send a few stoups of wine to assist your arouse; but let it be over by sunset. And, hark ye—let the soldiers for duty be carefully pricked off; and see that none of them be more or less partakers of your debauch."

"Your Lordship shall be lawfully obeyed," said Ludovic; "and your health duly remembered."

"Perhaps," said Lord Crawford, "I may look in myself upon your mirth—just to see that all is carried decently."

"Your Lordship shall be most dearly welcome," said Ludovic; and the whole party retreated in high spirits to prepare for their military banquet, to which Lordly invited about a score of his comrades, who were pretty much in the habit of making their mess together.

A soldier's festival is generally a very extempore affair, providing there is enough of meat and drink to be had; but on the present occasion, Ludovic bustled about to procure some better wine than ordinary; observing, that the "old Lord was the surest gear in their sight, and that, while he preached sobriety to them, he himself, after drinking at the royal table as much wine as he could honestly come by, never omitted any creditable opportunity to fill up the evening over the wine-pot; so you must prepare, comrades," he said, "to hear the old histories of the battles of Vernoi and Beaugé."†

The Gothic apartment in which they generally met was, therefore, hastily put into the best order; their rooms were despatched to collect green rushes to spread upon the floor; and banners, under which the Scottish Guard had marched to battle, or which they had taken from the enemies' ranks, were displayed, by way of tapestry, over the table, and around the walls of the chamber.

The next point was, to invest the young recruit as hastily as possible with the dress and appropriate arms of the Guard, that he might appear in every respect the sharer of its important privileges, in virtue of which, and by the support of his countrymen, he might freely brave the power and the displeasure of the Provost-Marshal—although the one was known to be as formidable as the other was unrelenting.

*That is, if your courage corresponds with your personal appearance.

†In both these battles, the Scottish auxiliaries of France, under Stewart, Earl of Buchan, were distinguished. At Beaugé they were victorious, killing the Duke of Clarence, Henry Vth's brother, and cutting off his army. At Vernoi they were defeated, and nearly extirpated.

The banquet was joyous in the highest degree; and the guests gave vent to the whole current of their national partiality on receiving into their ranks a recruit from their beloved father-land. Old Scottish songs were sung, old tales of Scottish heroes told—the achievements of their fathers, and the scenes in which they were wrought, were recalled to mind: and, for a time, the rich plains of Touraine seemed converted into the mountainous and sterile regions of Caledonia.

When their enthusiasm was at high flood, and each was endeavouring to say something to enhance the dear remembrance of Scotland, it received a new impulse from the arrival of Lord Crawford, who, as Le Balafre had well prophesied, sat as it were on thorns at the royal board, until an opportunity occurred of making his escape to the revelry of his own countrymen. A chair of state had been reserved for him at the upper end of the table; for, according to the manners of the age, and the constitution of that body, although their leader and commander under the King and High Constable, the members of the corps (as we should now say, the privates) being all ranked as noble by birth, their Captain sat with them at the same table without impropriety, and might mingle when he chose in their festivity, without derogation from his dignity as commander.

At present, however, Lord Crawford declined occupying the seat prepared for him, and bidding them "hold themselves merry," stood looking on the revel with a countenance which seemed greatly to enjoy it.

"Let him alone," whispered Cunningham to Lindesay, as the latter offered the wine to their noble Captain, "let him alone—hurry no man's cattle—let him take it of his own accord."

In fact, the old Lord, who at first smiled, shook his head, and placed the untasted wine-cup before him, began presently, as if it were in absence of mind, to sip a little of the contents, and in doing so, fortunately recollected that it would be ill-luck did he not drink a draught to the health of the gallant lad who had joined them this day. The pledge was filled, and answered, as may be well supposed, with many a joyous shout, when the old leader proceeded to acquaint them that he had possessed Master Oliver with an account of what had passed that day: "And as," he said, "the scraper of chins hath no great love for the stretcher of throats, he has joined me in obtaining from the King an order, commanding the Provost to suspend all proceedings, under whatever pretence, against Quentin Durward; and to respect, on all occasions, the privileges of the Scottish Guard."

Another shout broke forth, the cups were again filled till the wine sparkled on the brim, and there was an acclaim to the health of the noble Lord Crawford, the brave conservator of the privileges and rights of his countrymen. The good old Lord could not but in courtesy do reason to this pledge also, and gliding into the ready chair, as it were without reflecting what he was doing, he caused Quentin to come up beside him, and assailed him with many more questions concerning the state of Scotland, and the great families there, than he was well able to answer; while ever and anon, in the course of his queries, the good Lord kissed the wine-cup by way of parenthesis, remarking, that sociality became Scottish gentlemen, but that young men, like Quentin, ought to practise it cautiously, lest it might degenerate into excess: upon which occasion he uttered many excellent things, until his own tongue, although employed in the praises of temperance, began to articulate something thicker than usual. It was now that, while the military ardour of the company augmented with each flagon which they emptied, Cunningham called on them to drink the speedy hoisting of the Oriflamme (the royal banner of France.)

"And a breeze of Burgundy to fan it!" echoed Lindesay.

"With all the soul that is left in this worn body do I accept the pledge, bairns," echoed Lord Crawford;

"and as old as I am, I trust I may see it flatter yet. Hark ye, my mates, (for wine had made him somewhat communicative,) "ye are all true servants to the French crown, and wherefore should ye not know there is an envoy come from Duke Charles of Burgundy, with a message of an angry favour?"

"I saw the Count of Crèvecoeur's campage, horses and retinue," said another of the guests, "down at the inn yonder, at the Mulberry Grove. They say the King will not admit him into the Castle."

"Now, Heaven send him an ungracious answer!" said Guthrie, "but what is it he complains of?"

"A world of grievances upon the frontier," said Lord Crawford, "and latterly, that the King hath received under his protection a lady of his land, a young Countess, who hath fled from Dijon, because, being a ward of the Duke, he would have her marry his favourite, Campo-basso."

"And hath she actually come hither alone, my Lord?" said Lindsay.

"Nay, not altogether alone, but with the old Countess, her kinswoman, who hath yielded to her cousin's wishes in this matter."

"And will the King," said Cunningham, "be being the Duke's feudal sovereign, interfere between the Duke and his ward, over whom Charles hath the same right, which, were he himself dead, the King would have over the heirs of Burgundy?"

"The King will be ruled, as he is wont, by rules of policy; and you know," continued Crawford, "that he hath not publicly received these ladies, nor placed them under the protection of his daughters, the Lady of Beaujeu, or the Princess Joan, so, doubtless, he will be guided by circumstances. He is our master, but it is no treason to say, he will chase with the hounds, and run with the hare, with any Prince in Christendom."

"But the Duke of Burgundy understands no such doubling," said Cunningham.

"No," answered the old Lord; "and, therefore, it is likely to make work between them."

"Well—Saint Andrew further the fray!" said Le Balafre. "I had it foretold me ten, ay, twenty years since, that I was to make the fortune of my house by marriage. Who knows what may happen, if once we come to fight for honour and ladies' love, as they do in the old romances?"

"These same ladies' love, with such a trench in thy visage!" said Guthrie.

"As well not love at all, as love a Bohemian woman of Heathenness," retorted Le Balafre.

"Hold there, comrades," said Lord Crawford; "no tilting with sharp weapons, no jostling with horned scuffs—friends all. And for the lady, she is too wealthy to fall to a poor Scottish lord, or I would put in my own claim, fourscore years and all, or not very far from it. But here is her health, nevertheless, for they say she is a lamp of beauty."

"I think I saw her," said another soldier, "when I was upon guard this morning at the inner barrier, but she was more like a dark lantern than a lamp, for she and another were brought into the Chateau in close litter."

"Shame! shame! Arnot!" said Lord Crawford, "a soldier on duty should say naught of what he sees. Besides," he added, after a pause, his own curiosity prevailing over the show of discipline which he had thought it necessary to exert, "why should these litters contain this very same Countess Isabelle de Croys?"

"Nay, my Lord," replied Arnot, "I know nothing of it save this, that my coustler was riding my horse in the road to the village, and fell in with Doguin the muletier, who brought back the litters to the inn, for they belong to the fellow of the Mulberry Grove yonder—he of the Fleur-de-Lys, I mean—and so Doguin asked Saunders Stead to take a cup of wine, as they were acquainted, which he was no doubt willing enough to do."

"No doubt—no doubt," said the old Lord; "it is a thing I wish were corrected among you, gentlemen; but all your grooms, and coachmen, and jockmen, as we should call them in Scotland, are but too ready to take a cup of wine with any one—it is a thing per-lous in war, and must be amended. But, Arnot, this is a long tale of yours, and we will, with a drink; as the Highlander says, Stach nan shial,"* and that a good Gaelic—Here is a Countess Isabelle of Croys, and a better beauty than Campo-basso, who is a base Italian colt—And now, Andrew Arnot, what said the mul to this yeoman of thine?"

"Why he told him in secrecy, if it please your ship," continued Arnot, "that these two ladies he had presently before conveyed up to the Chateau in close litters, were great ladies, who had living in secret at his master's house for some time, and that the King had visited them more than very privately, and had done them great honour, that they had fled up to the Castle, as he said, for fear of the Count de Crèvecoeur, the Duke of Burgundy's ambassador, whose approach was denounced by an advanced courier."

"Ay, Andrew, come you there to me!" said the old Lord; "then I will be sworn it was the Countess's voice I heard singing to the lute, as I came over through the inner court—the sound came from bay-windows of the Dauphin's Tower, and melody was there as no one ever heard before in the Castle of Pleasure of the Park. By my faith, I tell it was the music of the Fairy Melusine's rye. There I stood—though I knew your beard was red, and that you were all impatient—there I like!"

"Like an ass, Johnny Guthrie," said his mander, "thy long nose smelling the daisy long ears hearing the music, and thy short dim not enabling thee to decide which of them thou prefer—Hark! is not that the Cathedral bell to vespers? Sure it cannot be that time yet?—and old sexton has wald even-song an hour soon."

"In faith, the bell rings but too justly the bell and Cunningham; "yonder the sun is sinking west side of the fair plain."

"Ay," said the Lord Crawford, "is it even so? Well, lads, we must live within compass—Fair soft goes far—now fire makes sweet malt—merry and war is a sound proverb.—One adieu to the wall of old Scotland, and then each man to duty."

The parting-cup was emptied, and the guests resumed—the stately old Baron taking the half-arm, under pretence of giving him some advice concerning his nephew, but, perhaps, in reality, his own lofty pace should swim in the public eye already than he was his rank and high command. Serious countenance and his bear as he passed down the two courts which separated his lodging from the festal chamber, and solemn as the gravity of a head was the far-wet caution, with which he attended his nephew's motions, upon in the matters of wench and wine-cups.

Meanwhile, not a word that was spoken naming the beautiful Countess Isabelle had escaped young Durward, who, conducted into a small cell which he was to share with his uncle's page, in his new and lowly abode the scene of much musing. The reader will easily imagine that young soldier should build a fine romance on the foundation as the supposition, or rather the identification of the Maiden of the Tower, which lay he had listened with so much interest, and the cup-bearer of Maître Pierre, with a fugitive Count of rank and wealth, flying from the pursuit of his lover, the favourite of an oppressive guardian, abused his feudal power. There was an Italian Queen's vision concerning Maître Pierre, a notable officer from whose hands he had that with much difficulty, made his escape. At length youth's reveries, which had been respected by Will Harper, the companion of his cell, were put upon by the return of his uncle, who came to Quentin to bed, that he might arise betimes in morning, and attend him to his Majesty's antechamber.

* - On a tale with a drink, it is expressed and often is mentioned over his lip, as I have said in the English.

he was called by his hour of duty, along with the others.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ARMY.

Quentin Durward, in the eyes of France, was a man of great importance; and he was not a man to be despised.

King John.

Quentin Durward was a temptation by which the king was drawn, and the first toll of prison, had the king from his couch, but the father's tower, and of the convent of all taught him to start with the dawn, as clothes gayly, and the sounding of a clash of armour, which announced the vigilant guards—some of whom he marched out to that of the morning, amongst whom was his uncle, for immediate attendance upon the king. Quentin Durward soon put on, as of so young a man on such an occasion, and arms appropriate to his age and his uncle, who looked with great respect to him that he was completely every respect, did not conceal his satisfaction which had been thus shown's appearance. "If thou dost not and bold as thou art well favoured, thou one of the handsomest and best of the court, which cannot but be an honour to thy family. Follow me to the presence, and thou shalt see as my shoulder." He took up a portman, large, weighty, and adorned with ornaments, and directing another a lighter weapon of a similar kind proceeded to the inner-court of the king's apartments, where already drawn arms—the squire each standing before him, to whom they thus formed a guard, were also in attendance many a, with gallant horses and noble dogs, and looked with such impudent defiance as obliged more than once to be the animals were not there for his sake, but for the King's, who had a few the chess, one of the few inclining-indulgent, even when coming in some course of policy, being as strict a game in the royal forests, that it was not might kill a man with greater impunity.

Quentin Durward was put into the command of La Beaufort, who acted as a captain; and, after some minutes, which all moved to show the attention, they marched into the hall of arms.

King John was immediately expected, and he was to receive of his subjects the high was now before him rather disappointed which he had formed of a Court. There were household nobly attired, there were guards gal and there were decorations of various a new name of the ancient counsellors, none of the high officers of the king of the names which in those days sum to chivalry, few more rather of or leaders, who, possessed of the full force, were the strength of France, or of the and fiery nobles, these early knights, who were his pride. The king up reserved manners—the deep and the king, had strengthened thus around throne, and they were only called certain stated and formal occasions, and returned joyfully, as the counsels in the field are supposed to have approached and left the den of the lion.

The very few persons who seemed to be there in the character of counsellors, were men looking men, whose countenances sometimes expressed anxiety, but whose manners showed they were called into a sphere for which their previous education and habits had qualified them but indifferently. One or two persons, however, did appear to Durward to possess a more noble mind, and the strictness of the present duty was not such as to prevent his uncle communicating the names of those whom he thus distinguished.

With the Lord Crawford, who was in attendance, dressed in the rich habit of his office, and holding a leading staff of silver in his hand, Quentin, as well as the reader, was already acquainted. Among others who seemed of quality, the most remarkable was the Count de Dunois, the son of that celebrated Dunois, known by the name of the Bastard of Orleans, who, fighting under the banner of Jeanne d'Arc, acted such a distinguished part in liberating France from the English yoke. His son well supported the high renown which had descended to him from such an honoured source, and, notwithstanding his connection with the royal family, and his hereditary popularity both with the nobles and the people, Dunois had, upon all occasions, manifested such an open, frank loyalty of character, that he seemed to have escaped all suspicion, even on the part of the jealous Louis, who loved to see him near his person, and sometimes even called him to his council. Although accounted complete in all the exercises of chivalry, and possessed of much of the character of what was then termed a perfect knight, the person of the Count was far from being a model of romantic beauty. He was under the common size, though very strongly built, and his legs rather curved outwards, into that shape which is more convenient for horseback, than elegant in a pedestrian. His shoulders were broad, his hair black, his complexion swarthy, his arms remarkably long and nervous. The features of his countenance were irregular, even to ugliness; yet, after all, there was an air of conscious worth and nobility about the Count de Dunois, which stamped, at the first glance, the character of the high-born nobleman, and the undaunted soldier. His men were bold and upright, his step free and manly, and the harshness of his countenance was disguised by a glance like an eagle, and a frown like a lion. His dress was a hunting suit, rather sumptuous than gay, and he acted on most occasions as Grand Huntsman, though we are not inclined to believe that he actually held the office.

Upon the arms of his relation Dunois, walking with a step so slow and melancholy that he seemed to rest on his handman and supporter, came Louis Duke of Orleans, the first prince of the blood royal (afterwards King, by the name of Louis XII.) and to whom the guards and attendants rendered their homage as such. The princess watched a part of Louis's conversation, the Prince who, being the King's offspring, was heir to the kingdom, was not suffered to absent himself from court, and while residing there was like a prisoner in a prison, and a captive in a cage. The depression which his degraded and a most captive state naturally impressed on the deportment of this unfortunate Prince was at the moment greatly increased, by his consciousness that the King meditated, with respect to him, one of the most cruel and unjust actions which a tyrant could commit, by compelling him to give his hand to the Princess Joan of France, the youngest daughter of Louis, to whom he had been contracted in infancy but whose deformed person rendered the wedding upon such an agreement an act of abominable rigour.

The exterior of this unhappy Prince was in no respect distinguished by personal advantages; and in mind, he was of a gentle, mild, and benevolent disposition, qualities which were visible even through the veil of extreme depression, with which his natural character was at present obscured. Quentin observed that the Duke studiously avoided even looking at the Royal Guards, and when he returned their salutes, that he kept his eyes bent on the ground, as if he fears the King's jealousy might have contrived that gesture of ordinary courtesy, as arising from the purpose of establishing a separate and personal interest among them.

Very different was the conduct of the proud Cardinal and Prelate, John of Salas, the favourite minister of Louis for the time, whose face and character bore as close a resemblance to that of Walney as the difference between the crafty and subtle Louis, and the headstrong and rash Henry VIII. of England, would permit. The former had raised his minister from the lowest rank, to the dignity, or at least to the emblems, of Grand Almoner of France, loaded him with benefices, and obtained for him the hat of a Cardinal, and although he was too cautious to repose in the ambitious Salas the unbounded power and trust which Henry placed in Walney, yet he was more influenced by him than by any other of his avowed counsellors. The Cardinal, accordingly, had not escaped the error incident to those who are suddenly raised to power from an obscure situation, for he entertained a strong persuasion, dazzled doubtless by the suddenness of his elevation, that his capacity was equal to intermeddling with affairs of every kind, even those most foreign to his profession and studies. Tall and elegantly in his person, he affected gallantry and admiration of the fair sex, although his measures rendered his proceedings absurd, and his professions marked them as insincere. Some male or female flatterer had, in evil hour possessed him with the idea that there was much beauty of contour in a pair of huge substantial legs, which he had derived from his father a carmen of Limoges, or, according to other authorities, a miller of Verdun; and with this sin he had become so entranced, that he always had his cardinal's robes a little looped up on one side, that the sturdy proportion of his limbs might not escape observation. As he swept through the stately apartments in his crimson dress and rich cups, he stopped repeatedly to look at the arms and appointments of the cavaliers on guard, asked them several questions in an authoritative tone, and took upon him to enquire some of them for what he termed irregularities of discipline in language to which these experienced soldiers dared not reply although it was plain they listened to it with impatience and with contempt.

"Is the King aware," said Dumas to the Cardinal, "that the Burgundian Envoy is presumptuous in demanding an audience?"

"He is," answered the Cardinal; "and here, as I think, comes the all-sufficient Oliver Dain,* to let us know the royal pleasure."

As he spoke, a remarkable person, who then divided the favour of Louis with the proud Cardinal himself, entered from the inner apartment, but without any of that important and consequential demeanour which marked the full-blown dignity of the churchman. On the contrary, this was a little, pale, meagre man, whose blackish jerkin and hose, without either coat, cloak, or cassock, formed a dress ill-qualified to set off to advantage a very ordinary person. He carried a silver basin in his hand, and a napkin slung over his arm indicated his menial capacity. His visage was penetrating and quick, although he endeavoured to banish such expression from his features, by keeping his eyes fixed on the ground, whilst with the stealthy and quiet pace of a cat, he seemed modestly rather to glide than to walk through the apartment. But though modesty may easily obscure worth, it cannot hide entire favour, and all attempts to steal unperceived through the presence-chamber were vain, on the part of one known to have such possession of the King's ear as had been attested by his celebrated barber and groom of the chamber, Oliver le Dain, called sometimes Oliver le Mauvais, and sometimes Oliver le Diable, epithets derived from the unscrupulous cunning with which he assisted in the execution of the schemes of his master's tortuous policy. At present he spoke earnestly for a few moments with the Comte de Dunois, who in standly left the chamber, while the tenses and ed by back towards the royal apartments where, as usual, every one going paid to him, who, as he only acknowledged by the most bashful of man of the body, excepting in a very few cases where he had made one or two persons; of any to all the other courtiers by which a single word in their ear and at the same time saying something of the nature of his plans, he came from their eyes, as well as from the ears of all those who wished to stir him up. The Duke of Devon had the good fortune to be one of the devotes who, on the present occasion, was the only one who with a single word, to settle the matter was fortunately terminated.

Presently afterwards, he had another parcel of more agreeable things; for Aquinas did, once more, Tristram I Marston, the Provost Marshal of the Royal Household, entered the apartment, and straight to the place where Le Balais was put. This formidable officer's uniform, which was rich, had only the effect of making his manner more stern and had more strangely diminished and the tone which he meant for confidence was nothing so much as the growling of a bear. The import of his words, however, was more cruel than the voice in which they were pronounced. He regretted the mistake which had fallen upon him on the preceding day, and observed it was only the Duke de Balais's nephew not wearing the form of his corps, or announcing himself as belonging to it, which had led him into the error for which he now asked forgiveness.

Ludovic Lanty made the necessary reply, and upon as Tristan had turned away, observed to his nephew, that they had now the distinction of being a mortal enemy from henceforward in the person of this dreaded officer. "But we are above the ordinary soldier," said he, "who does his duty, my lord, at the Prince's Marshal."

Quarrel could not help being of his own opinion for, as Tristan parted from them, it was with the look of angry defiance which the hour came upon him when his spear had wounded him. Instantly when less strongly moved, the sudden eye of the civil expressed a involuntarily of purpose which men shudder to meet his glance, and the look of the young hero was the deeper and more intense that he seemed to himself still to feel on his death the grasp of the two death doing functions of this fatal officer.

Meanwhile Oliver, after he had provided room in the stealthy manner which we have endeavored to describe—all, even the highest officers making way for him, and loading him with the most generous attentions, which his military career seemed to avoid—again entered the inner gateway of the doors of which were presently thrown open, and King Lear entered the presence-chamber.

Gaston, like all others, turned his eyes upon his weapon when he recognized as the King of Kings that silk-merchant, Maître Pierre, who had been a companion of his father's and whose name was still fresh in his memory.

The stern look of his white complexion was of the darkness of his office, and he had

He bowed to the ground, and re-assumed his airy position, as one who would show by his promptitude to act in the King's quarrel.

Quentin, in the meantime, recovered from surprise, studied the King's appearance closely, and was surprised to find how differently he had done at their first interview.

He was not much changed in exterior, for save a scouter of outward show, wore, on occasion, an old dark-blue hunting-dress, better than the plain burgher suit of the day, and garnished with a huge rosary of which had been sent to him by no less a person the Grand Seigneur, with an attestation little paltry figures of saints stamped in those eyes, which, according to Quentin's glimpse, only twinkled with the love of a now that they were known to be the

as the Lady of Beaujeu, our story has to do. She was tall, and rather handsome, discreet, talent, and much of her father's who reposed great confidence in her, and as well perhaps as he loved any one near her, the unfortunate Joan, the daughter of the Duke of Orleans, advanced timidly to her sister, conscious of a total want of those qualities which women are most of possessing, or being thought to possess.

She, then, and such in her complexion; easily bent to one side, and her gait so that she might be called lame. A fine set of features which were expressive of melancoly and resignation, with a quantity of light hair, were the only redeeming points which she could have dared to number, in counter-acting the homeliness of her face and figure.

As the picture, it was easy to remark, from her negligence in dress, and the timidity of her, that she had an unusual and distressing sense of her own plainness of appearance, and was to make any of those attempts to mend her by art what nature had left minus, or the way to exert a power of pleasing. The ing vessel, who was deprecating the merit which he was desirous to keep to him-devotion. "No, fair daughter, I and another know your real mind better—He! fair cousin of Orleans, do we not? Approach, fair sir, and lend this devoted vestal of ours to her horse."

Orleans started when the King spoke, and hastened to obey him, but with such precipitation of step, and confusion, that Louis called out, "Nay, cousin, restrain your gallantry, and look before you.—Why, what a headlong matter a gallant's taste is on some occasions! You had well-nigh taken Anne's hand instead of her sister's.—Sir, must I give Joan's to you myself?"

The unhappy Prince looked up, and shuddered like a child, when forced to touch something at which it has instinctive horror, then making an effort, took the hand which the Princess neither gave nor yet withheld. As they stood, her cold damp fingers enclosed in his trembling hand, with their eyes looking on the ground, it would have been difficult to say which of these two youthful beings was rendered more utterly miserable—the Duke, who felt himself fettered to the object of his aversion by bonds which he durst not tear asunder, or the unfortunate young woman, who too plainly saw that she was an object of abhorrence to him, to gain whose kindness she would willingly have died.

"And now to horse, gentlemen and ladies—We will ourselves lead forth our daughter of Beaujeu," said the King; "and God's blessing and Saint Hubert's be on our morning sport!"

"I am, I fear, doomed to interrupt it, sire," said the Comte de Dunois: "the Burgundian Envoy is before the gates of the Castle, and demands an audience."

"Demands an audience, Dunois?" replied the King.

"Did you not answer him, as we sent you word by Oliver, that we were not at leisure to see him to-day, and that to-morrow was the festival of Saint Martin, which, please Heaven, we would disturb by no earthly thoughts, and that on the succeeding day we were engaged for Amboise—but that we would not fail to appoint him as early an audience, when we returned, as our pressing affairs would permit?"

"All this I said," answered Dunois; "but yet, sire—"

"Parque-dieu! man, what is it that thus sticks in thy throat?" said the King. "The Burgundian's terms must have been hard of digestion."

"Had not my duty, your Grace's commands, and his character as an Envoy restrained me," said Dunois, "he should have tried to digest them himself; for, by Our Lady of Orleans, I had more mind to have made him eat his own words, than to have brought them to your Majesty."

"Body of me, Dunois," said the King, "it is strange that thou, one of the most impatient fellows alive, shouldst have so little sympathy with the like infirmity in our blunt and fiery cousin, Charles of Burgundy. Why, man, I mind his blustering messages no more than the towers of this Castle regard the whetting of the north-east wind, which comes from Flanders, as well as this brawling Envoy."

"Know then, sire," replied Dunois, "that the Count of Crèvecoeur tarries below with his retinue of pursu-ivants and trumpets, and says, that, since your Majesty refuses him the audience which his master has instructed him to demand, upon matters of most pressing concern, he will remain there till midnight, and accost your Majesty at whatever hour you are pleased to issue from your Castle, whether for business, exercise, or devotion, and that no consideration, except the use of absolute force, shall compel him to desert from this resolution."

"He is a fool," said the King, with much composure. "Does the hot-headed Hamanster think it any penance for a man of sense to remain for twenty-four hours quiet within the walls of his Castle, when he hath the affairs of a Kingdom to occupy him? These impatient coxcombs think that all men, like themselves, are miserable, save when in saddle and stirrup. Let the dogs be put up, and well looked to, gentle Dunois—We will hold council to-day, instead of hunting."

"My Lord," answered Dunois, "you will not thus rid yourself of Crèvecoeur; for his master's insti-done are, that if he hath not the sentence which he demands, he shall not his gauntlet to the palace before the Castle, in token of mortal defiance on the part of his master, who renounces the Duke's fealty to France, and declares mortal war."

"Ay," said Louis, without any perceptible alteration of voice, but frowning until his glistening dark eyes became almost invisible under his shaggy eyebrows, "is it even so?" will our ancient vassal prove ungrateful? our dear cousin treat us thus unkindly? Nay then, Donna, we must unfold the Oriflamme and cry Deus! Montjoie!"

"Marry and anon, and in a most happy hour!" said the marshal Donna, and the guards in the hall, unable to resist the same impulse, started each upon his post, as so to produce a low but not unloud clashing arms. The King cast his eye proudly round, and for a moment, thought and looked like his heroic father.

But the excitement of the moment presently gave way to the heat of passion, concentration, which, at that conjuncture, rendered an open breach with the enemy as peculiarly perilous. Edward IV., a brave and victorious king, who had in his own person fought thirty battles, was now established on the throne of England, was brother to the Duke of Burgundy, and it might well be supposed, waited but a rupture between his near kinsman and Louis, to carry into France, through the ever-open gate of Calais, those arms which had been triumphant in the English wars, and to obliterate the recollection of internal dissensions by that most popular of all enterprises amongst the English, an invasion of France. To this consideration was added the universal faith of the Duke of Burgundy, and other weighty subjects of reflection. So that, after a deep pause, when Louis again spoke, although in the same tone, it was with an altered tone. "But that forbids," he said, "that ought less than necessity should quash on the Most Christian King, give cause to the effusion of Christian blood, if any thing short of dishonour may avert such a calamity. We tender our subjects safety dearer than the ruffe which our own dignity may receive from the rash breath of a malaproposited doer who hath perhaps exceeded the strand with which he was charged. Admit the Envoy of Burgundy to our presence."

"Now, Father," said the Cardinal Balue.

"True, and your committee knoweth that they who intimidate themselves shall be exalted," added the King.

The Cardinal quailed as Amen, to which few courtiers, for even the pale clerk of Orleans handled with shame, and Balaize suppressed his feelings so bridle, as to let the butt-end of his partition fall heavily on the floor—a movement of impudence for which he underwent a better reproof from the Cardinal, with a lecture on the mode of handling his arms when in presence of the Sovereign. The King himself assumed unusually embarrassed at the silence around him.

"You are penive, Donna," he said. "You dampen the air giving way to this hot-headed Envoy."

"By no means," said Donna, "I meddle not with matters beyond my sphere. I was but thinking of asking a boon of your Majesty."

"A boon, Donna, what is it?"—You are an unfrequent suitor, and may count on our favour."

"I would, then, your Majesty would send me to Evreux to regulate the clergy," said Donna, with military frankness.

"That were indeed beyond thy sphere," replied the King, smiling.

"I might order priests as well," replied the Count, "as my Lord Bishop of Evreux, or my Lord Cardinal, if he likes the title better, can exercise the soldiers of your Majesty's guard."

The King smiled again, and more mysteriously, while he whispered Donna, "The time may come when you and I will regulate the priests together. But this is for the present a good concerted animal of a bishop. Ah, Donna! Donna, Rome puts him and other hardens upon us. But patience, cousin, and shuffle the cards, till our hand is a stronger one."

* The French have reported that card, and to have been furnished as a preceding sign, for the punishment of Charles V. during the intervals of his mental disorder, some equally to

The flourish of trumpets in the court-yard announced the arrival of the Burgundian nobles on the previous chamber made haste to arrange seats according to their proper places of rank to the King, and his daughters remaining in the assembly.

The Count of Crevecoeur, a renowned and old warrior, entered the apartment, and, on the wings among the envoys of friendly powers, appeared all armoured, extending his hand in a sign of the most superb Milan armoured metal and encased in gold which was into the fantastic taste called the Arabesque, his neck, and over his polished carcase, hung the order of the Golden Fleury, one of the honoured decorations of chivalry then known to mankind. A handsome page bore his helmet him, a herald preceded him, bearing his lion's dance, which he offered on his knee to the King the ambassador himself poured in the midst of as if to give all present time to admire his lofty commanding stature, and undaunted composure and manner. The rest of his suite waited in the antechamber, or court yard.

"Approach, Burgundian Count de Crevecoeur, Louis, after a moment's glance at his countenance, we need not our Count's letters of credence to introduce to us a warrior so well known, a sign of your highly deserved credit with posterity. We trust that your fair partner, who shares of our ancestral blood, is in good health. He brought her in your hand, Burgundian Count, we have thought you were past service on this old occasion, to maintain the superiority of our against the amorous chivalry of France. As I cannot guess the reason of this complete prostration," replied the ambassador, the Count of Crevecoeur must lament his misfortune, and your forgiveness, that he cannot, on this company with our humble deference as is due to the courtesy with which your Majesty has honoured him, although it is only the word of Philip of Valois which speaks, the words which he must be those of his gracious Lord and Sovereign Duke of Burgundy."

"And what has Crevecoeur to say in the of Burgundy?" said Louis, with an assumed sufficient dignity. Yet hold—remember, this presence, Philip Crevecoeur de Cordes, him who is his Sovereign's Sovereign."

Crevecoeur bowed, and then spoke aloud—"of France, the mighty Duke of Burgundy and sends you a written schedule of the wrongs and injuries committed on his frontiers by your garrisons and soldiers; and the first inquiry is, whether it is your Majesty's duty make him amends for these injuries?"

The King, looking slightly at the messenger the herald delivered to him upon his knee—"These matters have been already long laid Council. Of the injuries complained of some repeat of those sustained by my subjects, are affirmed without any proof, some have been led by the Duke's garrisons and soldiers; and remain any which fall under none of those points, we are not, as a Christian prince, to make satisfaction for wrongs actually acted our neighbour though committed not only to our countenance, but against our express order."

There became confusion among the knights, and they hurried Louis XI with a satisfaction. The count then quoted the Parlement as the registered place of law. The alleged copies of the investigation of some, perhaps the altered copy as I have seen, support group as would was made by the late Parlement of Burgundy in a great assembly at the Parlement of Paris. The French king order to prove the accuracy of the party which would be over the point of order. The Parlement of Burgundy, as the king the power is granted, perhaps admitted of a doubt. As the document was signed, and the injured related, which having a superior authority for a group in itself, which required as a per-sonal diploma, necessary to justify complaints, and so on, the count later developed a list, signing. "I am no more player, and the count, great patron, but I have need to know that such as would for the development of an honest king." The end of this reply was decisive.

"I will convey your Majesty's answer," said the ambassador, "to my most gracious master; yet, let me say, that, as it is in no degree different from the answer which have already been returned to your just complaints, I cannot hope that it will afford the means of re-establishing peace and friendship between France and Burgundy."

"Be that as God's pleasure," said the King. "It is not for dread of thy master's arms, but for the sake of peace only, that I return an impotent answer to his injurious reproaches. Proceed with thee onward."

"My master's next demand," said the ambassador, "is, that your Majesty will cease your cruel and unbrotherly dealings with his towns of Ghent, Laga, and Malines. He requests that your Majesty will recall the most cruel, by whose means the distress of his good citizens of Flanders are inflamed, and demand from your Majesty's commissions, or rather deliver up to the cruel punishment of their laws, those traitorous fugitives, who, having fled from the cause of their marchioness, have found a ready refuge in Paris, Orleans, Tours, and other French cities."

"Say to the Duke of Burgundy," replied the King, "that I know of no such indirect practices as those with which he so cruelly charges me; that my subjects of France have frequent intercourse with the good cities of Flanders, for the purpose of mutual benefit by free traffic, which it would be so much contrary to the Duke's interest as mine to interrupt, and that many Flemings have residence in my kingdom, and enjoy the protection of my laws for the same purpose; but come, to our knowledge, for those of France or directly against the Duke. Proceed with your message—you have heard my answer."

"As formally, then, with pain, replied the Count of Crèvecœur; a not being of that direct or explicit nature which the Duke, my master, will accept, in compliance for a long time of secret machinations, and the less certain, though now discovered by your Majesty. But I proceed with my message. The Duke of Burgundy further requires the King of France to send back to his dominions without delay and under a safe conduct, the persons of Isabelle Countess of Artois, and of her retinue and guardian the Countess Maubert, of the same family in respect to the said Countess Isabelle, being, by the law of the country, and by feudal tenure of her estates, the ward of the said Duke of Burgundy; both of whom he demands, and from the hands which he claims as his own, and which he claims to extend over her, and as being committed to custody by the King of France, and by him fulfilled, in her continuance to the said Duke of Burgundy, contrary to the law of the land, and such as they ever have been acknowledged in former times. Once more I repeat the said Majesty's message."

"I do not see," said the Count of Crèvecœur, "and Louis, my master, the ambassador at an early hour; and he has just returned to me to account for the delay of every cause, which your master's hands have not been able to bring from his dominions, the Duke of Burgundy's master. Who can affirm that the Duke of Burgundy's master who can promise me, that I have either countermanded or left it that he have received them with all the haste? No, who is it will answer, that if France France these place of retirement is within my knowledge?"

swore that this witness no longer exists. When he lived, he was called Zamet Magroshin, by birth one of those Bohemian wanderers. He was yesterday, as I have learned, executed by a party of your Majesty's Provost-Marshal, to prevent, doubtless, his standing here, to verify what he said of this matter to the Duke of Burgundy, in presence of his Council, and of my Philip Crèvecœur de Cordes."

"Now by our Lady of Lincoln," said the King, "so grave are these accusations, and so free of circumstances as I of aught that approaches them, that, by the honour of a King, I laugh, rather than am wroth at them. My Provost guard duly put to death, as is their duty, thieves and vagabonds, and as my crown to be standard with whatever these thieves and vagabonds may have said to our hot cousin of Burgundy and his war councilors! I pray you, tell my kind cousin, if he loves such companions, he had best keep them in his own estates; for here they are like to meet short shrift and a tight cord."

"My master needs no such subjects, Sir King," answered the Count, in a tone more dispassionate than he had yet permitted himself to make use of, "for the noble Duke sees not to suspect of warlike wandering Egyptians, or others, upon the destiny and fate of his neighbours and allies."

"We have had patience enough, and to spare," said the King, interrupting him, "and since thy cousin here seems to be for the purpose of peace, we will send some one in our name to the Duke of Burgundy—some one, as thus demanding thyself towards us, thou hast executed thy commission, whatever that may have been."

"On the contrary," said Crèvecœur, "I have not yet acquitted myself of it.—Hearken, Louis of Valois, King of France—Hearken, nobles and gentlemen, who may be present—Hearken, all good and true men—and thou, Toison d'Or," addressing the herald, "make proclamation after me. I, Philip Crèvecœur of Cordes, Count of the Empire, and Knight of the honourable and princely Order of the Golden Fleece, in the name of the most potent Lord and Prince, Charles, by the grace of God, Duke of Burgundy and Lotharing, of Brabant and Lombardy, of Luxembourg and of Castile, Earl of Flanders and of Artois; Count Palatine of Hainault, of Holland, Zealand, Namur, and Zutphen; Marquis of the Holy Empire, Lord of Franchmont, Salines, and Maligny, do give you, Louis, King of France, openly to know, that you, having refused to remedy the various griefs, wrongs, and alliances done and wrought by you, at by and through your aid, suggestion, and instigation, against the said Duke and his loving subjects, he, by my mouth, renounces all allegiance and fealty towards your crown and dignity—pronounces you false and faithless; and defines you as a Prince, and as a man. There lies my gage, in evidence of what I have said."

So saying, he plucked the gauntlet off his right hand, and flung it down on the floor of the hall.

Until this last climax of audacity, there had been a deep silence in the royal apartment during the extraordinary scene; but no sooner had the cloth of the gauntlet, when cast down, been echoed by the deep voice of Toison d'Or, the Burgundian herald, with the ejaculation, "Vive Bourgogne!" than there was a general tumult. While Dunois, Orleans, old Lord Crawford, and one or two others, whose rank authorized their interference, contended which should lift up the gauntlet, the others in the hall exclaimed, "Strike him down! Cut him to pieces! Come he here to smite the King of France in his own palace?"

But the King opposed the tumult by exclaiming, in a voice like thunder, which overrode and silenced every other sound, "Silence, my lieges! lay not a hand on the man, not a finger on the gage!—And you, Sir Count, of what is your life composed, or how is it warranted, that you thus place it on the cast of a die so perilous? Or is your Duke made of a different metal from other princes, since he thus enters his pretended quarrel in a manner so unusual?"

"He is indeed framed of a different and more noble metal than the other princes of Europe," said the undaunted Count of Crèvecœur; "for, when anyone of them dared to give shelter to you—to you, I say, King Louis—when you were yet only Dauphin, an exile from France, and pursued by the whole bitterness of your father's revenge, and all the power of his kingdom, you were received and protected like a brother by my noble master, whose generosity of disposition you have so grossly misused. Farewell, Sire, my mission is discharged."

So saying, the Count de Crèvecœur left the apartment abruptly, and without farther leave-taking.

"After him—after him—take up the gauntlet and after him!" said the King.—"I mean not you, Dunois, nor you, my Lord of Crawford, who, methinks, may be too old for such hot frays; nor you, Cousin of Orleans, who are too young for them.—My Lord Cardinal—my Lord Bishop of Auxerre—it is your holy office to make peace among princes;—do you lift the gauntlet, and remonstrate with Count Crèvecœur on the sin he has committed, in thus insulting a great Monarch in his own Court, and forcing us to bring the miseries of war upon his kingdom and that of his neighbour."

Upon this direct personal appeal, the Cardinal Balue proceeded to lift the gauntlet, with such precaution as one would touch an adder,—so great was apparently his aversion to this symbol of war,—and presently left the royal apartment to hasten after the challenger.

Louis paused and looked round the circle of his courtiers, most of whom, except such as we have already distinguished, being men of low birth, and raised to their rank in the King's household for other gifts than courage or feats of arms, looked pale on each other, and had obviously received an unpleasant impression from the scene which had been just acted. Louis gazed on them with contempt, and then said aloud, "Although the Count of Crèvecœur be presumptuous and overweening, it must be confessed that in him the Duke of Burgundy hath as bold a servant as ever bore message for a prince. I would I knew where to find as faithful an Envoy to carry back my answer."

"You do your French nobles injustice, Sire," said Dunois; "not one of them but would carry a defiance to Burgundy on the point of his sword."

"And, Sire," said old Crawford, "you wrong also the Scottish gentlemen who serve you. I, or any of my followers, being of meet rank, would not hesitate a moment to call yonder proud Count to a reckoning; my own arm is yet strong enough for the purpose, if I have but your Majesty's permission."

"But your Majesty," continued Dunois, "will employ us in no service through which we may win honour to ourselves, to your Majesty, or to France."

"Say, rather," said the King, "that I will not give way, Dunois, to the headlong impetuosity, which, on some punctilio of chivalry, would wreck yourselves, the throne, France, and all. There is not one of you who knows not how precious every hour of peace is at this moment, when so necessary to heal the wounds of a distracted country; yet there is not one of you who would not rush into war on account of the tale of a wandering gipsy, or of some errant demosel, whose reputation, perhaps, is scarce higher.—Here comes the Cardinal, and we trust with more pacific tidings.—How now, my Lord—have you brought the Count to reason and to temper?"

"Sire," said Balue, "my task hath been difficult. I put it to yonder proud Count, how he dared to use towards your Majesty, the presumptuous reproach with which his audience had broken up, and which must be understood as proceeding, not from his master, but from his own insolence, and as placing him therefore in your Majesty's discretion, for what penalty you might think proper."

"You said right," replied the King; "and what was his answer?"

"The Count," continued the Cardinal, "had at that moment his foot in the stirrup, ready to mount; and, on hearing my expostulation, he turned his head without altering his position. 'Had I,' said he, 'been fifty leagues distant, and had heard by report that a question vituperative of my Prince had been asked by the King of France, I had, even at that distance, instantly mounted, and returned to disburden my mind of the answer which I gave him but now.'"

"I said, sirs," said the King, turning about any show of angry emotion, "that in Philip of Crèvecœur, our cousin the Duke as worthy a servant as ever rode at a prince's hand.—But you prevailed with him to stay."

"To stay for twenty-four hours; and in the while to receive again his gage of defiance, Cardinal: "he has dismounted at the Fleurbauc."

"See that he be nobly attended and carry out our charges," said the King; "such a jewel in a prince's crown.—Twenty-four hours added, muttering to himself, and looking as if stretching his eyes to see into futurity; "twenty-four hours?—'tis of the shortest. Yet twenty-four hours, ably and skilfully employed, may be worth the hand of indolent or incapable agents.—To the forest—to the forest, my gallant lords!—my fair kinsman, lay aside that modesty, becomes you; mind not my Joan's coy Loire may as soon avoid mingling with the forest as she from favouring your suit, or you from it," he added, as the unhappy prince moved after his betrothed bride. "And now for you, gentlemen; for Allegre, my pricker, boured one that will try both dog and man. I lend me your spear,—take mine, it is too good for me; but when did you complain of such a lance?—To horse—to horse, gentlemen! And all the chase rode on."

CHAPTER IX.

THE BOAB-HUNT.

I will converse with unrespectful boys
And iron-witted fools. None are for me
That look into me with suspicious eyes.—Sh.

ALL the experience which the Cardinal was able to collect of his master's disposition upon the present occasion, prevent his falling into the great error of policy. His vanity induced him to think that he had been more successful in persuading the Count of Crèvecœur to remain in France than any other moderator whom the King had ever employed, would, in all probability, have done. And as he was well aware of the importance of the Duke of Burgundy, he could not help that he conceived himself to have rendered great and acceptable service. He pressed the King's person more than he was wont to do, and deavoured to engage him in conversation during the events of the morning.

This was injudicious in more respects than one. For princes love not to see their subjects looking at them with an air conscious of deserving, and seeming desirous to extort acknowledgments of recompense for their services; and Louis, a jealous monarch that ever lived, was peculiarly so, and inaccessible to any one who seemed to presume upon service rendered, or to pry into his secrets.

Yet, hurried away, as the most cautious are, by the self-satisfied humour of the moment, the Cardinal continued to ride on the King's mind, turning the discourse, whenever it was possible, to Crèvecœur and his embassy; which, although it might be the matter at that moment most on the King's thoughts, was nevertheless precisely what he was least willing to converse on. Louis, who had listened to him with attention without having returned any answer which would tend to prolong the conversation, signed to his attendants who rode at no great distance, to come to the other side of his horse.

"We came hither for sport and exercise," said the Cardinal; "but the reverend Father here would have counsel of state."

"I hope your Highness will excuse my answer," said Dunois; "I am born to fight the Duke of Burgundy, and have heart and hand for that, but no head for her councils."

"My Lord Cardinal hath a head turned for die," answered Louis; "he hath confessed at the Castle-gate, and he hath confessed us his whole heart. Had you not the commandment, with an emphasis on the word, non est cardinalis, which shot from his long dark eyelashes, as a dagger gleams from the scabbard.

Cardinal trembled, on endeavouring to reply; "But," he said, "that though his order had to conceal the secrets of their penitents, there was no secreta confessorum, which he trusted at his Majesty's breath."

"In his Majesty's," said the King, "is ready to make the secrets of others to us, he knows that we should be equally communicable; and, in order to get upon this reciprocal as a very reasonably desirous to know of Louis of Oroy he actually in our territories carry we cannot indulge his curiosity, less knowing in what precise place events dignified princesses, distressed countesses, appear within our dominions, which are, we said our Lady of Ambrun, rather too for us to answer easily his Majesty's most a question. But supposing they were with you, Durward, to our cousin's peremptory answer you, my Lord, if you will tell me, whether you want war or peace," replied with a frankness which, while it arose out of native openness and integrity of character from him to some a considerable faith Louis, who, like all astute persons, circumspect of looking into the hearts of others, valued his own.

"I should be as well as thyself, Durward, to tell thee my purpose, if I knew it exactly. But say I desired what should I do with this dreadful and young Durward, supposing her to be in my power?"

"Her in marriage on one of your own galleons, who has a heart to love and an arm to fight," said Durward.

"Thyself, he?" said the King. "Pasquodieu, more polite than I took thee for, with others."

"Alas," answered Durward, "I am caught as a. By our Lady of Orleans, I come to the end, as I ride my horse at the ring. Your own the house of Orleans at least one happy will pay it, Cousin Pasquodieu, I will see you not yonder for example?"

He pointed to the unhappy Duke of Orleans prisoner, who, neither daring to remain at a distance from the King, nor in his sight apart from each other, were riding side by side an interval of two or three yards between, a space which timidity on the one side, and on the other prevented them from diminishing, while neither dared to increase it.

Looked in the direction of the King's signal, situation of his unfortunate relative and the side reminded him of nothing so much as a gauntlet, forcibly linked together remain as as widely separated as the length of their horses, he could not help shaking his head, ventured not on any other reply to the tyrant. Louis seemed to guess his thoughts.

be a peaceful and quiet household they will be much disturbed with children, I should But these are not always a blessing. Perhaps, the recollection of his own filial in-the King himself as the very purpose for which he he match with such tyrannical severity which was Prisoner's personal defiance subjected little chance. Outfit the branch of France which was next in to the throne might be by the order of Louis would appointed to a seat in the Conseil de Reunion King of his daughter's betrothal, says. gratitude that made the King pause as he uttered the last reflection, and which converted the snarl that trembled on his lip into something resembling an expression of contrition. But he instantly proceeded in another tone.

"Frankly, my Durward, much as I revere the holy sacrament of matrimony," (here he crossed himself,) "I would rather the house of Orleans ruined for the such gallant soldiers as thy father and thyself, who share the blood royal of France without claiming its rights, than that the country should be torn to pieces, like to England, by wars arising from the rivalry of legitimate candidates for the crown. The lion should never have more than one cub."

Durward sighed and was silent, conscious that contradicting his arbitrary Sovereign might well hurt his kinsman's interests, but could do him no service; yet he could not forbear adding, in the next moment,

"Since your Majesty has alluded to the birth of my father, I must needs own, that, setting the frailty of his parents on one side, he might be termed happier, and more fortunate, as the son of lawless love, than of conjugal hatred."

"Thou art a scandalous fellow, Durward, to speak thus of holy wedlock," answered Louis, jeeringly. "But to the devil with the discourse, for the hour is unhallowed. Lay on the dogs, in the name of the holy Saint Hubert! Ma! he! tra! la! la! la!" — And the King's horn rung merrily through the woods as he pushed forward on the chase, followed by two or three of his guards, amongst whom was our friend Quentin Durward. And here it was remarkable, that, even in the keen prosecution of his favourite sport, the King, in indulgence of his capricious disposition, found leisure to amuse himself by tormenting Cardinal Beaufort.

It was one of that able statesman's weaknesses, as we have elsewhere hinted, to suppose himself, though of low rank and limited education, qualified to play the courtier and the man of gallantry. He did not, indeed, actually enter the lists of chivalrous combat, like Becket, or levy soldiers like Wolsey. But gallantry in which they also were proficient, was his professed pursuit, and he likewise affected great fondness for the martial amusement of the chase. Yet, however well he might succeed with certain ladies, to whom his power, his wealth, and his influence as a statesman, might atone for deficiencies in appearance and manners, the gallant horses, which he purchased at almost any price, were totally unworthy to the dignity of carrying a Cardinal, and paid no more respect to him than they would have done to his father, the carter, miller, or tailor, whom he rivalled in horsemanship. The King knew this, and, by alternately exciting and checking his own horse, he brought that of the Cardinal, whom he kept close by his side, into such a state of mutiny against his rider, that it became apparent they must soon part company; and then, in the midst of its starting, balking, rearing, and lashing out, alternately, the royal tormentor rendered the rider miserable, by questioning him upon many affairs of importance, and hinting his purpose to take that opportunity of communicating to him some of those secrets of state, which the Cardinal had but a little while before sworn an oath to keep.

A more awkward situation could hardly be imagined, than that of a privy-counsellor forced to listen to and reply to his sovereign, while each fresh gambade of his unmanageable horse played him in a new

A broadly though not more conspicuous has pointed out to me that I have been mistaken in alleging that the Cardinal was a bad rider. If so, I own his capacity as a spring for them are few men who could my better days have lived that episode better than myself. But the Cardinal may have been an indifferent horseman, though he wished to be looked upon as such by the danger of the chase. He was a sign of corruption and cowardice as he showed at the siege of Paris in 1418, where, contrary to the custom and usage of war, he remained fixed during the night with an unusual crowd of garrison troops, and other matters. In speaking in the first of a host of all in his country, I mentioned his adventure in Paris when started by someone on which program he had been asked by the crowd to come with the rider and taking its course to a monastery, in the midst of which he finally lodged, was the means of saving his master's life. — The Jean de France Chronicle.

and quite vigorous attitude—his violet robe flying from an eastern and northern fall over the depth of the saddle and its height before and behind. Dunno laughed without restraint while the King, who had a private mode of enjoying his jest inwardly without laughing aloud, merely rebuked his minister as his proper position for the chase, which would not permit him to devote a few moments to business. "I will no longer be your handmaid as a courtier," continued he, addressing the terrified Cardinal, and giving his own horse the rein at the same time.

Before Baldo could utter a word by way of answer or apology, his horse, seeing the lion with his teeth, went forth as an uncontrollable gallop, soon leaving behind the King and Dunno, who followed at a more regulated pace enjoying the excitement and distressed predicament. If any of our readers has chanced to be run away with in his time, (as we ourselves have on more than one full career at one of the pair, pard, and absurdity of the situation. These four limbs of the quadruped, which, no way under the ruler's control, nor sometimes under that of the creature they more properly belong to, fly at such a rate as if the hindmost intent to overtake the foremost, those clinging legs of the beast which are so often with safety planted on the green sward, but which now only suggest our distress by pressing the animal's sides, the hands which have formed the bridle for the mane, the body which, instead of sitting upright on the centre of gravity as old Angelo used to recommend, or slumping forward like a jockey's at Newmarket, lies, rather than hangs, crouched upon the back of the animal with no better chance of saving itself than a sack of corn, combine to make a picture more than sufficiently ludicrous to spectators, however unaccountable to the exhibitor. But add to this some singularity of dress or appearance on the part of the unhappy cavalier—a robe of office, a splendid uniform, or any other peculiarity of costume,—and let the scene of action be a race course, a review, a procession, or any other place of concourse and public display, and if the poor wight would escape being the object of a shower of carthaginische laughter, he must contrive to break a neck or two, or which will be more effectual, to be killed on the spot, for on no slighter condition will his fall excite any thing like serious sympathy. In the present occasion, the short white ruffled gown of the Cardinal, which he used as a riding-dress, having changed his long robes before he left the Cardinal's his scarlet stockings and ermine hat, with the long strings hanging down, together with his attire of horseman, gave infinite zest to his exhibition of horsemanship.

The horse, having taken matters entirely into his own hand, first rather than galloped up a long green sward, overtook the pack in hard pursuit of the bear, and then, having overtaken one or two peasant pickers, who little expected to be charged in the rear, threw him down several times, and greatly confused the chase. Amused by the clamorous and gesticulations and threats of the huntsman, turned the terrified Cardinal upon the formidable animal, stiff, which was rushing on at a speedy trot, furious and embowed with the foam which he churned around his neck. Baldo, on beholding himself so near the lion, set up a dreadful cry for help, which, or perhaps the sight of the bear, produced such an effect on his horse, that the animal interrupted its headlong career by suddenly springing to one side; so that the Cardinal, who had long kept his seat only because the motion was straight forward, now fell heavily to the ground. The conclusion of Baldo's chase took place so near the bear, that, had not the animal been at that moment too much engaged about his own affairs, the vicinity might have proved as fatal to the Cardinal, as it is said to have done to Ferdinand, King of the Vagatha of Spain. The powerful huntsman got off, however, for the fright and crowing as loudly as he could out of the way of hands and hunters, and the whole chase swept by him without affording him assistance, for hunters in those days were as little moved by sympathy for such misfortunes as they are in our own.

The King, as he passed, said to Dunno, "You do him his vengeance too enough—he is no great hunter, though for a failure (when a career is to be sought) he may match Saint Peter himself. He has however but one, I think, met with his match."

The Cardinal did not hear the words, but the spectators had such which they were quick to tell him to support their general import. The drive is said to have such opportunities of temptation as was not afforded by the passions of Baldo, latterly noted as they had been by the scorn of the King. The momentary fright was over as soon as he had uttered himself that his fall was harmless, but morose vanity and resentment against his sovereign, had a much longer influence on his feelings.

After all the chase had passed him, a single cavalier, who seemed rather to be a spectator than a participant of the sport, rode up with one or two attendants, and expressed an small surprise to find the Cardinal upon the ground without a horse or attendance, and in such a plight as plainly showed the signs of the accident which had placed him there. To dismount and offer his assistance in this predicament, to assist one of his attendants to carry a small quilted pelisse for the Cardinal a couple of yards to support at the entrance of the French Court, which thus permitted them to abandon to the danger of the chase and forsake in his need, three women attendants, were the natural modes of assistance and compassion which so strange a circumstance supplied to Crèvecoeur. For it was the Burgundian ambassador who came to the assistance of the Italian Cardinal.

He found the minister in a lucky time and found for removing some of those practices on his dignity, which it is well known that Baldo had the usual weakness to listen. Already in the morning, as the poison temper of Louis had suggested, some had passed between them than the Cardinal had been reported to his master. But although he had listened with great care to the high value, which he was awarded by Crèvecoeur, the Duke of Burgundy placed upon his person and talents, and not without a feeling of indignation, when the Court listened to the significance of his master's disposition, and the rich influence of his master, it was not until the accident, as we have related, had highly wounded him, that, with wounded vanity, he resolved, in a fatal hour, to show Louis XI. that no enemy can be so dangerous as an offended friend and confidant.

On the present occasion, his hostile requests Crèvecoeur to separate from him, and there should be observed, but appointed him a new dog for to remain in the Abbey of Saint Martin, a French monk, who served, and that in a time when he was the guardian that his master had obtained an advantage hardly to have been hoped for except in such a moment of exasperation.

In the meanwhile, Louis, who, though he was pointer Priory of his time, against his own interest of reason, had suffered his passions to be ruled by his prudence, followed contentedly. He had a small dog which was now come to an end, and he had so happened that a great deal of the period, a boat of only the length of the trunk of the proper dog, and he had withdrawn in pursuit of his own dog, and he had a couple of old stags, which were part of the huntman. The King, who was with him, Dunno, as well as others, were present, and enjoyed as ever, the chase, and with over that accomplished knight, who was a hero, which was then thought to be a great war. Louis was well mounted, and he was on the horse, so that when he was to be of to buy in a month's time, one near him but the King himself.

Louis showed all the bravado of a experienced huntsman; for he rode up to the tremendous animal, sending itself with fury against him with his horse upon the bear, the blow was not kill or disable him. No other could have done to charge a second time, as did the King.

ranced on foot against the furious animal, naked in his hand one of those short, it, and pointed swords, which huntsmen such encounters. The boar instantly rushed to rush on his human enemy, while leaving his station, and posting himself behind the sword, with the purpose of aiming at the boar's throat, or rather chest, within the distance in which case, the weight of the beast, and velocity of its career, would have served to its own destruction. But, owing to the uneven ground, the King's foot slipped, just as the boar and perilous manœuvre ought to have been finished, so that the point of the sword struck the cuirass of bristles on the outside of the boar's shoulder, glanced off without making any impression, and Louis fell flat on the ground. So fortunate for the Monarch, because owing to the King's fall, missed his blow and in passing only rent with his tusk the hunting-cloak, instead of ripping up the King when, after running a little a-head of his course, the boar turned to repeat his attack on the King at the moment when he was in the greatest danger. At that moment, Quentin Durward, who had been out in the chase by the slowness of his horse, nevertheless, had luckily distinguished the blast of the King's horn, rode up, and killed the animal with his spear.

Quentin, who had by this time recovered his feet, turned to Durward's assistance, and cut the boar's head off with his sword. Before speaking a word to him, he measured the huge creature not only with his eyes, but even by feet—then wiped the sweat from his forehead, and the blood from his hands—then took his hunting-cap, hung it on a bush, and deposited his orisons to the little leaden images which he had obtained—and at length, looking upon him, "Is it thou, my young Scot? I have begun thy woodcraft well, and Maitre de la Cour-de-Lys yonder.—Why dost thou not hast lost thy forwardness and fire, my young Scot? Court, where others find both." "I am a shrewd youth as ever Scottish breeze blows me into, had imbibed more awe than towards his dangerous master, and was loath to embrace the perilous permission of which he seemed thus invited to use. He chose a few and well-chosen words, that if he addressed his Majesty at all, it could be a pardon for the rustic boldness with which he conducted himself when ignorant of him!" said the King; "I forgive thy saucy spirit and shrewdness. I admired how thou hit upon my gossip Tristan's occupation, have nearly tasted of his handiwork, and given to understand. I bid thee beware of a merchant who deals in rough brace-necklaces. Help me to my horse—I will do thee good. Build on no man's promise—not even on thine uncle's or Lord Dunois'—and say nothing of thy timely aid in this boar; for if a man makes boast that he has killed the King in such a pinch, he must take the consequences for its own recompense."

Then he wound his horn, which brought up several attendants, whose compliments on the slaughter of such a noble animal, led him to appropriate a much greater share than actually belonged to him; for he mentioned the assistance as slightly as a sportsman, who, in boasting of the number of birds he had bagged, does not always dilate upon the assistance of the game-keeper. He then led the King to see that the boar's carcass was the brotherhood of Saint Martin, at which they fared on holy days, and that he remembered the king in their private devotion. Louis, "who hath seen his Eminence, my lord? Methinks it were but poor courtesy, and cold regard to Holy Church, to leave him to rot here in the forest."

"May it please you, Sire," said Quentin, when he saw that all were silent, "I saw his Lordship the Cardinal accommodated with a horse, on which he left the forest."

"Heaven cares for its own," replied the King.—"Set forward to the Castle, my lords; we'll hunt no more this morning.—You, Sir Squire," addressing Quentin, "reach me my wood-knife—it has dropped from the sheath beside the quarry there. Ride on, Dunois—I follow instantly."

Louis, whose lightest motions were often conducted like stratagems, thus gained an opportunity to ask Quentin privately, "My bonny Scot, thou hast an eye, I see—Canst thou tell me who helped the Cardinal to a palfrey?—Some stranger, I should suppose; for as I passed without stopping, the courtiers would likely be in no hurry to do him such a timely good turn."

"I saw those who aided his Eminence but an instant, Sire," said Quentin; "It was only a hasty glance, for I had been unluckily thrown out, and was riding fast, to be in my place; but I think it was the Ambassador of Burgundy and his people."

"Ha!" said Louis.—"Well, be it so—France will match them yet."

There was nothing more remarkable happened, and the King, with his retinue, returned to the Castle.

CHAPTER X.

THE SENTINEL.

Where should this music be? 't is the air, or the earth?
The Tempest

——— I was all ear,
And took in strains that might create a soul
Under the ribs of death.—Comus.

QUENTIN had hardly reached his little cabin, in order to make some necessary changes in his dress, when his worthy relative required to know the full particulars of all that had befallen him at the hunt.

The youth, who could not help thinking that his uncle's hand was probably more powerful than his understanding, took care, in his reply, to leave the King in full possession of the victory which he had seemed desirous to appropriate. Le Balafre's reply was a boast of how much better he himself would have behaved in the like circumstances, and it was mixed with a gentle censure of his nephew's slackness, in not making in to the King's assistance, when he might be in imminent peril. The youth had shown prudence, in answer, to abstain from all farther vindication of his own conduct, except that, according to the rules of woodcraft, he held it ungentle to interfere with the game attacked by another hunter, unless he was specially called upon for his assistance.—This discussion was scarcely ended, when occasion was afforded Quentin to congratulate himself for observing some reserve towards his kinsman. A low tap at the door announced a visiter—it was presently opened, and Oliver Dain, or Mauvais, or Diable, for by all these names he was known, entered the apartment.

This able but most unprincipled man, has been already described, in so far as his exterior is concerned. The aptest resemblance of his motions and manners might perhaps be to those of the domestic cat, which while couching in seeming slumber, or gliding through the apartment with slow, stealthy, and timid steps, is now engaged in watching the hole of some unfortunate mouse, now in rubbing herself with apparent confidence and fondness against those by whom she desires to be caressed, and presently after, is flying upon her prey, or scratching, perhaps, the very object of her former cajolements.

He entered with stooping shoulders, a humble and modest look, and threw such a degree of civility into his address to the Seigneur Balafre, that no one who saw the interview could have avoided concluding that he came to ask a boon of the Scottish Archer. He congratulated Lesly on the excellent conduct of his young kinsman in the chase that day, which, he observed, had attracted the King's particular attention. He had paused for a reply; and with his eyes fixed on the ground, save just when once or twice they stole upwards to take a side glance at Quentin, he heard Blaisé observe, "That his Majesty had been unlucky in not having himself by his side instead of his nephew, as he would questionless have made in, and spared the brute, a matter which he understood Quentin had left upon his Majesty's royal hands, so far as he could learn the story. But it will be a lesson to his Majesty," he said, "while he lives, to mount a man of my inches on a better horse; for how could my great hall of a Flemish dray horse keep up with his Majesty's Norman runner? I am sure I spared till his sides were furrowed. It is ill considered, Master Oliver, and you must represent it to his Majesty."

Master Oliver only replied to this observation by turning towards the bold bluff speaker, one of those slow, dubious glances, which, accompanied by a slight motion of the hand, and a gentle depression of the head to one side, may be either interpreted as a mute assent to what is said, or as a cautious depreciation of further prosecution of the subject. It was a deeper, more scrutinizing glance, which he bent on the youth, as he said, with an ambiguous smile, "So, young man, is it the wont of Scotland to suffer your Prince to be endangered for the lack of aid, in such emergencies as this of to-day?"

"It is our custom," answered Quentin, determined to throw no farther light on the subject, "not to encounter them with assistance in honourable positions, when they can aid themselves without it. We hold that a Prince in a hunting-field must take his chance with others, and that he comes there for the very purpose. What were woodcraft without fatigue and without danger?"

"You hear the silly boy," said his uncle; "that is always the way with him; he hath an answer or a reason ready to be rendered to every one. I wonder whence he hath caught the gift; I never could give a reason for any thing I have ever done in my life, except for eating when I was hungry, calling the muster-roll, and such points of duty as the like."

"And pray, worthy Seigneur," said the royal tennor, looking at him from under his eyelids, "what might your reason be for calling the muster-roll on such occasions?"

"Because the Captain commanded me," said Le Blaisé. "By Saint Giles, I know no other reason! If he had commanded Tyro or Cunningham, they must have done the same."

"A most military final cause!" said Oliver.—"But, Seigneur Le Blaisé, you will be glad, doubtless, to learn, that his Majesty is so far from being displeased with your nephew's conduct, that he hath selected him to execute a piece of duty this afternoon."

"Selected him?" said Blaisé, in great surprise.—"Selected me, I suppose you mean?"

"I mean precisely as I speak," replied the barber, in a mild but decided tone, "the King hath a commission with which to entrust your nephew."

"Why, wherefore, and for what reason?" said Blaisé; "why doth he choose the boy, and not me?"

"I can go no farther back than your own ultimate cause, Seigneur Le Blaisé, such are his Majesty's commands. But," said he, "if I might use the presumption to form a conjecture, it may be his Majesty hath work to do, siter for a youth like your nephew, than for an experienced warrior like yourself, Seigneur Blaisé. Wherefore, young gentleman, get your weapons and follow me. Bring with you a harquebus, for you are to mount sentinel."

"Sentinel?" said the uncle—"are you sure you are right, Master Oliver? The inner guards of the Castle have ever been mounted by them only who have (like me) served twelve years in our honourable body."

"I am quite certain of his Majesty's pleasure," said Oliver, "and must no longer delay executing it."

"But," said Le Blaisé, "my nephew is not even a free Archer, being only an Esquire, serving under my lance."

"Pardon me," answered Oliver, "the King sent for the register not half an hour since, and enrolled him among the Guard. Have the goodness to assist to put your nephew in order for the service."

Blaisé, who had no ill-nature, or even much jealousy, in his disposition, hastily set about adjusting his nephew's dress, and giving him directions for his conduct under arms, but was unable to refrain from larding them with interjections of surprise at such luck chancing to fall upon the young man so early.

"It had never taken place before in the Scottish Guard," he said, "not even in his own instance. But doubtless his service must be to mount guard over the popinjays and Indian peacocks, which the Venetian ambassador had lately presented to the King—could be nothing else, and such duty being only fit for a beardless boy," (here he twisted his own grey mustaches,) "he was glad the lot had fallen on his fair nephew."

Quick and sharp of wit, as well as ardent in duty, Quentin saw visions of higher importance in the early summons to the royal presence, and his heart beat high at the anticipation of rising into speedy distinction. He determined carefully to watch the manner and language of his conductor, which he expected must, in some cases at least, be interrupted by contrivances, as mockeries are said to discover the interpretation of dreams. He could not but beg himself on having observed strict secrecy on the steps of the chase, and then formed a resolution, which, for so young a person, had much producer in it, that while he breathed the air of this secluded and mysterious Court, he would keep his thoughts locked in his bosom, and his tongue under the most careful regulation.

His equipment was soon complete, and, with his harquebus on his shoulder, (for though they retained the name of Archers, the Scottish guard very early substituted fire-arms for the long-bow, in the use of which their nation never excelled,) he followed Master Oliver out of the barrack.

His uncle looked long after him, with a countenance in which wonder was blended with curiosity; and though neither envy, nor the malignant feelings which it engenders, entered into his honest meditation, that was yet a trace of wounded or diminished self-importance, which mingled with the pleasure accorded by his nephew's favourable commencement of service.

He shook his head gravely, opened a privy cupboard, took out a large bottle of about old wine, shook it to examine how well the contents had stood, filled and drank a hearty cup; then took his hat, half remaining on the great velvet settle, and having once again slowly shaken his head, retired as much apparent to view from the courtyard, that, like the toy raised a manikin, he continued the gesture and he dropped and a stumble from which he was not roused by the signal to drive.

When Quentin Durward left his work to the chamberlain's aid, he followed his conductor, Master Oliver, who, without changing any of the former route, led him partly through a series of passages opened to the open air, but chiefly through a row of stables, vaults, and galleries, communicating with each other by secret doors, and of irregular passage, as a large and spacious interior gallery, which made breadth enough to have been almost termed a hall, but with towers more ancient than battlements, and a very few of the battlements, ghostly looking ruins belonging to the first dawn of the arts, which recorded their splendid sunrise. These were ranged to represent the Paladins of Charlemagne, who, such a distinguished figure in the romantic history of France, and as the gigantic form of the central Orland, constituted the most prominent figure in the apartment acquired from him the title of Roland's hall, or Roland's gallery.

"You will keep watch here," said Oliver in a low whisper, as if the hard drabstones of men-at-arms and warriors around could have been offended by the voice of his voice, or as if he had feared to awaken the echoes that lurked among the groined vaults and Gothic drop-work on the ceiling of this huge and dreary apartment.

"What are the orders and signs of my watch?" answered Quentin, in the same suppressed tone.

"Is your harquebuss loaded?" replied Oliver, without answering his query.

"That," answered Quentin, "is soon done;" and proceeded to charge his weapon, and to light the slow-match (by which when necessary it was discharged) at the end of a wood fire, which was expiring in the huge hall chimney—a chimney itself so large, that it might have been called a Gothic closet or chapel pertaining to the hall.

When this was performed, Oliver told him that he was ignorant of one of the high privileges of his own corps, which only received orders from the King in person, or the High Constable of France, in lieu of their own officers. "You are placed here by his Majesty's command, young man," added Oliver, "and you will not be long here without knowing wherewith you are summoned. Meantime your walk extends along this gallery. You are permitted to stand still when you list, but on no account to sit down, or quit your weapon. You are not to sing aloud, or whisper, upon any account; but you may, if you list, mutter some of the church's prayers, or what else you list, that has no offence in it, in a low voice. Pipewell, and keep good watch."

"Good watch!" thought the youthful soldier as he glided away from him with that noiseless gliding step which was peculiar to him, and vanished through a side door behind the arras—"Good watch! but upon whom, and against whom?—for what, save hate or rage, are there here to contend with, unless these grim old representatives of humanity should start into life for the disturbance of my guard? Well, it is my duty, I suppose, and I must perform it."

With the vigorous purpose of discharging his duty, even to the very rigour, he tried to while away the time with some of the pious hymns which he had learned in the convent in which he had found shelter after the death of his father, allowing in his own mind, that but for the change of a novice's frock for the rich military dress which he now wore, his soldierly walk in the royal gallery of France resembled greatly those of which he had tired excessively in the cloistered seclusion of Aberbrothick.

Presently, as if to convince himself he now belonged not to the evil but to the world, he chanted to himself, but in such tone as not to exceed the license given to him, some of the ancient rude ballads which the old family harper had taught him, of the defeat of the Danes at Aberlemon and Forres, the murder of King Deless at Forfar, and other pithy sonnets and lays, which appertained to the history of his distant native country and particularly of the district to which he belonged. This wore away a considerable space of time, and it was now more than two hours past noon, when Quentin was reminded by his appetite that the good fathers of Aberbrothick, however strict in demanding his attendance upon the hours of devotion, were no less punctual in summoning him to those of pleasure, whereas here, in the interior of a royal palace, after a morning spent in exercise, and a noon exhausted in duty, no man seemed to consider it as a natural consequence that he must be impatient for his dinner.

There are, however, charms in sweet sounds which can but too rest even the natural feelings of impatience by which Quentin was now visited. At the opposite extremities of the long hall, or gallery, were two large doors, ornamented with heavy architraves, probably opening into different suites of apartments, in which the gallery served as a medium of mutual communication. As the sentinel directed his solitary walk between these two entrances, which formed the boundary of his duty, he was startled by a strain of music which was suddenly waked near one of those doors, and which, at least in his imagination, was a continuation of the same lute and voice by which he had been enchanted on the preceding day. All the day of yesterday morning, so much weakened by the agitating circumstances which he had since undergone, again rose more vivid from their slumber, and, planted on the spot where his ear could most conveniently drink in the sounds, Quentin remained, with his harquebuss shouldered, his mouth half open, ear, eye, and soul directed to the spot, rather the picture of a sentinel than a living form,—without any other idea than that of catching, if possible, each passing sound of the dulcet melody.

These delightful sounds were but partially heard—they languished, lingered, ceased entirely, and were from time to time renewed after uncertain intervals. But, besides that music, like beauty, is often most delightful, or at least most interesting to the imagination, when its charms are but partially displayed, and the imagination is left to fill up what is from distance but imperfectly detailed, Quentin had matter enough to fill up his reverie during the intervals of fascination. He could not doubt, from the report of his uncle's comrades, and the scene which had passed in the presence-chamber that morning, that the arena who thus delighted his ears, was not, as he had profanely supposed, the daughter or kinswoman of a base character but the same disguised and distressed Countess, for whose cause Kings and Princes were now about to buckle on armour, and put lance in rest. A hundred wild dreams, such as romantic and adventurous youth readily nourished in a romantic and adventurous age, chased from his eyes the bodily presentment of the actual scene, and substituted their own bewildering delusions, when at once, and rudely, they were banished by a rough grasp laid upon his weapon, and a harsh voice which exclaimed, close to his ear, "Ha! Parvez-dieu, Sir Squire, methinks you keep sleepy ward here!"

The voice was the tunder, yet impressive and ironical tone of Montre Pierre, and Quentin, suddenly recalled to himself, saw, with shame and fear, that he had, in his reverie, permitted Louis himself—entering probably by some secret door, and gliding along by the wall, or behind the tapestry—to approach him so nearly, as almost to master his weapon.

The first impulse of his surprise was to free his harquebuss by a violent exertion, which made the King stagger backward into the hall. His next apprehension was, that in obeying the animal instinct, as it may be termed, which prompts a brave man to resist an attempt to disarm him, he had aggravated, by a personal struggle with the King, the displeasure produced by the negligence with which he had performed his duty upon guard; and, under this impression, he recovered his harquebuss without almost knowing what he did, and, having again shouldered it, stood motionless before the Monarch, whom he had reason to conclude he had mortally offended.

Louis, whose tyrannical disposition was less founded on natural ferocity or cruelty of temper, than on cold-blooded policy and jealous suspicion, had, nevertheless, a share of that caustic severity which would have made him a despot in private conversation, and always seemed to enjoy the pain which he inflicted on occasions like the present. But he did not push his triumph far, and contented himself with saying,

"Thy service of the morning hath already overpaid some negligence in so young a soldier—Hast thou dined?"

Quentin, who rather looked to be sent to the Provost-Marshal, than greeted with such a compliment, answered humbly in the negative.

"Poor lad," said Louis, in a softer tone than he usually spoke in, "hunger hath made him drowsy.—I know thine appetite is a wolf," he continued; "and I will save thee from one wild beast as thou didst me from another;—thou hast been prudent too in that matter, and I thank thee for it—Canst thou yet hold out an hour without food?"

"Four-and-twenty, Sire," replied Durward, "or I were no true Scot."

"I would not for another kingdom be the party which should encounter thee after such a vigil," said the King; "but the question now is, not of thy dinner, but of my own. I admit to my table this day, and in strict privacy, the Cardinal Balue and this Burgundian—this Count de Crèvecœur, and something may chance—the devil is most busy when foes meet on terms of truce.”

He stopped and remained silent, with a deep and gloomy look. As the King was in no haste to proceed, Quentin at length ventured to ask what his duty was to be in these circumstances.

“To keep watch at the beaufet, with thy loaded weapon,” said Louis; “and if there is treason, to shoot the traitor dead.”

“Treason, Sire! and in this guarded Castle!” exclaimed Durward.

“You think it impossible,” said the King, not offended, it would seem, by his frankness; “but our history has shown that treason can creep into an augur-hole.—Treason excluded by guards! O thou silly boy!—quis custodiat ipsos custodes—who shall exclude the treason of those very warders?”

“Their Scottish honour,” answered Durward, boldly.

“True; most right—thou pleasest me,” said the King, cheerfully; “the Scottish honour was ever true, and I trust it accordingly. But treason!”—Here he relapsed into his former gloomy mood, and traversed the apartment with unequal steps—“She sits at our feasts, she sparkles in our bowls, she wears the beard of our counsellors, the smiles of our courtiers, the crazy laugh of our jesters—above all, she lies hid under the friendly air of a reconciled enemy. Louis of Orleans trusted John of Burgundy—he was murdered in the Rue Barbette. John of Burgundy trusted the faction of Orleans—he was murdered on the Bridge of Montereau.—I will trust no one—no one. Hark ye; I will keep my eye on that insolent Count; ay, and on the Churchman too, whom I hold not too faithful. When I say, Ecosse, en avant,* shoot Crève-cœur dead on the spot.”

“It is my duty,” said Quentin, “your Majesty’s life being endangered.”

“Certainly—I mean it no otherwise,” said the King.—“What should I get by slaying this insolent soldier?—Were it the Constable Saint Paul indeed?”—Here he paused, as if he thought he had said a word too much, but resumed, laughing, “There’s our brother-in-law, James of Scotland—your own James, Quentin—poniarded the Douglas when on a hospitable visit, within his own royal castle of Skirling.”

“Of Stirling,” said Quentin, “and so please your highness.—It was a deed of which came little good.”

“Stirling call you the castle?” said the King, overlooking the latter part of Quentin’s speech—“Well, let it be Stirling—the name is nothing to the purpose. But I meditate no injury to these men—none—It would serve me nothing. They may not purpose equally fair by me.—I rely on thy harquebuss.”

“I shall be prompt at the signal,” said Quentin; “but yet”——

“You hesitate,” said the King. “Speak out—I give thee full leave. From such as thou art, hints may be caught that are right valuable.”

“I would only presume to say,” replied Quentin, “that your Majesty having occasion to distrust this Burgundian, I marvel that you suffer him to approach so near your person, and that in privacy.”

“O content you, Sir Squire,” said the King.—

“There are some dangers, which, when they are braved, disappear, and which yet, when there is an obvious and apparent dread of them displayed, become certain and inevitable. When I walk boldly up to a surly mastiff, and caress him, it is ten to one I soothe him to good temper; if I show fear of him, he flies on me and rends me. I will be thus far frank with thee—It concerns me nearly that this man returns not to his headlong master in a resentful humour. I run my risk, therefore. I have never shunned to expose my life for the weal of my kingdom.—Follow me.”

Louis led his young Life-guards-man, for whom he seemed to have taken a special favour, through the side-door by which he had himself entered, saying, as he showed it him, “He who would thrive at Court must know the private wickets and concealed staircases—ay, and the traps and pitfalls of the palace, as well as the principal entrances, folding-doors, and portals.”

* Forward, Scotland.

After several turns and passages, the a small vaulted room, where a table was dinner with three covers. The whole arrangements of the room were plain and neat. A beaufet, or folding and moveable held a few pieces of gold and silver plate only article in the chamber which had, of the highest degree, the appearance of royalty. A cupboard, and completely hidden by it, which Louis assigned to Quentin Durward having ascertained, by going to different rooms, that he was invisible from all quarters, his last charge—“Remember the en avant; and so soon as ever I utter the word, throw down the screen—spare not for me, and be sure thou take good aim at Crève-cœur. If the piece fail, cling to him, and use thy knife. I can deal with the Cardinal.”

Having thus spoken, he whistled aloud, and motioned into the apartment Oliver, who was valet of the chamber as well as barber and factotum, performed all offices immediately connected with the King’s person, and who now appeared by two old men, who were the only assistants at the royal table. So soon as the King took his place, the visitors were admitted, though himself unseen, was so situated as to mark all the particulars of the interview.

The King welcomed his visitors with the utmost cordiality, which Quentin had the utmost reason to reconcile with the directions which he had received, and the purpose for which he had been armed with his deadly weapon. Not only did Louis appear totally free from suspicion of any kind, but one would have thought those visitors whom he had done the honour to admit to his table, were the very persons to whom he could most unreservedly confide, and who were most willing to honour. Nothing could be more dignified, and at the same time more courteous in manner. While all around him, in his own dress, was far beneath the splendour of the petty princes of the kingdom displayed in theirs, his own language and manners were worthy of a mighty Sovereign in his most condescending mood. Quentin was tempted to suppose, either from his previous conversation with Louis, or from the dream, or that the dutiful demeanour of the King, and the frank, open, and gallant bearing of the Burgundian noble, had entirely erased the King’s suspicions.

But whilst the guests, in obedience to the King, in the act of placing themselves at the royal table, the King’s eye darted one keen glance on them, and he constantly directed his look to Quentin’s position. He had done in an instant; but the glance conveyed no doubt and hatred towards his guests, and no contrary injunction on Quentin to be watchful, and prompt in execution, that no opportunity should be lost for doubting that the sentiments of Louis were unaltered, and his apprehensions unabated. Therefore, more than ever astonished at the manner under which that Monarch was able to control his movements of his jealous disposition.

Appearing to have entirely forgotten which Crève-cœur had held towards him, the King conversed with him of events which had occurred during his residence in the territories of Burgundy, and inquired of all the nobles with whom he had been conversing, as if that period had indeed been the happiest of his life, and as if he retained towards all who had been banished to soften the term of his exile, the most grateful sentiments.

“To an ambassador of another nation,” said the King, “I would have thrown something of a cold reception; but to an old friend, who often boarded at the Castle of Genappe,† I will be as simple and plain as any of his Parisian friends. But I directed them to make some better arrangements for you, Sir Count, for I know

"We already, Sire, even to overflowing," said the Cardinal, with the lowly mien of a favourite indulgent master.

"We know that your Eminence can carry it in hand," said Louis. "But which side use in the great controversy—Sillery or France or Burgundy?"

"And neutral, Sire," said the Cardinal, "wash my cup with Auvernat."

"It has a perilous part to sustain," said Louis as he observed the Cardinal colour had glided from the subject, and added, "refer the Auvernat, because it is so noble lures not water.—You, Sir Count, hem—dry your cup. I trust you have found no earnest at the bottom."

"Sir," said the Count de Crèvecœur, "national quarrels could be as pleasantly rivalry betwixt our vineyards."

"A, Sir Count," answered the King, "with me as you have taken to your draught ne.—And now that it is finished, favour me the goblet in your bosom, and keeping of our regard. It is not to every one a part with it. It belonged of yore to France, Henry V. of England, and when Rouen was reduced, and those expelled from Normandy by the joint arms of Burgundy. It cannot be better bestowed on a noble and valiant Burgundian, who that on the union of these two nations continuance of the freedom of the continent the English yoke."

"It made a suitable answer, and Louis inclined way to the satirical gayety of disposition sometimes enlivened the darker shades of. Leading, of course, the conversation, always shrewd and caustic, and often acerbic were seldom good-natured, and the answer which he illustrated them were often more brusque than delicate; but in no one word, however, did he betray the state of mind of one prone to assassination, hitherto in his aparted soldier, with his piece loaded, in order to anticipate an attack on his person."

"The Count de Crèvecœur gave frankly into the current; while the smooth churchman laughed, and enhanced every ludicrous idea, without giving any shame at expressions which the young Scot blush even in his place. In about an hour and a half the dinner was drawn; and the King, taking courteous leave of his guests, gave the signal that it was his last meal."

"After all, even Oliver, had retired, he called to his place of concealment; but with a consciousness that the youth could scarce believe it was he which had so lately given animation and zest to the tale. As he approached, a great change in his countenance. The former vivacity had left the King's eyes, and deserted his face, and he exhibited all the mannerisms of a celebrated actor, when he has finished his representation of some favourite character, in which, while upon the stage, he had displayed the utmost vivacity.

"Thy watch is not yet over," said he to Quentin—"refresh thyself for an instant—yonder table affords the means—I will then instruct thee in thy farther duty. Meanwhile, it is ill talking between a full man and a fasting."

He threw himself back on his seat, covered his brow with his hand, and was silent.

CHAPTER XI.

THE HALL OF ROLAND.

Painters show Cupid blind—Hath Hymen eyes?
Or is his sight warp'd by those spectacles
Which parents, guardians, and advisers, lend him,
That he may look through them on lands and mansions,
On jewels, gold, and all such rich donations,
And see their value ten times magnified?—
Methinks 'twill brook a question.

The Miseries of Enforced Marriage.

Louis the XIth of France, though the sovereign in Europe who was fondest and most jealous of power, desired only its substantial enjoyment; and though he knew well enough, and at times exacted strictly, the observances due to his rank, was in general singularly careless of show.

In a prince of sounder moral qualities, the familiarity with which he invited subjects to his board—nay, occasionally sat at theirs—must have been highly popular; and even such as he was, the King's homeliness of manners atoned for many of his vices with that class of his subjects who were not particularly exposed to the consequences of his suspicion and jealousy. The tiers état, or commons of France, who rose to more opulence and consequence under the reign of this sagacious Prince, respected his person, though they loved him not; and it was resting on their support that he was enabled to make his party good against the hatred of the nobles, who conceived that he diminished the honour of the French crown, and obscured their own splendid privileges, by that very neglect of form which gratified the citizens and commons.

With patience, which most other princes would have considered as degrading, and not without a sense of amusement, the Monarch of France waited till his Life-guards-man had satisfied the keenness of a youthful appetite. It may be supposed, however, that Quentin had too much sense and prudence to put the royal patience to a long or tedious proof; and indeed he was repeatedly desirous to break off his repast ere Louis would permit him. "I see it in thine eye," he said, good-naturedly, "that thy courage is not half abated. Go on—God and Saint Dennis!—charge again. I tell thee that meat and mass" (crossing himself) "never hindered the work of a good Christian man. Take a cup of wine; but mind thou be cautious of the wine-pot—it is the vice of thy countrymen as well as of the English, who, lacking that folly, are the choicest soldiers ever wore armour. And now wash speedily—forget not thy benedicite, and follow me."

Quentin obeyed, and, conducted by a different, but as mazelike an approach as he had formerly passed, he followed Louis into the Hall of Roland.

"Take notice," said the King, imperatively, "thou hast never left this post—let that be thine answer to thy kinsman and comrades—and, hark thee, to bind the recollection on thy memory, I give thee this gold chain," (flinging on his arm one of considerable value.) "If I go not brave myself, those whom I trust have ever the means to ruffle it with the best. But, when such chains as these bind not the tongue from wagging too freely, my gossip, L'Hermite, hath an amulet for the throat, which never fails to work a certain cure. And now attend.—No man, save Oliver or I myself, enters here this evening; but ladies will come hither, perhaps from the one extremity of the hall, perhaps from the other, perhaps one from each. You may answer if they address you, but, being on duty, your answer must be brief; and you must neither address them in your turn, nor engage in any prolonged discourse. But listen to what they say. Thus ears, as well as thy hands are mine. I have bought thee, body and soul. Therefore if thou hearest ought of that conversation, thou must retain it in memory and it is communicated to me, and then forget it. And now I think better on it, it will be best that thou pass for a French recruit, who hath come straight down from his mountains and hath not yet acquired our most (broken) language. Right. Oh, if they speak to thee, thou wilt not answer: that will free you from embarrassment, and lead them to converse without regard to your presence. You understand me. Farewell. Be wary and then hast a friend."

The King had scarce spoken these words ere he disappeared behind the arras, leaving Quentin to meditate on what he had seen and heard. The youth was in one of those moments from which a pleasantness to look forward then to look back, for the reflection that he had been planted like a workman in a thicket who watches for a sign to take the life of the noble Count of Crévecœur had in it nothing annoying. It was very true, that the King's men were armed on this occasion merely cautionary and defensive: but how did the youth know but he might be soon commanded on some offensive operation of the same kind? This would be an unpleasant crime, since it was plain, from the character of his master, that there would be destruction in refusing, while his honour told him there would be disgrace in complying. He turned his thoughts from this subject of reflection, with the sage consultation to often adopted by youth when prospective dangers intrude themselves on their mind, that it was time enough to think what was to be done when the emergency actually arrived, and that sufficient for the day was the evil thereof.

Quentin made use of this salutary reflection the more easily that the last commands of the King had given him something more agreeable to think of than his own condition. The Lady of the Lute was certainly one of those to whom his attention was to be directed: and well in his mind did he promise to obey one part of the King's mandate, and listen with diligence to every word that might drop from her lips, that he might know if the magic of her conversation equalled that of her mune. But with as much sincerity did he swear to himself, that no part of her discourse should be reported by him to the King, which might affect the last speaker otherwise than favourably.

Meantime there was no fear of his again slumbering on his post. Each passing breath of wind, which, finding its way through the open lattice, waved the old arras, sounded like the approach of the fair object of his expectation. He felt, in short, all that mysterious anxiety, and eagerness of expectation, which is always the companion of love, and sometimes hath a considerable share in creating it.

At length, a door actually creaked and jingled, (for the doors even of palaces did not in the fifteenth century turn on their hinges so noiseless as ours;) but, alas! it was not at that end of the hall from which the lute had been heard. It opened, however, and a female figure entered, followed by two others, whom she directed by a sign to remain without, while she herself came forward into the hall. By her imperfect and unequal gait, which showed to peculiar disadvantage as she traversed this long gallery, Quentin at once recognised the Princess Joan, and, with the respect which became his situation, drew himself up in a sitting attitude of silent vigilance, and lowered his weapon to her as she passed. She acknowledged the courtesy by a gracious inclination of her head, and he had an opportunity of seeing her countenance more distinctly than he had in the morning.

There was little in the features of this ill-fated Princess to attract the admiration of her shape and gait. Her face was, indeed, by no means disagreeable in itself, though destitute of beauty: and there was a meek expression of suffering patience in her large blue eyes, which were commonly fixed upon the ground. But beside that she was extremely pallid in complexion, her skin had the yellowish discoloured tinge which accompanies habitual bad health: and though her teeth were white and regular, her lips were thin and pale. The Princess had a profusion of brown hair, but it was so light-coloured, as to be almost of a bluish tinge: and her two women, who doubtless enjoyed the luxuriance of her mistress's tresses as a beauty, had not greatly improved matters, by arranging them in curls around her pale countenance, to which they added an expression almost corpse-like and unearthly. To make matters still worse, she had chosen a vest or cymar of a pale green silk, which gave her on the whole, a ghastly and even spectral appearance.

While Quentin followed the singular apartment with eyes in which curiosity was blended with compassion, for every look and motion of the Princess seemed to call for the latter feeling, two ladies entered from the upper end of the apartment.

One of these was the young person, who, upon leaving a previous one, had served him with fruit, while Quentin made his memorable breakfast at the Fleur-de-Lys. I seated now with all the mysterious dignity belonging to the symbol of the veil and bow, and perfect majesty: at least in Quentin's estimation, as he the high-born nephew of a rich cardinal, her beauty made her figure. Her appearance upon him, which a lady of her rank he would not have deemed the daughter of a pauper, was larger, in stature, upon a rich and humorous old bachelor. He was wondering what fascination could ever have resulted from him her real character. Yet her dress was truly as simple as before, being a sort of deep mourning, without any ornaments. Her head-dress was but a veil of crepe, which was loosely thrown back, as to leave her face uncovered, and it was only Quentin's knowledge of her actual rank, which gave him estimation new elegance to her beautiful shape, a dignity to her step which had before remained unusual, and to her regular features, brilliant complexion, and dazzling eyes, an air of conscious nobleness, that enhanced their beauty.

Had death been the penalty Doward must needs have rendered to this beauty and her outrageous (to some homage which he had just paid to the society of the Princess. They received it as than who was accustomed to the deference of inferior, and returned it with courtesy, but he thought: perhaps a woman a youthful vision that the young lady could slightly kept her eyes on the ground, and seemed embarrassed, though in a trifling degree, as she returned his military salutation. This must have been owing to her recollection of the audacious strategy in the neighbouring turret at the Fleur-de-Lys, but did that disproportionate express displeasure? The question he had no means to determine.

The companion of the youthful Countess, dressed like herself simply, and in deep mourning, was as the age when women are apt to cling most closely to that reputation for beauty which has for years been diminishing. She had still remains enough to show that the power of her charms must once have been, and remembering past triumphs, it was evident from her manner that she had not relinquished the pretensions to future conquests. She was tall and graceful, though somewhat haughty in her deportment, and returned the salute of Quentin with a smile of generous consideration, whispering the next instant something into her companion's ear, who turned towards the soldier as if to say, "I am sure you have the most lady, but I cannot see why you should not be so." Quentin, in fact, did not know, supposing that the observation (which he had made) was a mere compliment, and that the lady (who had been so often his own good friend) and companion, did not have any other pleasure with the story, than the fact of being so did not choose to be a witness to her own vanity. Probably he thought there was already a sort of mysterious connexion beginning to exist between them, and gave importance to the slightest trifle.

This reflection was momentary, for he was now wrapped up in attention to the meeting of the Princess Joan with these strange ladies. She had stood up upon their entrance, in order to receive them, and, as she was somewhat embarrassed in moving and repaying their compliments, the other ladies

d submissive was the reverence with which an Harbours de Croya, as was the elder I received the obliging offer of the Prin-cess. She had been long the subservient, was mistress of the manners which are there acquired, and held firmly the established rule of courtiers of all ages, who, although their usual private conversation turns upon the vices and follies of their patrons, and on the injuries and neglect which they themselves have sustained, never suffer such hints to drop from them in the presence of the Sovereign or those of his family. The lady was, therefore, scandalized to the last degree at the mistake which had undervalued her to speak so indecorously in presence of the daughter of Louis. She would have exhausted herself in expressing regret and making apologies, had she not been put to silence and restored to equanimity by the Princess, who requested, in the most gentle manner yet which, from a Daughter of France, had the weight of a command, that no more might be said in the way either of excuse or of explanation.

The Princess Joan then took her own chair with a dignity which became her, and compelled the two strangers to sit, one on either hand, to which the younger consented with unfeigned and respectful diffidence, and the elder with an affectation of deep humility and deference, which was intended for such. They spoke together, but in such a low tone, that the sentinel could not overhear their discourse, and only remarked, that the Princess seemed to bestow much of her regard on the younger and more interesting lady, and that the Countess Harbours, though speaking a great deal more, attracted less of the Princess's attention by her full flow of conversation and compliment, than did her kinswoman by her brief and modest replies to what was addressed to her.

The conversation of the ladies had not lasted a quarter of an hour, when the door at the lower end of the hall opened, and a man entered shrouded in a riding-cloak. Mindful of the King's injunction, and determined not to be a second time caught slumbering, Quentin instantly moved towards the intruder, and, interposing between him and the ladies, requested him to retire instantly.

"By whose command?" said the stranger, in a tone of contemptuous surprise.

"By that of the King," said Quentin, firmly, "which I am placed here to enforce."

"Not against Louis of Orleans," said the Duke, dropping his cloak.

The young man hesitated a moment; but how enforce his orders against the first Prince of the blood, about to be allied, as the report now generally went, with the King's own family?

"Your Highness," he said, "is too great that your pleasure should be withstood by me. I trust your Highness will bear me witness that I have done the duty of my post as far as your will permitted."

"Go to—you shall have no blame, young soldier," said Orleans, and passing forward, paid his compliments to the Princess, with that air of constraint which always marked his courtesy when addressing her.

"He had been dining," he said, "with Dunon, and understanding there was society in Roland's Gallery, he had ventured on the freedom of adding one to the number."

The colour which mounted into the pale cheek of the unfortunate Joan, and which for the moment spread something of beauty over her features, evinced that this addition to the company was any thing but indifferent to her. She hastened to present the Prince to the two ladies of Croya, who received him with the respect due to his eminent rank; and the Princess, pointing to a chair, requested him to join their conversation party.

The Duke declined the freedom of assuming a seat in such society, but taking a cushion from one of the tables, he sat it at the feet of the beautiful young Countess of Croya, and so seated himself, that, without appearing to neglect the Princess, he was enabled to bestow the greater share of his attention on her lovely neighbour.

At first it seemed as if this arrangement rather pleased than offended his destined bride. She encouraged the Duke in his gallantries towards the fair stranger, and seemed to regard them as complimentary to herself. But the Duke of Orleans, though accustomed to subject his mind to the stern yoke of his such, when in the King's presence, had enough of princely nature to induce him to follow his own inclinations whenever that restraint was withdrawn; and his high rank giving him a right to oversee the ordinary ceremonies, and advance at once to him, partly his praise of the Countess Isabelle's beauty became so energetic, and flowed with such unrestrained freedom, owing perhaps to his having drunk a little more wine than usual for Duquesne was no enemy to the worship of Bacchus—that at length he seemed almost unpossessed, and the presence of the Princess appeared well nigh forgotten.

The tone of compliment which he indulged was grateful only to one individual in the circle; for the Countess Hameline already anticipated the dignity of an alliance with the first Prince of the blood, by means of her whose birth, beauty, and large possessions, rendered such an ambitious consummation by no means impossible, even in the eyes of a less sanguine projector, could the views of Louis XI. have been left out of the calculation of chance. The younger Countess listened to the Duke's gallantries with anxiety and embarrassment, and ever and anon turned an entreating look towards the Princess, as if supposing her to come to her relief. But the wounded feelings, and the timidity of Jean of France, rendered her incapable of an effort to make the conversation more general, and at length, excepting a few interjectional civilities of the Lady Hameline, it was maintained almost exclusively by the Duke himself, though at the expense of the younger Countess of Croye, whose beauty formed the theme of his high-flown eloquence.

Nor must I forget that there was a third person, the unregarded sentinel, who saw his fair visions melt away like wax before the sun, as the Duke persevered in the warm tenor of his passionate discourse. At length the Countess Isabelle de Croye made a determined effort to cut short what was becoming intolerably disagreeable to her, especially from the pain to which the conduct of the Duke was apparently subjecting the Princess.

Addressing the latter, she said, modestly, but with some firmness, that the first boon she had to claim from her promised protection was, "that her Highness would undertake to convince the Duke of Orleans, that the ladies of Burgundy, though inferior in wit and manners to those of France, were not such charitable fools, as to be pleased with no other conversation than that of extravagant compliment."

"I grieve, lady," said the Duke, preventing the Princess's answer, "that you will esteem, in the same sentence, the beauty of the dames of Burgundy, and the sincerity of the knights of France. If we are hasty and extravagant in the expression of our admiration, it is because we love as we fight, without letting cold deliberation come into our bosoms, and surrender to the fair with the same rapidity with which we defeat the valiant."

"The beauty of our countrywomen," said the young Countess, with more of reproof than she had yet ventured to use towards the high born matron, "is as unfit to claim such triumphs, as the valour of the men of Burgundy is incapable of yielding them."

"I respect your patriotism, Countess," said the Duke, "and the last branch of your thesis shall not be impugned by me, till a Burgundian knight shall offer to sustain it with lance in rest. But for the injustice which you have done to the charms which your land produces, I appeal from yourself to yourself—I look there," he said, pointing to a large mirror the gift of the Venetian republic, and then of the highest rarity and value, "and tell me, as you look, what is the heart that can resist the charms there represented?"

The Princess, unable to sustain any longer the neglect of her lover, here sunk backwards on her chair with a sigh, which at once recalled the Duke from the land of romance, and induced the Lady Hameline to ask whether her Highness found herself ill.

"A sudden pain shot through my forehead," said the Princess, attempting to smile; "but I shall be presently better."

Her increasing paleness contradicted her words, and induced the Lady Hameline to call for assistance, as the Princess was about to faint.

The Duke, losing his lip, and curbing the folly which could not keep guard over his tongue, as to summon the Princess's attendants, who were in the next chamber, and when they came hastily, with the usual remembrance, he could not but, as a cavalier and gentleman, give his assistance to support and to recover her. His youth, rendered almost tender by pity and self-reproach, was the most powerful means of recalling her to herself, and just as the swoon was passing away, the King himself entered the apartment.

CHAPTER XII.

THE POLITICIAN.

This is a lecture as skilled as policy.
That the disappointment to Henry's counting
He well might send a lesson to the devil,
And teach the old adage new temptations.—(G. B.)

As Louis entered the Gallery he bent his head in the manner we have formerly described as peculiar to him, and cast from under his gathered and gleaming eyebrows, a keen look on all around, a doing which, as Quentin afterwards declared, he eye seemed to turn so small, so fierce, and so piercing, as to resemble those of an avowed adder looking through the bush of heath in which he has coiled.

When, by this momentary and charged glance the King had reconnoitred the cause of the halt which was in the apartment, his first address was to the Duke of Orleans.

"You have, my fair cousin?" he said,—"and we ung to Quentin, added sternly, "Had you not sleep?"

"Forgive the young man, Sir," said the Duke, "he did not neglect his duty; but I was advised that the Princess was in the gallery."

"And I warrant you would not be without when you came hither to pay your court," said the King, whose detestable hypocrisy permitted in representing the Duke as participating in a passion which he felt only on the side of his unhappy daughter; "and it is thus you debase the customs of my court, my man!—but what cannot be pardoned to a gallant who only lives for amours?"

The Duke of Orleans raised his head, as if about to reply, in some manner which might correct the opinion conveyed in the King's observation; but the instinctive reverence, not to say fear, of Louis, as well as he had been bred from childhood, checked up his words.

"And Joan hath been ill," said the King, "and not be grieved, Louis, it will soon pass away, and let your arm to her apartment, while I will escort these strange ladies to theirs."

The order was given in a tone which amounted to a command, and Orleans accordingly in haste hurried off the Princess at one extremity of the gallery, while the King, ungloving his right hand, most respectfully handed the Countess Isabelle and her companion to the apartment, which opened from the gallery. He went profoundly as they entered, and remained standing on the threshold for a minute after they had disappeared, then, with great composure, as if he were which they had retired, and turning the key he took it from the lock, and put it into his girdle, as appendage which gave him still more perfect proof of some old custom which cannot surmise, unless he have with him the key of his treasury, but

With slow and pensive step, and eyes fixed to the ground, Louis now paced towards the great hall, who, expecting his share of the royal banquet, viewed his approach with no little anxiety.

"Thou hast done wrong," said the King, "thy eyes, and fixing them firmly on him who had come within a yard of him, "Thou hast done wrong, and deserved to die. Speak not a word of defiance!—What hinder thee to go with these Princesses?—what with any thing but thy own?"

"So please your Majesty," said the young man, "what could I do?"

"What couldst thou do when thy eyes were so fixed?" answered the King, sternly.

at weapon on thy shoulder? Thou beavest thy power, and if the presumption be not vain on the instant, he should in this very hall! Go—pass into these vaults. In the first thou wilt find a door, which leads to the inner Bailey, and Oliver Duns. Send him to me— to thy quarters.—As thou dost value the bloom of thy tongue as thou hast lack of thy hand."

I to escape so easily, yet with a soul at the cold-blooded cruelty which the Duke took from him in the execution of the deed took the road indicated, hastened in communicated the royal pleasure to the waiting at the court beneath. The word, signed, and sealed, as, with a far more ordinary, he wished the youth to go; and they parted, Quentin to his liver to attend the King.

The Memoirs which we have chiefly relying on this true history, were unhappily founded chiefly on information which, in his absence, took place between him and his secret counsellor. Fortunary of Houthou contains a manuscript unique Scandalous of Jean de Troyes, in which that which has been printed; to all several curious memoranda, which must have been written down by after the death of his master, and he is happened to be rewarded with the Duke had so long merited. From this we extract a very full account of the Duke's conversation with Louis upon this point, which throws a light upon the position, which we might otherwise have seen.

Young attendant entered the Gallery and the King pensively seated upon his daughter had left some symptoms signified with his temper, he glided on his step until he had just crossed the night, so as to make him aware of his shrank modestly backward and out of should be summoned to speak or to listen. up with concern that all is not well, and Oliver exclaimed the King, rising and hastily down the gallery,—"All is ill, manly as possible;—so much for thy food, that I, of all men, should become a wretched demented! I tell thee Burgundy on the eve of closing an alliance with Edward, who hath his hands idle at his thousands upon us through that of Calais. Surely, I might caple or untid, untid—and with the dunnery of that villain Saint Paul!—All of, who counselled me to receive the use the services of that damned Bismarck to their vessels."

and Oliver, "you know my reasons, I domineer between the frontiers of Flanders—her castle is almost unrighted over neighbouring estates are supported, cannot but give much opportunity, were the lady but wedded to be friendly to France."

interrupting him," said the King; "and concealed her being here, we might such a marriage for this rich baron, as gaily profited France.—But that counsel couldst thou recommend such a home-communion which required trust?"

"and Oliver, "to remember, it was I and who trusted him too far—could farther than I recommended. He would have borne a letter trustily enough to the Countess's husband, telling him to hold out her castle, and promising speedy relief; but your Highness must needs put his prophetic powers to the test; and thus he became possessed of secrets which were worth betraying to Duke Charles."

"I am ashamed, I am ashamed,"—said Louis. "And yet, Oliver, they say that these heathen people are descended from the sage Chaldeans, who did read the mysteries of the stars in the plains of Shinar."

Well aware that his master, with all his acuteness and sagacity, was but the more prone to be deceived by soothsayers, astrologers, diviners, and all that race of pretenders to occult science, and that he even conceived himself to have some skill in these arts, Oliver dared to press this point no farther; and only observed, that the Bohemian had been a bad prophet on his own account, else he would have avoided returning to Tours, and saved himself from the gallows he had merited.

"It often happens that those who are gifted with prophetic knowledge," answered Louis, with much gravity, "have not the power of foreseeing those events in which they themselves are personally interested."

"Under your Majesty's favour," replied the confident, "that seems as if a man could not see his own hand by means of the candle which he holds, and which shows him every other object in the apartment."

"He cannot see his own features by the light which shows the face of others," replied Louis; "and that is the more faithful illustration of the case.—But this is foreign to my purpose at present. The Bohemian hath had his reward, and peace be with him. But these ladies—Not only does Burgundy threaten us with war for harbouring them, but their presence is like to interfere with my projects in my own family. My ample cousin of Orleans hath barely seen this demented, and I venture to prophesy that the sight of her is like to make him less pliable in the matter of his alliance with Joan."

"Your Majesty," answered the counsellor, "may send the ladies of Croye back to Burgundy, and so make your peace with the Duke. Many might murmur at this as dishonourable; but if necessity demands the sacrifice!"

"If profit demanded the sacrifice, Oliver, the sacrifice should be made without hesitation," answered the King. "I am an old experienced sailor, and use not to gulp the angel's hook because it is buckled up with a feather called honour. But what is worse than a lack of honour there were, in returning those ladies to Burgundy a forfeiture of those views of advantage which moved us to give them an asylum. It were heart-breaking to renounce the opportunity of planting a friend to ourselves, and an enemy to Burgundy, in the very centre of his dominions, and as near to the discontented cities of Flanders. Oliver, I cannot relinquish the advantages which our scheme of marrying the maiden to a friend of our own house seems to hold out to us."

"Your Majesty," said Oliver, after a moment's thought, "might confer her hand on some right trusty friend, who would take all blame on himself, and serve your Majesty secretly, while in public you might disown him."

"And where am I to find such a friend?" said Louis. "Were I to bestow her upon any one of our mutinous and ill-ruled nobles, would it not be rendering him independent? and hath it not been my policy for years to prevent them from becoming so?—Dunon indeed—him, and him only, I might purchase trust.—He would fight for the crown of France whatever were his condition. But honour and wealth change men's natures.—Even Dunon I will not trust."

"Your Majesty may find others," said Oliver, in his smoothest manner, and in a tone more threatening than that which he usually employed in conversing with the King, who permitted him considerable freedom; more dependent entirely on your own grace and favour, and who could do more mischief without

...dare not wed this beauty to one of my subjects—I dare not return her to Burgundy—I dare not transmit her to England, or to Germany, where she is likely to become the prize of some one more apt to unite with Burgundy than with France, and who would be more ready to discourage the honest malecontents in Ghent and Liege, than to yield them that wholesome countenance which might always find Charles the Hardy enough to exercise his valour on, without stirring from his own domains—and they were in so ripe a humour for insurrection, the men of Liege in especial, that they alone, well heated and supported, would find my fair cousin work for more than a twelvemonth;—and backed by a warlike Count of Croye.—O, Oliver! the plan is too hopeful to be resigned without a struggle. Cannot thy fertile brain devise some scheme?"

Oliver paused for a long time—then at last replied. "What if a bridal could be accomplished betwixt Isabelle of Croye, and young Adolphus, the Duke of Gueldres?"

"What!" said the King, in astonishment; "sacrifice her, and she, too, so lovely a creature, to the furious wretch who deposed, imprisoned, and has often threatened to murder, his own father!—No, Oliver, no—that were too unutterably cruel even for you and me, who look so steadfastly to our excellent end, the peace and the welfare of France, and respect so little the means by which it is attained. Besides, he lies distant from us, and is detested by the people of Ghent and Liege.—No, no—I will none of Adolphus of Gueldres—think on some one else."

"My invention is exhausted, Sire," said the counsellor; "I can remember no one who, as husband to the Countess of Croye, would be likely to answer your Majesty's views. He must unite such various qualities—a friend to your Majesty—an enemy to Burgundy—of policy enough to conciliate the Gauntions and Liegeois, and of valour sufficient to defend his little dominions against the power of Duke Charles—Of noble birth besides—that your Highness insists upon; and of excellent and most virtuous character, to the boot of all."

"Nay, Oliver," said the King, "I leaned not so much—that is, so very much, on character; but methinks Isabelle's bridegroom should be something less publicly and generally abhorred than Adolphus of Gueldres. For example, since I myself must suggest some one—why not William de la Marck?"

"May I ask to whom your Majesty commits such an important charge?" asked the tonsor.

"To a stranger, to be sure," replied the King, "one who has neither kin nor interest in France, to interfere with the execution of my pleasure; and who knows too little of the country, and its factions, to suspect more of my purpose than I choose to tell him—in a word, I design to employ the young Scot who met you hither but now."

Oliver paused in a manner which seemed to imply a doubt of the prudence of the choice, and then added, "Your Majesty has reposed confidence in that stranger boy earlier than in your wont."

"I have my reasons," answered the King.—"Thou knowest" (and he crossed himself) "my devotion to the blessed Saint Julian. I had been saying my prayers so that holy Saint late in the night before last, wherein (as he is known to be the guardian of travellers) I made it my humble petition that he would augment my household with such wandering pilgrims, as might best establish throughout our kingdom animated devotion to our will; and I vowed to the good Saint in guardon, that I would, in his name, receive, and relieve, and maintain them."

"And did Saint Julian," said Oliver, "send your Majesty this long-legged importation from Scotland in answer to your prayers?"

Although the barber, who well knew that his master had superstition in a large proportion to his want of religion, and that on such topics nothing was more easy than to offend him—although, I say, he knew the royal weakness, and therefore carefully put the preceding question in the softest and most simple tone of voice, Louis felt the mausado which it contained, and regarded the speaker with high displeasure.

"Sirrah," he said, "thou art well called Oliver the devil, who darrest thus to sport at once with thy master and with the blessed Saints. I tell thee, wert thou one grain less necessary to me, I would have thee hung up on yonder oak before the Castle, as an example to all who scoff at things holy!—Know, thou infidel slave, that mine eyes were no sooner closed, than the blessed Saint Julian was visible to me, leading a young man, whom he presented to me, saying that his fortune should be to escape the sword, the cord, the river, and to bring good fortune to the side which he should espouse, and to the adventures in which he should be engaged! I walked out on the succeeding morning, and I met with this youth, whose image I had seen in my dreams. In his own country he hath escaped the sword, and the massacre of his whole family, and here, within the brief compass of two days, he hath been strangely rescued from drowning and from the gallows, and hath already, on a particular occasion, as I but lately hinted to thee, been of the most material service to me. I receive him as sent hither by Saint Julian, to serve me in the most difficult, the most dangerous, and even the most desperate services."

The King, as he thus expressed himself, doffed his hat, and selecting from the numerous little leaden figures with which the hat band was garnished that which represented Saint Julian, he placed it on the table, as was often his wont when some peculiar kind of hope, or perhaps of remorse, happened to thrill across his mind, and, kneeling down before it, entered with an appearance of profound devotion, "Sainte Julian, adieu precibus nostris! Ora, ora, pro nobis!"

It was one of thoseague-fits of superstitious devotion which often seized on Louis in such extraordinary times and places, that they gave one of the most ridiculous Monarchs who ever reigned, the appearance of a madman, or at least of one whose mind was shaken by some deep consciousness of guilt.

When he was thus employed, his favourite looked at him with an expression of sarcastic contempt, which he scarce attempted to disguise. Indeed it was one of this man's peculiarities, that, in his whole intercourse with his master, he had aside that fond and putting affectation of officiousness and humility, which distinguished his conduct to others; and if he animal is on its guard,—watchful, animated, and alert for sudden exertion. The cause of this change was probably Oliver's consciousness, that his master was himself too profound a hypocrite not to see through the hypocrisy of others.

"The features of this youth, then, if I may presume to speak," said Oliver, "resemble those of him whom your dream exhibited?"

"Close, and inimately," said the King, whose imagination, like that of superstitious people in general, readily imposed upon itself. "I have had his horoscope cast, besides, by Gileott Martville, and I have plainly learned, through his art and mine own observation, that, in many respects, this unfriended youth has his destiny under the same constellation with mine."

Whatever Oliver might think of the causes thus boldly assigned for the preference of an inexperienced stripling, he dared make no farther objections, well knowing that Louis, who, while residing in exile, had bestowed much of his attention on the supposed science of judicial astrology, would listen to no railery of any kind which impeached his skill. He therefore only replied, that he trusted the youth would prove faithful in the discharge of a task so delicate.

"We will take care he hath no opportunity to be otherwise," said Louis; "for he shall be privy to nothing, save that he is sent to escort the ladies of Croys to the residence of the Bishop of Liege. Of the probable interference of William de la March, he shall know as little as they themselves. None shall know that secret but the guide; and Tristan or thou must find one fit for our purpose."

"But in that case," said Oliver, "judging of him from his country and his appearance, the young man is like to stand to his arms so soon as the Wild Bear comes on them, and may not come off so easily from the rucks as he did this morning."

"If they rend his heart-strings," said Louis, composedly, "Saint Julian, blessed be his name! can send me another in his stead. It skills as little that the messenger is slain after his duty is executed, as that the flask is broken when the wine is drunk out.—Meanwhile, we must expedite the ladies' departure, and then persuade the Count de Crèveceur that it has taken place without our connivance; we having been desirous to restore them to the custody of our fair cousin, which their sudden departure has unhappily prevented."

"The Count is perhaps too wise, and his master too prejudiced, to believe it."

"Holy Mother!" said Louis, "what unbelief would that be in Christian men! But, Oliver, they shall believe us. We will throw into our whole conduct towards our fair cousin, Duke Charles, such thorough and unlimited confidence, that, not to believe we have been sincere with him in every respect, he must be worse than an infidel. I tell thee, so convinced am I that I could make Charles of Burgundy think of me in every respect as I would have him, that, were it necessary for silencing his doubts, I would ride unarmed, and on a palfrey, to visit him in his tent, with no better guard about me than thine own simple person, friend Oliver."

"And I," said Oliver, "though I prize not myself upon managing steel in any other shape than that of a razor, would rather charge a Swiss battalion of pikes, than I would accompany your Highness upon such a visit of friendship to Charles of Burgundy, when he hath so many grounds to be well assured that there is enmity in your Majesty's bosom against him."

"Thou art a fool, Oliver," said the King, "with all thy pretensions to wisdom—and art not aware that deep policy must often assume the appearance of the most extreme simplicity, as courage occasionally shroods itself under the show of modest timidity. Were it needful, full surely would I do what I have said—the Saints always blessing our purpose, and the heavenly constellations bringing round, in their course, a proper conjuncture for such an exploit."

In these words did King Louis XI. give the first hint of the extraordinary resolution which he after-words adopted, in order to dupo his great rival, the subsequent execution of which had very nearly proved his own ruin.

He parted with his counsellor, and presently afterwards went to the apartment of the ladies of Croys. Few persuasions beyond his mere license would have been necessary to determine their retreat from the Court of France, upon the first hint that they might not be eventually protected against the Duke of Burgundy, but it was not so easy to induce them to choose Lyons for the place of their retreat. They entrusted and expected to be transferred to Bretagne or Calais, where, under protection of the Duke of Bretagne, or King of England, they might remain in a state of safety, until the Sovereign of Burgundy should relent in his rigorous purpose towards them. But neither of these places of safety at all suited the plans of Louis, and he was at last compelled in inducing them to adopt that which did coincide with them.

The power of the Bishop of Lyons for their defence was not to be questioned, since his ecclesiastical dignity gave him the means of protecting the fugitives against all Christiana powers, while, on the other hand, his secular forces, if not numerous, seemed at least sufficient to defend his person, and all under his protection, from any sudden violence. The difficulty was to reach the little Court of the Bishop in safety, but for this Louis promised to provide, by spreading a report that the Ladies of Croys had escaped from Tours by night, under fear of being delivered up to the Burgundian envoy, and had taken their flight towards Bretagne. He also promised them the attendance of a small, but faithful retinue, and letters to the commanders of such towns and fortresses as they might pass, with instructions to use every means for protecting and assisting them in their journey.

The ladies of Croys, although internally resenting the ungenerous and discourteous manner in which Louis thus deprived them of the promised asylum in his Court, were so far from objecting to the hasty departure which he proposed, that they even anticipated his project, by entreating to be permitted to set forward that same night. The Lady Hermine was already tired of a place where there were neither admiring courtiers, nor flatterers to be witnessed, and the Lady Isabelle thought she had seen enough to conclude, that were the temptation to become a little stranger Louis XI., not satisfied with expelling them from his Court, would not hesitate to deliver her up to her irritated Suzerain, the Duke of Burgundy. Lastly, Louis himself readily acquiesced in their hasty departure, anxious to preserve peace with Duke Charles, and alarmed lest the beauty of Isabelle should interfere with and impede the favourite plan which he had formed, for bestowing the hand of his daughter Joan upon his cousin of Orleans.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE JOURNEY.

Tell me of Kings—I own the poor complaint;
I am a king, and can command the chance—
At least this I am, and on that thought
I have embraced my fate—Alas! alas!

Occupation and adventure might be said to crowd upon the young Scotchman with the force of a spring tide, for he was speedily summoned to the apartment of his Captain, the Lord Crawford, where, to his astonishment, he again beheld the King. After a few words respecting the honour and trust which were about to be reposed in him, which made Quentin internally afraid that they were again about to propose to him such a watch as he had kept upon the Count of Crèvecœur, or perhaps some duty still more repugnant to his feelings, he was not relieved merely, but delighted, with hearing that he was appointed, with the assistance of four others under his command, one of whom was a guide, to escort the Ladies of Croys to the little Court of their relative, the Bishop of Lyons, in the calm and most commodious, and, at the same time, in the most secret manner possible. A scroll was given him, in which were set down directions for his guidance, for the places of halt, (generally chosen in obscure villages, solitary monasteries, and situations remote from towns,) and for the general precautions which he was to attend to, especially on approaching the frontier of Burgundy. He was sufficiently supplied with instructions what he ought to say and do to sustain the personage of the Maître d'Hotel of two English ladies of rank, who had been on a pilgrimage to Saint Martin of Tours, and were about to visit the holy city of Cologne, and worship the relics of the sign Eastern Monarch, who came to adore the nativity of Bethlehem; for under that character the ladies of Croys were to journey.

Without having any defined notions of the cause of his delight, Quentin Durward's heart leapt for joy at the idea of approaching thus nearly to the person of the Beauty of the Tower, and in a situation which entitled him to her confidence, since her protection was in so great a degree intrusted to his conduct and courage. He felt no doubt in his own mind, that he should be her successful guide through the hazards of her pilgrimage. Youth seldom thinks of dangers, and heed up fire, and brimstone, and self-confiding, Quentin, in particular, only thought of them to defy them. He longed to be exempted from the restraint of the royal presence, that he might indulge in secret glances with which such unexpected tidings had him, and which prompted him to bursts of delight which would have been totally unfitting for that society.

But Louis had not yet done with him. That capacious Monarch had to consult a counsellor of a different stamp from Oliver le Diable, and who was supposed to derive his skill from the superior and aerial intelligences, so men, judging from their looks, were apt to think the counsellor of Oliver sprung from the Devil himself.

Louis therefore led the way, followed by the important Quentin, to a separate tower of the Castle of Plaisance, in which was installed, in no small state and splendour, the celebrated astrologer, poet, and philosopher Galesote Maru, or Martin, or Martivale, a native of Norm, in Italy, the author of the famous Treatise De l'Esprit Humain,* and the subject of his age's admiration, and of the panegyrics of Philip Jovin. He had long flourished at the Court of the celebrated Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary, from whom he was in some measure decamped by Louis, who grudged the Hungarian Monarch the society and the counsels of a sage, accounted so skilful in reading the decrees of Heaven.

Martivale was none of those ascetic, withdrawn, pale professors of mystic learning of those days, who basted their eyes over the midnight furnace, and increased their bodies by outwatching the polar bear. He indulged in all earthly pleasures, and, until he grew corpulent, had excelled in all martial sports and gymnastic exercises, as well as in the use of arms, so much, that Janus Pannonius has left a Latin epigram, upon a wrestling match between Galesote and a renowned champion of that art, in the presence of the Hungarian King and Court, in which the Astrologer was completely victorious.

The apartments of this courtly and martial old man were sumptuously furnished, and his study Quentin had yet seen in the royal palace, and its carving and ornamented wood work of his time, as well as the magnificence displayed in the sumptuous showed the magnificent taste of the western France. One of his study was done up to his sleeping apartment, another led to the turret which served as his observatory. A large oak-table in the middle of the chamber was covered with a red Turkish carpet, the spoils of the tent of a Prince after the great battle of Jaxa, where the Astrologer had fought ahead with the valiant champion of the Christians, Mahomet of Vienna. The table was a variety of mathematical and astronomical instruments, and the most richly carved and curious workmanship. The armchair of silver was the gift of the Emperor of Germany, and his Jacob's staff of ebony, jointed with gold, and of "al brother," replied Martville, "this be likened to a young tree, which is nted, but shall, in succeeding generations, bear fruit as fatal, yet as precious, as that of the Garden of Eden; the knowledge, namely, of good and evil."

Louis answered, after a moment's pause, "Let futurity look to what concerns them—we are men of this age, and to this age we will confine our care.—
Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.—Tell me, hast thou proceeded farther in the horoscope which I sent to thee and of which you made me some report?
I have brought the party hither, that you may use palmistry or chiromancy, if such is your pleasure. The matter is pressing."

The bulky sage arose from his seat, and approaching the young soldier, fixed on him his keen large dark eyes, as if he were in the act of internally spelling and dissecting every lineament and feature.—Blushing and borne down by this close examination on the part of one whose expression was so reverent at once and commanding, Quentin bent his eyes on the ground, and did not again raise them, till in the act of obeying the sonorous command of the Astrologer, "Look up and be not afraid, but hold forth thy hand."

When Martville had inspected his palm, according to the form of the mystic arts which he practised, he led the King some steps aside—"My royal brother," he said, "the physiognomy of this youth, together with the lines impressed on his hand, confirm, in a wonderful degree, the report which I founded on his horoscope, as well as that judgment which your own proficiency in our sublime arts induced you at once to form of him. All promises that this youth will be brave and fortunate."

"And faithful?" said the King; "for valour and fortune square not with fidelity."

"And faithful also," said the Astrologer; "for there is manly firmness in look and eye, and his linearite is deeply marked and clear, which indicates a true and upright adherence to those who do benefit or lodge trust in him. But yet—"

"But what?" said the King; "Father Galeotti, wherefore do you now pause?"

"The care of Kings," said the Sage, "are like the palates of those dainty patients, which are unable to endure the bitterness of the drugs necessary for their recovery."

"My ears and my palate have no such niceness," said Louis; "let me hear what is useful counsel, and swallow what is wholesome medicine. I quarrel not with the rudeness of the one, or the harsh taste of the other. I have not been cockered in wantonness or indulgence; my youth was one of exile and suffering.
My ears are used to harsh counsel, and take no offence at it."

"Then plainly, Sirs," replied Galeotti, "if you have aught in your purposed commission, which—which, in short, may startle a scrupulous conscience—intrust it not to this youth—at least not till a few years' exercise in your service has made him as unscrupulous as others."

"And is this what you hesitated to speak, my good Galeotti? and dost thou think thy speaking it would offend me?" said the King. "Alack, I know that thou art well sensible, that the path of royal policy cannot be always squared 'as that of private life ought invariably to be) by the abstract maxims of religion and of morality. Wherefore do we, the Princes of the earth, found churches and monasteries, make pilgrimages, undergo penance, and perform devotions, with which others may dispense, unless it be because the benefit of the public, and the welfare of our kingdoms, force us upon measures which grieve our conscience as Christians? But Heaven has mercy—the Church, an unbounded stock of merits, and the intercession of our Lady of Embrun, and the blessed saints, is urgent, everlasting, and omnipotent."—He laid his hat on the table, and devoutly kneeling before the images stuck into the hat band, repeated, in an earnest tone, "Sancte Huberte, Sancte Juliana, Sancte Martine, Sancte Rosalia, Sancti quicunque adestis, orate pro me peccatore!" He then smote his breast, arose, re-assumed his hat, and continued;—
"Be assured, good father, that whatever there may be in our commission, of the nature at which you have hinted, the execution shall not be intrusted to this youth, nor shall he be privy to such part of our purpose."

"In this," said the Astrologer, "you, my royal brother, will walk wisely.—Something may be apprehended likewise from the rashness of this your young commissioner; a failing inherent in those of sanguine complexion. But I hold that, by the rules of art, this chance is not to be weighed against the other properties discovered from his horoscope and otherwise."

"Will this next midnight be a propitious hour in which to commence a perilous journey?" said the King.—"See, here is your Ephemerides—you see the position of the moon in regard to Saturn, and the ascendance of Jupiter—That should argue, methinks, in submission to your better art, success to him who sends forth the expedition at such an hour."

"To him who sends forth the expedition," said the Astrologer, after a pause, "this conjunction doth indeed promise success; but, methinks, that Saturn being combust, threatens danger and infortune to the party sent; whence I infer that the errand may be perilous, or even fatal, to those who are to journey. Violence and captivity, methinks, are intimated in that adverse conjunction."

"Violence and captivity to those who are sent," answered the King, "but success to the wishes of the sender—Runs it not thus, my learned father?"

"Even so," replied the Astrologer.

The King paused, without giving any farther indication how far this presaging speech (probably hazarded by the Astrologer from his conjecture that the commission related to some dangerous purpose) squared with his real object, which, as the reader is aware, was to betray the Countess Isabelle of Croye into the hands of William de la Marck, a nobleman indeed of high birth, but degraded by his crimes into a leader of banditti, distinguished for his turbulent disposition and ferocious bravery.

The King then pulled forth a paper from his pocket, and, ere he gave it to Martivalle, said, in a tone which resembled that of an apology—"Learned Galeotti, be not surprised, that, possessing in you an oracular treasure, superior to that lodged in the breast of any now alive, not excepting the great Nostradamus himself, I am desirous frequently to avail myself of your skill in those doubts and difficulties which beset every Prince who hath to contend with rebellion within his land, and with external enemies, both powerful and inveterate."

"When I was honoured with your request, Sire," said the philosopher, "and abandoned the Court of Buda for that of Plessis, it was with the resolution to place at the command of my royal patron whatever my art had, that might be of service to him."

"Enough, good Martivalle—I pray thee attend to the import of this question."—He proceeded to read from the paper in his hand:—"A person, having on hand a weighty controversy, which is like to draw to debate either by law or by force of arms, is desirous, for the present, to seek accommodation by a personal interview with his antagonist. He desires to know what day will be propitious for the execution of such a purpose; also what is likely to be the success of such a negotiation, and whether his adversary will be moved to answer the confidence thus reposed in him, with gratitude and kindness, or may rather be likely to abuse the opportunity and advantage which such meeting may afford him?"

"It is an important question," said Martivalle, when the King had done reading, "and requires that I should set a planetary figure, and give it instant and deep consideration."

"Let it be so, my good father in the sciences, and thou shalt know what it is to oblige a King of France. We are determined, if the constellations forbid not,—and our own humble art leads us to think that they approve our purpose, to hazard something, even in our own person, to stop these anti-Christian wars."

"May the Saints forward your Majesty's pious intent," said the Astrologer, "and guard your sacred person!"

"Thanks, learned father.—Here is something, the while, to enlarge your curious library."

He placed under one of the volumes a sun of gold; for, economical even in his sup- Louis conceived the astrologer sufficiently his service by the pensions he had assigned thought himself entitled to the use of his moderate rate, even upon great exigencies.

Louis, having thus, in legal phrase, ad- freshing fee to his general retainer, turned to address Durward.—"Follow me," he a bonny Scot, as one chosen by Destiny at narch to accomplish a bold adventure. Al got ready, that thou mayst put foot in stirru instant the bell of Saint Martin's tolls twel minute sooner, one minute later, were to favourable aspect of the constellations wh on your adventure."

Thus saying, the King left the apartment by his young guardsman: and no sooner gone, than the Astrologer gave way to very feelings than those which seemed to an during the royal presence.

"The niggardly slave!" he said, weighing in his hand,—for, being a man of unbounded he had almost constant occasion for mone base sordid scullion!—A coxswain's wife w more to know that her husband had cr narrow seas in safety. He acquire any ti humane letters!—yes, when prowling foxe ling wolves become musicians. He read th blazoning of the firmament!—ay, when sor shall become lynxes.—Post tot promissa—many promises made, to entice me from th the magnificent Matthias, where Hun a Christian and Infidel, the Czar of Muscovi Cham of Tartary themselves, contended u with gifts,—doth he think I am to abid old Castle, like a bulfinch in a cage, fain to as he chooses to whistle, and all for seed an —Not so—aut inveniam viam, aut faciam discover or contrive a remedy. The Cardin is politic and liberal—this query shall to hi shall be his Eminence's own fault if the st not as he would have them."

He again took the despised guerdon, and it in his hand. "It may be," he said, "the jewel, or pearl of price, concealed in this pal I have heard he can be liberal even to is when it suits his caprice or interest."

He emptied the purse, which containe more nor less than ten gold pieces. The in of the Astrologer was extreme.—"Thinks b such paltry rate of hire I will practise that science which I have studied with the Armu bot of Istrahoff, who had not seen the sun years,—with the Greek Dubravius, who is sa raised the dead,—and have even visited th Ebn Hali in his cave in the deserts of Theba by Heaven!—he that contemns art sha through his own ignorance. Ten pieces!—a which I am half ashamed to offer to Toinet her new breast-laces."

So saying, the indignant Sage neverthele ged the contemned pieces of gold into a lar which he wore at his girdle, which Toin other abettors of lavish expense, generally c to empty fully faster than the philosopher, his art, could find the means of filling.*

THE JOURNEY.

I see thee yet, fair France—thou favour'd land
Of art and nature—thou art still before me;
Thy sons, to whom their labour is a sport,
So well thy grateful soil returns its tribute;
Thy sun-burnt daughters, with their laughing e

Thou hast had many a tale of woe to tell,
In ancient times as now.—Anonymous.

Avoiding all conversation with any one, (was his charge,) Quentin Durward proceed- ly to array himself in a strong but plain

* Martius Galeotti was a native of Narni, in Umbria, secretary to Matthias Corvinius, King of Hungary, and his thigh and arm-pieces, and placed on his head a good steel cap without any visor. To these was added a handsome casque of shagreen leather, finely lined, and laced down the seams with some embroidery, such as might become a superior officer in a noble household.

These were brought to his apartment by Oliver, who, with his quiet, unassuming smile and manner, acquainted him that his uncle had been summoned to mount guard, purposely that he might make no excuses concerning these mysterious movements.

"Your excuse will be made to your kinsman," said Oliver, smiling again, "and, my dearest son, when you return safe from the execution of this pleasing trust, I doubt not you will be found worthy of our promises as well as disposed with your account of your motions to any one, while it will place us at the head of those who must render an account of them to you."

So spoke Oliver to Diabolus, calculating, probably, in his own mind, the great chance there was that the new youth, whose hand he squeezed affectionately as he spoke, must necessarily encounter death or captivity in the commission intrusted to him. He added to his few words a small purse of gold, to defray necessary expenses on the road, as a gratuity to the King's part.

At a few minutes before twelve at midnight, Quentin, according to his directions, proceeded to the second court-yard, and passed under the Dauphin's Tower, which, as the reader knows, was assigned for the temporary residence of the Countess of Croye. He found, at this place of rendezvous, the men and horses appointed to compose the retinue, leading two mule-trains already loaded with baggage, and holding three palfreys for the two Countesses and a faithful serving-woman, with a stately war-horse for himself, whose steel-plated saddle gleamed in the pale moonlight. Not a word of recognition was spoken on either side. The men sat still in their saddles, as if they were motionless; and by the same imperfect light Quentin saw with pleasure that they were all armed, and held long lances in their hands. They were only three in number, but one of them whispered to Quentin, in a strong Gascon accent, that their duty was to join them beyond Tours.

Montaigne lights glanced to and fro at the lattices of the tower, as if there was bustle and preparation among its inhabitants. At length a small door, which led from the bottom of the tower to the court, was unlocked, and three females came forth, attended by a man wrapped in a cloak. They mounted behind the palfreys which stood prepared for them, while their attendant on foot led the way, and gave to pass-words and signals to the watchful guards. Soon after they passed in succession. Thus they at length reached the exterior of these formidable towers. Here the man on foot, who had hitherto acted as their guide, paused, and spoke low and privately to the two foremost females.

"May Heaven bless you, Sir," said a voice which thrilled up Quentin Durward's ear, "and forgive you, on your purposes be more interested than your guide expects! To be placed in safety under the protection of the good Bishop of Langs, is the utmost wish of my desire."

The person whom she thus addressed, muttered a scarcely audible answer, and retreated back through the tower gate, while Quentin thought, that, by the open-slimp, he recognized in him the King himself, whose anxiety for the departure of his guests had probably induced him to give his presence, in the irregular should arise on their part, or difficulties on that of the guards of the Castle.

When the riders were beyond the Castle, it was necessary for some time to ride with great precaution, in order to avoid the pitfalls, snares, and similar contrivances, which were placed for the annoyance of strangers. The Gascon was, however, completely possessed of the clue to this labyrinth, and in a quarter of an hour's riding, they found themselves beyond the limits of Pirene la Parc, and not far distant from the city of Tours.

The moon, which had now extricated herself from the clouds through which she was formerly wading, shed a full orb of glorious light upon a landscape equally glorious. They saw the princely Loire rolling his majestic tide through the richest plain in France, and sweeping along between banks ornamented with towers and terraces, and with olives and vineyards. They saw the walls of the city of Tours, the ancient capital of Touraine, raising their portal towers and embellishments while in the moonlight, while, from within their circle, rose the immense Gothic mass which the devotion of the sainted Bishop Perpetuus erected as early as the fifth century, and which the zeal of Charlemagne and his successors had enlarged with such architectural splendours, as rendered it the most magnificent church in France. The towers of the church of Saint Gatien were also visible, and the gloomy strength of the Castle, which was said to have been, in ancient times, the residence of the Emperor Valentinian.

Even the circumstances in which he was placed, though of a nature so engrossing, did not prevent the wonder and delight with which the young Scotchman, accustomed to the waste though impressive lands of his own mountains and the poverty even of a country almost state, seemed to look on a scene which art and nature seemed to have vied in adorning with their richest of adornment. But he was recalled to the business of the moment by the voice of the elder lady, pitched at least an octave higher than those soft tones which had addressed to King Louis, and demanding to speak with the leader of the band. Spurring his horse forward, Quentin respectfully presented himself in the ladies in that capacity, and then underwent the interrogations of the Lady Hameline.

"What was his name, and what his degree?"

He told both.

"Was he perfectly acquainted with the road?"

"He could not," he replied, "pretend to much knowledge of the route, but he was furnished with full instructions, and he was, at their first resting-place, to be provided with a guide, in all respects competent to the task of directing their further journey: meanwhile, a horseman who had just joined them, and made the number of their guard four, was to be their guide for the first stage."

"And wherefore were you selected for such a duty, young gentleman?" said the lady—"I am told you are the same youth who was lately upon guard in the gallery in which we met the Princess of France. You seem young and inexperienced for such a charge—a stranger, too, in France, and speaking the language as a foreigner."

"I am bound to obey the commands of the King, madam, but am not qualified to reason on them," answered the young soldier.

"Are you of noble birth?" demanded the same question.

"I may safely affirm so, madam," replied Quentin.

"And are you not," said the younger lady, addressing him in her turn, but with a humorous accent, "the same whom I saw when I was called to wait upon the King at Yverdon?"

Lowering his voice, perhaps from a sudden feeling of humility, Quentin answered in the affirmative.

"Then, methinks, my cousin," said the Lady Isabelle, addressing the Lady Hameline, "we must be safe under this young gentleman's safeguard, he looks not, at least, like one to whom the execution of a plan of treacherous cruelty upon two helpless women could be with safety intrusted."

"On my honour, madam," said Durward, "by the name of my House, by the bones of my ancestry, I could not, for France and Scotland laid into one, be guilty of treachery or cruelty towards you!"

"You speak well, young man," said the Lady Ha-

Mr. John Corbion. While at his court he composed a novel, Le jeune duc de Saint-Remy, which he left unfinished in 1577 and was made prisoner at Tours on a charge of having propagated heterodox opinions in a treatise entitled, Le bon duc de Saint-Remy. He was obliged to resign his office of chamberlain, and might have suffered seriously but for the protection of Francis IV. Then Francis, who had long been a prisoner, was sent to France, attached himself to Louis XII., and died in his service.

malice; "but we are accustomed to hear fair speeches from the King of France and his agents. It was by them that we were induced, when the protection of the Bishop of Lugo might have been obtained with less risk than now, or when we might have thrown ourselves on that of Wenceslaus of Germany, or of Edward of England, to seek refuge in France. And in what did the promise of the King result? In an obscure and shameful concealment of us, under pilgrim names, as a sort of prohibited ware, in yonder gentry hostility, when we,—who, as thou knowest, Marthon," (addressing her domestic,) "never put on our head two eaves under a canopy, and upon a day of three degrees,—were compelled to attire ourselves, standing on the ample floor, as if we had been two milkmaids."

Marthon admitted that her lady spoke a most melancholy truth.

"I would that had been the worst evil, dear kinswomen," said the Lady Isabella; "I could gladly have dispensed with state."

"But not with society," said the elder Countess; "that, my sweet cousin, was impossible."

"I would have dispensed with all, my dearest kinswoman," answered Isabella, in a voice which penetrated to the very heart of her young conductor and guard, "with all, for a safe and honourable retirement. I wish not—God knows, I never wished—to occasion war betwixt France and my native Burgundy, or that lives should be lost for such as I am. I only implored permission to retire to the Convent of Marmoutier, or to any other holy sanctuary."

"You spoke then like a girl, my cousin," answered the elder lady; "and not like a daughter of my noble brother. It is well there is still one alive, who hath some of the spirit of the noble house of Croye. How should a high born lady be hewn from a man's breast, and have that which wears are broken for the one, and own hazel pines shattered for the other? I tell you, maiden, the while I was in the very earliest bloom, scarcely older than yourself, the famous Passage of Arins at Hastingham was held in my honour, the champions were fair, he sought so many as twelve. It lasted three days, and cost the lives of two adventurous knights, the fracture of one back bone, one collar bone, three legs and two arms, besides flesh-wounds and bruises beyond the heralds' counting; and thus have the ladies of our house ever been honoured. Ah! had you but half the heart of your noble ancestry, you would find means at some Court, where ladies' love and fame in arms are still prized, to maintain a tournament, at which your hand should be the prize, as was that of your great grandmother of blessed memory, at the spear-running of Strasbourg; and thus should you gain the best lance in Europe, to maintain the rights of the House of Croye, both against the oppression of Burgundy and the policy of France."

"But, fair kinswoman," answered the younger Countess, "I have been told by my old nurse, that although the Rhinogrove was the best lance at the great tournament at Strasbourg, and so won the hand of my respected ancestor, yet the match was no happy one, as he used often to scold, and sometimes even to beat, my great-grandmother of blessed memory."

"And wherefore not," said the elder Countess, in her romantic enthusiasm for the profession of chivalry; "why should those victorious arms, accustomed to deal blows when abroad, be bound to restrain their energies at home? A thousand times rather would I be beaten twice a day, by a husband whose arm was so much feared by others as by me, than be the wife of a coward, who dared neither to lift hand to his wife, nor to say one rim!"

"I should wish you joy of such an active mate, fair aunt," replied Isabella, "without envying you; for if broken bones be lovely in tourneys, there is nothing less amiable in ladies' bowers."

"Nay, but the beating is no necessary consequence of warring with a knight of fame in arms," said the Lady Hameline; "though it is true that our ancestor of blessed memory, the Rhinogrove Gottfried, was something rough-tempered, and addicted to the use of Rhinowum.—The very perfect among ladies, and a lion among the Thibaults of Montgrou. God be with kindest soul alive and not only so courteous as to lay hand against his good dame, he who beat all enemies found a fair foe who could belabour! 'twas his own fault—he was one of the Passage of Hastingham and so said, that, if had it pleased Heaven father, there might have been a lady had used his gentle nature more so."

The Countess Isabella, who had dreaded the Passage of Hastingham upon which her aunt was at all suffered the conversation to drop; the natural politeness of one who nurtured, dreading lest his presence should on their conversation, rule guide, as if to ask him some question their route.

Meanwhile, the ladies continued silence, or in such conversation as it was, until day began to break; and then on horseback for several hours lest they should be fatigued, he knew their distance from the coast.

"I will show it you," answered an hour.

"And then you leave us to other times, Quentin."

"Even so, Seigneur Archer," say journeys are always short and str and others, Seigneur Archer go by go by the cord."

The moon had by this time less the light of dawn were beginning and strong in the east, and to gleam a small lake, on the verge of which riding for a short space of time. I mist of a wide plain, scattered over groves, and thickets; but which was open, so that objects began to be distinct accuracy. Quentin cast his whom he rode beside, and, under slouched overspreading hat, who sombrero of a Spanish peasant, he curious features of the same Pettigrew, not long since, had, in some hapless brother Trus Forbille gently active about his throat. In not altogether untrained with sea country the executioner is regarded perstious horror,) which has late not diminished, Durward instant horse's head to the right, and pressure with the spur, made a demureted him eight feet from his hateful

"Ho, ho, ho," exclaimed Pet Lady of the Grave, our young son of old.—What? comrade, you braver—every one wins his head in this need be ashamed of having come I for I will do my work with all the weight to a dead tree.—And God be so he such a merry fellow withal could tell you such jests I have on foot of the ladder and the top of th my haladome. I have been obliged hastily for fear the fellows should and so shame my mystery!"

As he thus spoke, he edged his regain the interval which the men them, saying at the same time, "C cher, let there be no unkindness but part, I always do my duty without light heart, and I never love a man I have put my ardent of wind collar dah him Knight of the Order of St. the Provost's Chaplain, the worth dible, is went to call the Patron rostry."

approach him close, "or I shall be tempted to teach you the difference that should be betwixt men of honour and such an outcast."

"Lay you then, how hot you are!" said the fellow; "had you said men of honesty, there had been some colour of truth in it;—but for men of honour, good I have to deal with them every day, as nearly as closely as I was about to do business with you. The peace be with you, and keep your company to yourself. I would have bestowed a flagon of Auvergne upon you to wash away every unkindness—but as you list—I never quarrel with my customers—my merry come-tumbles, my merry dancers, my little fellows, as Jacques Butcher says to his lambs—doe, in fine, who, like your seigniorship, have the M. L. written on their foreheads—No, no, let them be true as they list, they shall have my good service at last—and yourself shall see, when you get come under Petit-André's hands, that he knows how to forgive an injury."

So saying, and summing up the whole with a proverbial wink, and such an interjectional schick as quen quicken a dull horse with, Petit-André drew off to the other side of the path, and left the youth to digest the taunts he had treated him with as his good Scottish stomach best might. A strong desire had Quentin to have belaboured him while the staff of his lance could hold together; but he put a restraint on his passion, recollecting that a brawl with such a character could be creditable at no time or place, and that a quarrel of any kind, on the present occasion, would be a breach of duty, and might involve the most perilous consequences. He therefore swallowed his wrath at the ill-timed and professional jest of Mons. Petit-André, and contented himself with devoutly hoping that they had not reached the end of his fair charge, on which they could not be supposed to make an impression in favour of himself, as one obnoxious to such sarcasms. But he was specially aroused from such thoughts by the cry of both the ladies at once, "Look back, look back!—for the love of Heaven look to yourself, and us—we are pursued!"

Quentin hastily looked back, and saw that two men were in fact following them, and riding of such a pace as must soon bring them up with their party. "Listen," he said, "be only some of the Provencal making their rounds in the Forest. Do thou look, he said to Petit-André, "and see what they may be."

Petit-André obeyed; and rolling himself jocosely in the saddle after he had made his observations, replied, "Three, fair sir, are neither your comrades nor mine—either Archers nor Marshalmen—for I think they wear helmets, with visors lowered, and gorgets of the same. A plague upon these gorgets, of all other pieces of armour!—I have fumbled with them an hour before I could undo the rivets."

"Do you, gracious ladies," said Durward, without attending to Petit-André, "ride forward—not so fast as to raise an opinion of your being in flight, and yet fast enough to avail yourselves of the impediment which I shall presently place between you and these men who follow us."

The Countess Isabelle looked to their guide, and then whispered to her aunt, who spoke to Quentin. "We have confidence in your care, fair Archer, and will rather abide the risk of whatever may chance to your company, than we will go onward with that man, whose men is, we think, of no good augury."

"Be it as you will, ladies," said the youth—"There are but two who come after us; and though they be thought, as their arms seem to show, they shall, if they have any evil purpose, learn how a Scottish gentleman can do his devoir in the presence and for the defence of such as you. Which of you there," he continued, addressing the guards whom he commanded, "is willing to be my comrade, and to break a lance with these gallants?"

One of the men absolutely faltered in resolution; the third, Bertrand Guyot, swore, "that cap de were they Knights of King Arthur's Round Table, I would try their mettle, for the honour of Gascony."

While he spoke, the two knights—for they seemed of no less rank—came up with the rear of the party, in which Quentin, with his sturdy adherent, had by this time stationed himself. They were fully accoutred in excellent armour of polished steel, without any device by which they could be distinguished.

One of them, as they approached, called out to Quentin, "Sir Squire, give place—we come to relieve you of a charge which is above your rank and condition. You will do well to leave these ladies in our care, who are fitter to wait upon them, especially as we know that in yours they are little better than captives."

"In return to your demand, sire," replied Durward, "know, in the first place, that I am discharging the duty imposed upon me by my present Sovereign; and next, that however unworthy I may be, the ladies desire to abide under my protection."

"Out, surrah!" exclaimed one of the champions; "will you, a wandering beggar, put yourself on terms of resistance against belted knights?"

"They are indeed terms of resistance," said Quentin, "since they oppose your insolent and unlawful aggression, and if there be difference of rank between us, which as yet I know not, your discourtesy has done it away. Draw your sword, or, if you will use the lance, take ground for your career."

While the knights turned their horses, and rode back to the distance of about a hundred and fifty yards, Quentin, looking to the ladies, bent low on his middle-bow, as if desiring their favourable regard, and as they streamed towards him their kerchiefs in token of encouragement, the two assailants had gained the distance necessary for their charge.

Calling to the Gascon to hear himself like a man, Durward put his steed into motion; and the four horsemen met in full career in the midst of the ground which at first separated them. The shock was fatal to the poor Gascon; for his adversary, aiming at his face, which was undefended by a visor, ran him through the eye into the brain, so that he fell dead from his horse.

On the other hand, Quentin, though labouring under the same disadvantage, swayed himself in the saddle so dexterously, that the hostile lance, slightly scratching his cheek, passed over his right shoulder; while his own spear, striking his antagonist fair upon the breast, hurled him to the ground. Quentin jumped off to unhelm his fallen opponent; but the other knight, (who had never yet spoken,) seeing the fortune of his companion, dismounted still more speedily than Durward, and bestriding his friend, who lay senseless, exclaimed, "In the name of God and Saint Martin, mount, good fellow, and get thee gone with thy woman's ware!—Ventre Saint Gris, they have caused mischief enough this morning."

"By your leave, Sir Knight," said Quentin, who could not brook the menacing tone in which this advice was given, "I will first see whom I have had to do with, and learn who is to answer for the death of my comrade."

"That shalt thou never live to know or to tell," answered the Knight. "Get thee back in peace, good fellow. If we were fools for interrupting your passage, we have had the worst, for thou hast done more evil than the lives of thou and thy whole band could repay.—Nay, if thou wilt have it," (for Quentin now drew his sword, and advanced on him,) "take it with a vengeance!"

So saying, he dealt the Scot such a blow on the helmet, as, till that moment, (though bred where good blows were plenty,) he had only read of in romance. It descended like a thunderbolt, beating down the guard which the young soldier had raised to protect his head, and, reaching his helmet of proof, cut it through so far as to touch his hair, but without farther injury; while Durward, dizzy, stunned, and beaten down on one knee, was for an instant at the mercy of the knight, had it pleased him to second his blow. But compassion for Quentin's youth, or admiration of his courage, or a generous love of fair play, made him withhold from taking such advantage; while Durward, collecting himself, sprung up and attacked his antagonist with the energy of one deter-mailed to conquer or die, and at the same time with the presence of mind necessary for fighting the quarrel out to the best advantage. Resolved not again to expose himself to such dreadful blows as he had just sustained, he employed the advantage of superior agility, increased by the comparative lightness of his armour, to harass his antagonist, by traversing on all sides, with a suddenness of motion and rapidity of attack, against which the knight, in his heavy panoply, found it difficult to defend himself without much fatigue.

It was in vain that this generous antagonist called aloud to Quentin, "that there now remained no cause of fight betwixt them, and that he was loath to be constrained to do him injury." Listening only to the suggestions of a passionate wish to redeem the shame of his temporary defeat, Durward continued to assail him with the rapidity of lightning—now menacing him with the edge, now with the point of his sword—and ever keeping such an eye on the motions of his opponent, of whose superior strength he had had striking proof, that he was ready to spring backward, or stand firm under the blows of his tremendous weapon.

"Now the devil be with thee for an obstinate and presumptuous fool," muttered the knight, "that cannot be quiet till thou art knocked on the head!" So saying, he changed his mode of fighting, collected himself as if to stand on the defensive, and seemed contented with parrying, instead of returning, the blows which Quentin unceasingly aimed at him, with the internal resolution, that the instant when a further loss of breath, or any false or careless pass of the young soldier, should give an opening, he would put an end to the fight by a single blow. It is likely he might have succeeded in this artful policy, but Fate had ordered it otherwise.

The duel was still at the hottest, when a large party of horse rode up, crying, "Hold, in the King's name!" Both champions stopped back—and Quentin saw, with surprise, that his Captain, Lord Crawford, was at the head of the party who had thus interrupted their combat. There was also Tristan l'Hermite, with two or three of his followers; making, in all, perhaps twenty horse.

CHAPTER XV.

THE CYDE.

He was a son of Egypt as he told me,
And one descended from those dead magicians,
Who waged rash war when Israel dwelt in Goshen, With Israel and his Prophet: watching and
With him the son of Levi—and encountering Joshua's miracles with incantations.
Till upon Egypt came the avenging Angel,
And those proud signs wept for their first-born,
As wept the unbettered peasant—Anonymous.

The arrival of Lord Crawford and his guard put an immediate end to the engagement which we endeavoured to describe in the last chapter; and the Knight, throwing off his helmet, hastily gave the old lord his sword, saying, "Crawford, I render myself—But hither—and lend me your ear—a word, for God's sake—save the Duke of Orleans!"

"How? what?" the Duke of Orleans? exclaimed the Scottish commander—"How came that, in the name of the foul fiend? It will run the callant with the King, for ever and a day!"

"Ask no questions," said Dunois—for it was no other than he—"it was all my fault.—See, he stirs. I came forth but to have a snatch at yonder damsel, and make myself a lander and a married man—and see what is come on't. Keep back your canaille—let no man look upon him." So saying, he opened the visor of Orleans, and threw water on his face, which was afforded by the neighbouring lake.

Quentin Durward, meanwhile, stood like one plumb-struck; so fast did new adventures pour in upon him. He had now, as the pale features of his first antagonist assured him, borne to the earth the first Prince of the blood in France, and had measured swords with her best champion, the celebrated Dunois;—both of them achievements honourable in themselves; but whether they might be called good service to the King, or so esteemed by him, was a very different question.

The Duke had now recovered his breath, and was able to sit up and give attention to what passed betwixt Dunois and Crawford, while the former pleaded eagerly, that there was no occasion to mention in the matter the name of the most noble Orleans, while he was ready to take the whole blame on his own shoulders, and to avouch that the Duke had only come thither in friendship to him.

Lord Crawford continued listening, with his eyes fixed on the ground, and from time to time he sighed and shook his head. At length he said, looking up, "Thou knowest, Dunois, that for thy father's sake, as well as thine own, I would full fain do thee a service."

"It is not for myself I demand any thing," answered Dunois. "Thou hast my sword, and I am your prisoner—what needs more?—But it is for this noble Prince, the only hope of France, if God should will the Dauphin. He only came hither to do me a favour—in an effort to make my fortune—in a matter which the King had partly encouraged."

"Dunois," replied Crawford, "if another had told me thou hadst brought the noble Prince into the jeopardy to serve any purpose of thine own, I had told him it was false. And now, that thou dost pretend to thyself, I can hardly believe it is for the sake of speaking the truth."

"Noble Crawford," said Orleans, who had now actually recovered from his swoon, "you are too like a character to your friend Dunois, not to do him justice. It was indeed I that dragged him hither, most unwillingly, upon an enterprise of hair-brained passion, suddenly and rashly undertaken.—Look on me as it who will," he added, raising up and turning to the old lady—"I am Louis of Orleans, willing to pay the penalty of my own folly. I trust the King will find his displeasure to me, as it but just.—Meanwhile, as a child of France must not give up his sword to any one—not even to you, brave Crawford—fare thee well, good steel."

So saying, he drew his sword from its scabbard, and flung it into the lake. It went through the air like a stream of lightning, and sunk in the bubbling waters, which speedily closed over it. All remained standing in irresolution and astonishment, so high was the rank, and so much esteemed was the character, of the culprit, while, at the same time, all were conscious that the consequences of his rash enterprise, considering the views which the King had upon him, were likely to end in his utter ruin.

Dunois was the first who spoke, and it was in the chiding tone of an offended, and distracted friend:—

"So! your Highness hath judged it fit to cast away your best sword, in the same morning when it was your pleasure to fling away the King's favour, and to slight the friendship of Dunois?"

"My dearest kinsmen," said the Duke, "what a how was it in my purpose to slight your friendship, by telling the truth, when it was due to your safety and my honour?"

"What had you to do with my safety, my most princely cousin, I would pray to know?" answered Dunois gruffly: "What, in God's name, was it to you, if I had a mind to be hanged, or strangled, or flung into the Loire, or poisoned, or broke on the wheel, or hung up alive in an iron cage, or buried alive in a castle-loom, or disposed of in any other way in which it might please King Louis to get rid of his faithful subject?—(you need not wink and frown, and point to Tristan l'Hermite—I see the scoundrel as well as you do.) But it would not have stood so bad with me—And so much for my safety. And dare for your own honour—by the blush of Saint Magdalen, I think the honour would have been to have saved this morning's work, or kept it out of sight. How has your highness got yourself unharnessed by a wild Scottish boy?"

"Tut, tut!" said Lord Crawford, "never shall his Highness for that. It is not the first time a Scottish boy hath broke a good lance—I am glad they both borne him well."

will say nothing to the contrary," said Dunois; "had your Lordship come something later than this, there might have been a vacancy in your list of Archers."

"Ay, ay," answered Lord Crawford; "I can read handwriting in that cleft morion.—Some one took it from the lad, and gave him a bonnet, which its steel lining will keep his head better than that iron loom.—And let me tell your Lordship, that your own armour of proof is not without some marks of Scottish handwriting.—But, Dunois, I must request the Duke of Orleans and you to take care, and accompany me, as I have power and commission to convey you to a place different from that which my good will might assign you."

"May I not speak one word, my Lord of Crawford, to your fair ladies?" said the Duke of Orleans.

"Not one syllable," answered Lord Crawford; "I am so much a friend of your Highness to permit an act of folly."—Then addressing Quentin, he said, "You, young man, have done your duty.—Go and obey the charge with which you are intrusted."

"Under favour, my Lord," said Tristan, with his usual brutality of manner, "the youth must find his own guide. I cannot do without Petit-André, for there is so like to be business on hand for him." "The young man," said Petit-André, now coming forward, "has only to keep the path which lies straight before him, and it will conduct him to a place where he will find the man who is to act as his guide.—I would not for a thousand ducats be absent from my Chief this day! I have hanged knights and squires many a one, and wealthy Echevins, and masters to boot—even counts and marquises have tasted of my handy-work—but, a-humph!"—He looked at the Duke, as if to intimate that he had filled up the blank, with "a Prince of the blood!"—"Ho, ho, ho! Petit André, thou wilt be famous in Chronicle!"

"Do you permit your ruffians to hold such language in your presence?" said Crawford, looking sternly at Tristan.

"Why do you not correct him yourself, my lord?" said Tristan, sullenly.

"Because thy hand is the only one in this company that can beat him, without being degraded by an action."

"Then rule your own men, my Lord, and I will answerable for mine," said the Provost-Marshal. Lord Crawford seemed about to give a passionate reply; but, as if he had thought better of it, turned back short upon Tristan, and requesting the Duke of Orleans and Dunois to ride one on either hand of him, he made a signal of adieu to the ladies, and said to Quentin, "God bless thee, my child; thou hast been thy service valiantly, though in an unhappy hour." He was about to go off—when Quentin heard Dunois whisper to Crawford, "Do you lead us to Plessis?"

"O, my unhappy and rash friend," answered Lord Crawford, with a sigh; "to Loches."

"To Loches!" The name of a castle, or rather a yet more dreaded than Plessis itself, fell like a death-toll upon the ear of the young Scotchman.—He had heard it described as a place destined to the hangings of those secret acts of cruelty with which Louis shamed to pollute the interior of his own palace. There were in this place of terror dungeons and dungeons, some of them unknown even to the lords themselves; living graves, to which men were condemned, with little hope of farther employment during the rest of their life, than to breathe impure air, and feed on bread and water. At this formidable castle were also those dreadful places of confinement called oubliettes, in which the wretched prisoner could neither stand upright, nor stretch himself at length, an imprisonment, it is said, of the Cardinal Balue.^a It is no wonder that the name of this place of horrors, and the consciousness that he had been partly the means of dispatching thither two such illustrious victims, threw so much sadness into the heart of the young man, that he rode for some time with his head down, and his eyes fixed on the ground, and his heart filled with the most painful reflections.

jected, his eyes fixed on the ground, and his heart filled with the most painful reflections.

As he was now again at the head of the little troop, and pursuing the road which had been pointed out to him, the Lady Hameline had an opportunity to say to him,—

"Methinks, fair sir, you regret the victory which your gallantry has attained in our behalf?"

There was something in the question which sounded like irony, but Quentin had tact enough to answer simply and with sincerity,

"I can regret nothing that is done in the service of such ladies as you are; but, methinks, had it consisted with your safety, I had rather have fallen by the sword of so good a soldier as Dunois, than have been the means of consigning that renowned knight and his unhappy chief, the Duke of Orleans, to yonder fearful dungeons."

"It was, then, the Duke of Orleans," said the elder lady, turning to her niece. "I thought so, even at the distance from which we beheld the fray.—You see, kinswoman, what we might have been, had this sly and avaricious monarch permitted us to be seen at his Court. The first Prince of the blood of France, and the valiant Dunois, whose name is known as wide as that of his heroic father—This young gentleman did his devoir bravely and well; but methinks 'tis pity that he did not succumb with honour, since his ill-advised gallantry has stood betwixt us and these princely rescuers."

The Countess Isabelle replied in a firm and almost a displeased tone; with an energy, in short, which Quentin had not yet observed her use.

"Madam," she said, "but that I know you jest, I would say your speech is ungrateful to our brave defender, to whom we owe more, perhaps, than you are aware of. Had these gentlemen succeeded so far in their rash enterprise as to have defeated our escort, is it not still evident, that on the arrival of the royal guard, we must have shared their captivity? For my own part, I give tears, and will soon bestow masses on the brave man who has fallen, and I trust," (she continued more timidly,) "that he who lives will accept my grateful thanks."

As Quentin turned his face towards her, to return the fitting acknowledgments, she saw the blood which streamed down on one side of his face, and exclaimed, in a tone of deep feeling, "Holy Virgin, he is wounded! he bleeds!—Dismount, sir, and let your wound be bound up."

In spite of all that Durward could say of the slightness of his hurt, he was compelled to dismount, and to seat himself on a bunk, and unhelmet himself, while the ladies of Croye, who, according to a fashion not as yet antiquated, pretended to some knowledge of leech-craft, washed the wound, stanching the blood, and bound it with the kerchief of the younger Countess, in order to exclude the air, for so their practice was prescribed.

In modern times, gallants seldom or never take wounds for ladies' sake, and damsels on their side never meddle with the cure of wounds. Each has its danger the less. That which the men escape will be generally acknowledged; but the peril of dressing such a slight wound as that of Quentin's, which involved nothing formidable or dangerous, was perhaps as real in its way as the risk of encountering it.

We have already said the patient was eminently handsome; and the removal of his helmet, or, more properly, of his morion, had suffered his fair locks to escape in profusion, around a countenance in which the hilarity of youth was qualified by a blush of modesty at once and pleasure. And then the feelings of the younger Countess, when compelled to hold the kerchief to the wound, while her aunt sought in their baggage for some vulnerary remedy, were mingled at once with a sense of delicacy and embarrassment; a thrill of pity for the patient, and of gratitude for his services, which exaggerated, in her eyes, his good mien and handsome features. In short, this incident seemed intended by Fate to complete the mysterious communication which she had, by many petty and apparently accidental circumstances, established betwixt two persons, who, though far different in rank and fortune, strongly resembled each other in youth, beauty, and the romantic tenderness of an affectionate disposition. It was no wonder, therefore, that from the moment the thoughts of the Countess Isabelle, already so familiar to his imagination, should become paramount in Quentin's bosom, not that if the maiden's feelings were of a less decided character, at least so far as known to himself, she should think of her young defender, to whom she had just rendered a service so interesting, with more emotion than of any of the whole band of high-born nobles who had for two years past haunted her with their adoration. Above all, when the thought of Campes-Basso, the unworthy favourite of Duke Charles, with his hypocritical mien, his base, treacherous spirit, his very soul, and his equit, occurred to her, his portrait was more disgustingly hideous than ever, and deeply did she resolve no tyranny should make her enter into so hateful a union.

In the meantime, whether the good Lady Hameline of Croye understood and admired masculine beauty as much as when she was fifteen years younger, (for the good Countess was at least thirty five, if the records of that noble house speak the truth,) or whether she thought she had done their young protector less justice than she ought, in the first view which she had taken of his services, it is certain that he began to find favour in her eyes.

"My men," she said, "has bestowed on you a heron for the healing of your wound; I will give you one to grace your gallantry, and to encourage you in your farther progress in chivalry."

So saying, she gave him a richly embroidered kerchief of blue and silver, and pointing to the bounding of her palfrey, and the plumes in her riding-cap, desired him to observe that the colours were the same.

The fashion of the time prescribed one absolute mode of receiving such a favour, which Quentin followed accordingly, by tying the napkin round his arm; yet his manner of acknowledgment had more of awkwardness, and less of gallantry in it, than perhaps a knight might have had at another time, and in another province; for though the wearing of a lady's favour given in such a manner, was merely matter of general compliment, he would much rather have preferred the right of displaying on his arm that which bound the wound inflicted by the sword of Duquesne.

Meantime they continued their pilgrimage, Quentin now riding abreast of the ladies, into whose society he seemed to be tacitly adopted. He did not speak much, however, being filled by the silent consciousness of happiness, which is afraid of giving too strong vent to its feelings. The Countess Isabelle spoke still less, so that the conversation was chiefly carried on by the Lady Hameline, who showed no inclination to let it drop; for, to initiate the young Archer, as she said, into the principles and practice of chivalry, she detailed to him, at full length, the Passage of Arne at Hastingham, where she had distributed the spoils among the victors.

Not much interested, I am sorry to say, in the description of this epical scene, or in the heraldic bearings of the different Flemish and German knights, which the lady blended with painful accuracy, Quentin began to entertain some alarm lest he should have passed the place where his guide was to join him—a most serious disaster, and from which, should it really have taken place, the very worst consequences were to be apprehended.

While he hesitated whether it would be better to send back one of his followers, to see whether this might not be the case, he heard the blast of a horn, and looking in the direction from which the sound came, beheld a horseman riding very fast towards them. The low sun, and wild, shaggy, uncultivated state of the animal, reminded Quentin of the mountain breed of horses in his own country; but this was much more finely limbed, and, with the same appearance of hardness, was more rapid in its movements. The head particularly, which, in the Scotch pony, is often lumpy and heavy, was small and well placed in the neck of this animal, with thin jaws, sparkling eyes, and expanded nostrils.

The rider was even more angular in his appearance than the horse which he rode, though that was extremely unlike the horses of France. Although he managed his palfrey with great dexterity, he sat with his feet in broad stirrups, something resembling shovels, so short in the leathers, that his knees were well nigh as high as the pommel of his saddle. His dress was a red tunic of small size, in which he wore a mailed plume, secured by a clasp of silver; his tunic, which was shaped like those of the Estrangers, (a sort of troops whom the Venetians at that time levied in the provinces, on the eastern side of the gulf,) was green in colour, and lavishly lined with gold; he wore very wide drawers or trousers of white, though none of the cleanest, which girded beneath the knee, and his swarthy legs were quite bare, unless for the complicated lace which bound a pair of medals on his feet; he had no spurs, the clip of his large stirrups being so sharp as to serve to guide the horse in a very severe manner. In common with the angular horsemen were a dagger on the right side, and on the left a short crooked French sword; and by a tarnished baldric over the shoulder hung the horn which announced his approach. He had a swarthy and sun-burnt visage, with a thin beard, and piercing dark eyes, a well-formed nose and nose, and other features which might have been pronounced handsome, but for the black old-hats which hung around his face, and the air of villain and emaciation, which rather seemed to indicate a savage than a civilized man.

"He also is a Bohemian!" said the ladies to each other. "Holy Mary, will the King again place credence in these outcasts?"

"I will question the man, if it be your pleasure," said Quentin, "and answer myself of his fidelity as I best may."

Durward, as well as the ladies of Croye, had recognised in this man's dress and appearance, his habit and the manners of those vagrants with whom he had nearly been confounded by the late proceedings of Troie-Rachelles and Peter-Andre; and he too, entertained very natural apprehensions concerning the risk of reposing trust in one of that vagrant race.

"Art thou come hither to seek us?" was his first question.

The stranger nodded.

"And for what purpose?"

"To guide you to the palace of him of Kings."

"Of the Bishop?"

The Bohemian again nodded.

"What token canst thou give me, that we shall yield credence to thee?"

"Even the old rhyme, and no other," answered the Bohemian,—

"The sign show the way,
The sign lead the guide."

"A true token," said Quentin; "Lead on, my fellow—I will speak farther with thee presently." Then falling back to the ladies, he said, "I can recognise this man as the guide we are to expect, for he hath brought me a pass-word, known, I think, but to the King and me. But I will converse with him farther, and endeavour to ascertain how far he is to be trusted."

CHAPTER XVI.

THE VAGRANT.

I am as free as Nature's God made man,
But the laws of courtesy bind me,
Which will it were the world were free,
The Captives of Death.

While Quentin held the brief communication with the ladies, necessary to assure them that the extraordinary addition to their party was the guide whom they were to expect on the King's part, he noted (for he was as alert in observing the motions of the stranger, as the Bohemian could be on his part) that the man not only turned his head as far back as he could, to peer at them, but that, with a constant air of agility, were reminding that of a monkey than of he had swung his whole person around on the spot as to sit almost idling upon the ground, the convenience, as it seemed, of watching the conversation.

Amazed with this manoeuvre, Quentin turned to the Bohemian, and said to him, as he resumed his proper position on the horse, "Mend, you will prove but a blind guide, if you be not of your horse rather than his ears. If I were actually blind," answered the Bohemian, "could not the lame guide you through any open stream of France, or in these adjourning to it?" "You are no Frenchman born," said the Scot. "No," answered the guide.

"Countryman, then, are you?" demanded of no country," answered the guide.

"I of no country?" repeated the Scot.

answered the Bohemian, "of none. I am a Bohemian, an Egyptian, or whatever the name, in their different languages, may choose or people; but I have no country."

"Are a Christian?" asked the Scotchman.

Bohemian shook his head.

"I" said Quentin, (for there was little tolerance of Catholicism in those days,) "do not ship Mahoun?"

was the indifferent and concise answer of a man who neither seemed offended or surprised at the man's violence of manner.

"You a Pagan, then, or what are you?"

"No religion," answered the Bohemian.

and started back; for though he had heard of idolatry, it had never entered into his belief, that any body of men could exist who made no use of worship whatever. He recoiled in astonishment, to ask his guide where he dwelt.

"Never I chance to be for the time," replied the man. "I have no home."

"Do you guard your property?"

"The clothes which I wear, and the horse, I have no property."

"You dress gaily, and ride gallantly," said Durward. "What are your means of subsistence?"

"When I am hungry, drink when I am thirsty, and no other means of subsistence than chance in my way," replied the vagabond.

of the Bohemians. It was a remarkable feature in the life of these wanderers that they did not like the Jews, yet otherwise resembled in some particular points of their peculiar religion, whether in form or principle. By confinement, as far as might be required, with the "any country" in which they happened to arrive, nor was their conduct more than was demanded of them. It was in India they embraced neither the tenets of the Brahmin nor of Mahomet. They have been known to go betwixt to the various East Indian tribes of Asia. Their want of religion is supplied by a good superstition. None of their rites can be described, as they belonged to meetings in caves in the forests, like the religions of the Hindoos, more than of any people. They adopt various observances, picked up allusion of the country in which they live. It is in the customs of the tribes on the borders of England and in the habits of the people in those countries which are of the passing through the parish church, and they to obtain permission from the people to do so when it is empty for the performance of divine service is also an allusion to the custom. They are therefore not of any particular sect of religion, and the highest mirrored class may be considered as acknowledging no form of worship, and such is described as being of no faith, of Hayraddin Magrabia.

as into nature, that nothing is more dangerous to get and religious people than being found to follow or profession. When Paris was garrisoned by the king in the year 1418, the Bohemian was waiting with a gun, and a post held by the French troops. He happened to make a cup and was about to take it out of his mouth, in company with a companion to that effect, when, going to the market on a morning, the soldier addressed them in these words: "Hail to you, my dear Frenchman, welcome to you. I have a way for you. Upon looking closely at the man, he seemed plainly to see, or they who took this method of expressing him of the duty imposed on him. When the rob he is considered, it will be found to agree a deep which would make him somewhat himself on. If he had been overtaken by a servant or a peasant, would have been the slightest improvement of parish.

"Under whose laws do you live?"

"I acknowledge obedience to none, but as it suits my pleasure or my necessity," said the Bohemian.

"Who is your leader, and commands you?"

"The Father of our tribe—if I choose to obey him," said the guide—"otherwise I have no commander."

"You are then," said the wondering quaker, "destitute of all that other men are combined by—you have no law, no leader, no settled means of subsistence, no home, or home. You have, may Heaven compassionate you, no country—and, may Heaven enlighten and forgive you, you have no God—What is it that remains to you, deprived of government, domestic happiness, and religion?"

"I have liberty," said the Bohemian—"I crush to no one—obey no one—respect no one—I go where I will—live as I can—and die when my day comes."

"But you are subject to instant execution, at the pleasure of the Judge?"

"Be it so," returned the Bohemian; "I can but die no much the sooner."

"And to imprisonment also," said the Scot; "and where then is your boasted freedom?"

"In my thoughts," said the Bohemian, "which no chains can bind; while yours, even when your limbs are free, remain fettered by your laws and your superstitions, your dreams of local attachment, and your fantastic whims of civil policy. Such as I am free in spirit when our limbs are chained—You are imprisoned in mind, even when your limbs are most at freedom."

"Yet the freedom of your thoughts," said the Scot, "relieves not the pressure of the gyves on your limbs."

"For a brief time that may be endured," answered the vagrant; "and if within that period I cannot extricate myself, and find of relief from my comrades, I can always die, and death is the most perfect freedom of all."

There was a deep pause of some duration, which Quentin at length broke by resuming his queries.

"You are a wandering race, unknown to the nations of Europe—Whence do they derive their origin?"

"I may not tell you," answered the Bohemian.

"When will they relieve this kingdom from their presence, and return to the land from whence they came?" said the Scot.

"When the day of their pilgrimage shall be accomplished," replied his vagrant guide.

"Are you not sprung from those tribes of Israel, which were carried into captivity beyond the great river Euphrates?" said Quentin, who had not forgotten the lore which had been taught him at Aberbrothach.

"Had we been so," answered the Bohemian, "we had followed that faith, and practised their rites."

"What is thine own name?" said Durward.

"My proper name is only known to my brethren—The men beyond our tents call me Hayraddin Magrabia, that is, Hayraddin the African Moor."

"Then speakest too well for one who hath lived always in thy filthy horde," said the Scot.

"I have learned some of the knowledge of this land," said Hayraddin.—"When I was a little boy, our tribe was chased by the hunters after human flesh. An arrow went through my mother's hand, and she died. I was entangled in the blanket on her shoulders, and was taken by the pursuers. A priest dragged me from the Provost's archers, and trained me up in Frankish learning for two or three years."

"How came you to part with him?" demanded Durward.

"I stole money from him—even the God which he worshipped," answered Hayraddin, with perfect composure. "He detected me, and beat me—I stabbed him with my knife, fled to the woods, and was again united to my people."

"Wretch!" said Durward, "did you murder your benefactor?"

"What had he to do to burden me with his benefactions? The Zangero boy was no house-bred cur, to dog the heels of his master and crouch beneath his blows, for scraps of food—He was the imprisoned wolf-whelp, which at the first opportunity broke his chain, rushed his master, and returned to his wilder den."

There was another point, when the young Scot, with a view of still further investigating the character and purpose of this suspicious guide, asked Hayreddin, "Whether it was not true that his people, amid their ignorance, pretended to a knowledge of futurity, which was not given to the sage, philosopher, and divines, of more polished society?"

"We pretend to it," said Hayreddin, "and it is with justice."

"How can it be, that so high a gift is bestowed on so abject a race?" said Quentin.

"Can I tell you?" answered Hayreddin—"Yes, I may indeed, but it is when you shall explain to me why the dog can trace the footsteps of a man, while man, the nobler animal, hath not power to trace those of the dog. These powers, which seem to you so wonderful, are instinctive in our race. From the lines on the face and on the hand, we can tell the future fate of those who consult us, even as surely as you know from the blossom of the tree in spring, what fruit it will bear in the harvest."

"I doubt of your knowledge, and defy you to the proof."

"Duly ma no, Sir Squire," said Hayreddin Margrabin—"I can tell you, that, any what you will of your religion, the Goddism whom you worship rides in this company."

"Peace!" said Quentin, in astonishment; "on thy life, not a word farther, but in answer to what I ask thee.—Canst thou be faithful?"

"I can—all men can," said the Bohemian.

"But wilt thou be faithful?"

"Wouldst thou believe me the more should I swear?" answered Margrabin, with a sneer.

"Thy life is in my hand," said the young Scot.

"Strike, and see whether I live to die," answered the Bohemian.

"Will money render thee a truer guide?" demanded Durward.

"If I be not such without it, No," replied the heathen.

"Then what will bind thee?" asked the Scot.

"Kindness," replied the Bohemian.

"Shall I swear to show thee such, if thou art true guide to us on this pilgrimage?"

"No," replied Hayreddin, "it were extravagant waste of a commodity so rare. To thee I am bound already."

"How!" exclaimed Durward, more surprised than ever.

"Remember the chestnut-tree on the banks of the Cher! The victim, whose body thou didst cut down, was my brother, Zamer, the Margrabin."

"And yet," said Quentin, "I find you in correspondence with those very officers by whom your brother was done to death, for it was one of them who directed me where to meet with you—the same, doubtless, who procured your lady's services as a guide."

"What can we do?" answered Hayreddin, gloomily—"These men deal with us as the sheep-dogs do with the flock; they protect us for a while, drive us hither and thither at their pleasure, and always end by guiding us to the shambles."

Quentin had afterwards occasion to learn that the Bohemian spoke truth in this particular, and that the Provost-guard, employed to suppress the vagabond bands by which the kingdom was infested, entertained correspondence among them, and forbore, for a certain time, the exercise of their duty, which always at last ended in robbing them alive to the gallows. This is a sort of political reaction between thief and officer, for the profitable exercise of their mutual professions, which has existed in all countries, and is by no means unknown to our own.

Durward, parting from the guide, fell back to the rest of the retinue, very little satisfied with the character of Hayreddin, and entertaining little confidence in the professions of gratitude which he had personally made to him. He promised to sound the other two men who had been assigned him for attendants, and he was concerned to find them stupid, and as unfit to assist him with counsel, as in the encounter they had shown themselves reluctant to use their weapons.

"It is all the better," said Quentin to himself, his spirit rising with the apprehended difficulties of his situation; that lovely young lady shall owe all to me. What one hand can do, and one hand can do,—methinks I can boldly count upon. I have seen my father's house on fire, and he and my brothers lying dead amongst the flames—I gave not an inch back, but fought it out to the last. Now I am two years older, and have the best and furthest cause to bear me well, that ever handled mottle within a brave man's bosom."

Acting upon this resolution, the attention and activity which Quentin bestowed during the journey, had in it something that gave him the appearance of ubiquity. His principal and most favourite past was of course by the side of the ladies; who, sensible of his extreme attention to their safety, began to converse with him in almost the tone of familiar friendship, and appeared to take great pleasure in the society, yet shrewdness, of his conversation. But Quentin did not suffer the fascination of this intercourse to interfere with the vigilant discharge of his duty.

If he was often by the side of the Countess, he bearing to describe to the natives of a level country the Grampian mountains, and, above all, the house of Glen-houlshin, he was as often riding with Hayreddin, in the front of the cavalcade, questioning him about the road, and the resting-places, and recording his answers in his mind, to ascertain whether upon cross-examination he could discover any thing he meditated treachery. As often again he was in the rear, endeavouring to secure the attachment of the two harramen, by kind words, gifts, and promises of additional recompense, when their task should be accomplished.

In this way they travelled for more than a week, through by-paths and unfrequented districts, and by circuitous routes, in order to avoid large towns. Nothing remarkable occurred, though they saw and felt in met strolling gangs of Bohemians, who respect on them, as under the conduct of one of their tribe,—a ragged soldier, or perhaps bandit, who deemed their party too strong to be attacked,—or parties of the Marchauntes, as they would now be termed, whom Louis, who smothered the wounds of the last with steel and sword, employed to suppress the disorderly bands which infested the interior. These last suffered them to pursue their way unmolested, by virtue of a pass-word, with which Quentin had been furnished for that purpose by the King himself.

Their resting-places were chiefly the monasteries, most of which were obliged by the rules of their foundation to receive pilgrims, under which character the ladies travelled, with hospitality, and without any troublesome inquiries into their rank and character, which most persons of distinction were desirous of concealing while in the discharge of their vows. The pretence of wariness was usually employed by the Countess of Croy, as an excuse for manifestly refusing to rest, and Quentin, as their Major Dom, arranged all that was necessary between them and their entertainers, with a shrewdness which saved them all trouble, and an alacrity that failed not to excite a corresponding degree of good will on the part of those who were thus judiciously attended to.

One circumstance gave Quentin peculiar trouble, which was the character and notion of his guide, who, as a heathen, and an infidel vagabond, added besides to occult arts, (the badge of all his trade) was often looked upon as a very improper guest for the holy resting-places at which the company usually halted, and was not in consequence admitted within even the outer circuit of their walls, save with extreme reluctance. This was very embarrassing, for, on the one hand, it was necessary to keep a good humour a man who was possessed of the secret of their expedition; and on the other, Quentin deemed it indispensable to maintain a vigilant but not watch on Hayreddin's conduct, in order that, as far as might be, he should hold no communication with any one without being observed. This of course was impossible, if the Bohemian was lodged without the precincts of the convent at which they stopped, and Durward could not help thinking that Hayreddin business of baying about this latter strange; for, instead of keeping himself still and quiet in a quarters allotted to him, his conversations and songs were at the same time as entering to the novices and younger brethren, and so lying in the opinion of the seniors of the friary that, in more cases than one, it required all the city, supported by threats, which Quentin could offer him, to restrain his irreverent and unmannerly conduct, and all the interest he could make the superiors, to prevent the heathen hounds being thrust out of doors. He succeeded, however, by the adroit manner in which he apologized for acts of indecency committed by their attendants, and the skill with which he hinted the hope of being brought to a better sense of principles and duty, by the neighbourhood of holy relics, sanctified buildings, and above all, of men dedicated to God.

Upon the tenth or twelfth day of their journey they had entered Flanders, and were approaching the town of Namur, all the efforts of Quentin being inadequate to suppress the consequences of the evil given by his heathen guide. The scene was a gloomy convent, and of a strict and reformed order. The Prior a man who afterwards died in the odour of sanctity. After rather more than the usual time (which were usual in such a case to be exact) had been consumed, the obstinate Bohemian at length obtained quarters in an out-house set off by a lay brother, who acted as gardener, and who retired to their apartment, as usual, as a visitor, who chanced to have some distant relations and friends in Scotland, and who was fond of all foreigners tell of their native country, my Quentin, with whose men and conduct he occasionally glanced to a slight spontaneous reflection on his own cell. Finding the Prior a man of intellect, Quentin did not neglect the opportunity of making himself acquainted with the state of affairs in the country of Liège, of which, during the last two of their journey he had heard such reports, as to him very apprehensive for the security of his goods during the remainder of their route, say, even to Bishop's power to protect them, when they were safely conducted to his residence. The accounts of the Prior were not very consolatory, and that "the people of Liège were wealthy here, who, like Jerusalem of old, had waxed fat because they were uplifted in heart because of their wealth and their privileges that they had a dispute with the Duke of Burgundy, their lord, upon the subject of imposts and immunities, and that they had repeatedly broken out into war, whereas the Duke was as much stronger as being a man of a hot and fiery nature, that all sworn, by Saint George, on the next procession, he would make the city of Liège like to the tower of Babylon, and the downfall of Tyre, and a reproach to the whole territory of France."

and he is a prince, by all report, likely to keep a war," said Quentin, "as the men of Liège probably know how they give him occasion." "I were to be a hazard," said the Prior, "and give the prayers of the people in the land, who tell not that the bones of the saints were poured like water, and that they should perish even as the flowers, ere they make their paths with rain. Alas! the good Bishop shows ought and up to preserve peace, as well as much a servant of all; for it is written in holy scripture, Beati sunt qui pacem faciunt—here the good Prior stopped, with a sigh.

Quentin modestly urged the great importance of it was to the ladies whom he attended, to have a secured information respecting the internal state of the country, and what an act of Christian charity it would be, if the worthy and reverend Father would enlighten them upon that subject.

"It is one," said the Prior, "on which no man can wish willingly, for those who speak evil be powerful often in evil, and may find that a good thing shall carry the matter to his ears."

Nevertheless, to satisfy you, who seem an inquisitive youth, and your ladies, who are devout votaries accomplishing a holy pilgrimage, the little service that is in my power, I will be plain with you."

He then looked cautiously round, and lowered his voice, as if afraid of being overheard.

"The people of Liège," he said, "are partly instigated to their frequent mutinies by men of Ghent, who pretend, but as I hope, falsely, to have communion to that effect from our most Christian King, whom, however, I hold to deserve that term better than were consistent with his thus disturbing the peace of a neighbouring state. Yet as it is, that his name is freely used by those who uphold and inflame the discontent at Liège. There is, moreover, in the land, a nobleman of good descent, and brave in warlike affairs; but otherwise, so to speak, Leys effrontés of every mandate, a stumbling block of offence to the countess of Burgundy and Flanders. His name is William de la March."

"Called William with the Beard," said the young Bont, "or the Wild Boy of Ardenne?"

"And rightly so called, my son," said the Prior; "because he is as the wild boy of the forest, which treadeth down with his hoofs, and rendeth with his teeth. And he hath formed to himself a band of more than a thousand men, all, like himself, companions of civil and ecclesiastical authority, and holds himself independent of the Duke of Burgundy, and maintains himself and his followers by rapine and wrong, wrought without distinction, upon churchmen and laymen. Impudens manes in Christo Domini, he hath stretched forth his hand upon the anointed of the Lord, regardless of what is written, 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no wrong.'—Even to our poor house did he send for some of gold and some of silver as a ransom for our lives, and those of our brethren, to which we returned a Latin supplication, stating our inability to answer his demand, and exhorting him in the words of the preacher, Ne materis omnia tuo matrem, cum habet in te fiduciam. Nevertheless, this Guillaume Barbaire, this William de la March, as completely ignorant of humane letters as of humanity itself, replied, in his ridiculous jargon, 'Si non payatis, brulez monastereum nostrum!'"

"Of which rude Latin, however, you, my good father," said the youth, "were at no loss to conceive the meaning?"

"Alas, my son," said the Prior, "Fear and Necessity are shrewd interpreters; and we were obliged to melt down the silver vessels of our altar to satisfy the rapacity of this cruel chief—May Heaven requite it to him seven-fold! Perdet impietas—Amen, amen, amen, amen, amen!"

"I marvel," said Quentin, "that the Duke of Burgundy, who is so strong and powerful, doth not bestir himself to punish, of whose ravages I have already heard so much."

"Alas! my son," said the Prior, "the Duke Charles is now at Peronne, assembling his captains of hundreds and his captains of thousands, to make war against France; and then, while Heaven hath set discord between the hearts of those great princes, the country is misused by such subordinate oppressors. But it is an evil time that the Duke neglects the cure of these internal grievances, for the William de la March hath of late entertained open communication with Roubaix and Perillon, the chiefs of the discontented at Liège, and it is to be feared he will soon stir them up to some desperate enterprise."

"But the Bishop of Liège," said Quentin, "he hath all power enough to subdue this desperate and turbulent spirit—hath he not, good father?—Your answer to this question concerns me much."

"The Bishop, my child," replied the Prior, "hath the sword of Saint Peter, as well as the keys. He hath power as a secular prince, and he hath the protection of the mighty House of Burgundy; he hath also spiritual authority as a prelate, and he supports liful raven.) In this manner, the perceiver, until he distinctly heard who were the subject of his observation, could not distinguish the words, under the drooping branches of a big willow, which almost swept the tree, he caught hold of one of its stems of which, starting at once with wily, and strength, he raised himself of the tree, and sat, secure from the central branches.

When he could discover that the perceiver was now conversing with him, and, at the same time, he perceived disappointment, that no approach to him to comprehend their language was totally unknown to him. They did as Hayraddin made a sign of it ended by rubbing his shoulder around had no doubt that he was of the bestmending which he had to his escape from the convent.

He ran over his shoulder, which was hung almost across his person; it slashed, through which slashes a tiffany of various colours; they were five hundred points or strings, as the tight buff-jacket which he wore of which displayed a silver net of his Captain. A very small cone of his head, from which a tuft of curled hair, which fell on each side, and mingled with as broad a scythe long. He held a long lance, his whole equipment was that of an adventurer, who were known by night, in English, spearmen, who visible part of the infantry of the townsmen were, of course, a fierce dandy, and having an idle tale ourselves, that a lanknecht was to remain heaven on account of his vice, the score of his tumultuous, undisciplined disposition, they manfully either sought the one, nor eschewed

"You sooner, Mencher," said Hayraddin; "there is a young Scot, eye as the wild-cat, who watches me. He suspects me already, and, suspicion confirmed, I were a dead man he would carry back the woman."

"And the lanknecht," "we are three men to-morrow, and carry the woman farther. You said the two valets and your comrades may manage if all hold me, but I match your

"a coward than yourself," said Hayraddin is not fighting.—If you keep where it was laid, it is well—if not by to the Bishop's Palace, and Wil-may easily possess himself of them in half as strong as he pretended to

"For tainment!" said the soldier, "we are as strong and stronger, but we hear of a hundred of the lances of Burgundy, —das ist, see you,—five men to a lance do make five hundreds, and then hold me the devil, they will be fatter to seek for us, than we to seek for them, for der Bischoff hath a great fire on footing—ay, indeed?"

"You must then hold to the ambushade at the Cross of the Three Kings, or give up the adventure," said the Bohemian.

"Get up—get up the adventure of the rich bride for our noble hauptman—Tausel! I will charge through hell first.—Mein soul, we will be all princes and hertogs, whom they call dukes, and we will hab a mob at the wain-keller, and at the mouldy French crowns, and it may be at the pretty garcons too, when He with de heard is weary on them."

"The ambushade at the Cross of the Three Kings then still holds?" said the Bohemian.

"Mein Got, ay,—you will swear to bring them there; and when they are on their knees before the cross, and down from off their horses, which all men do, except such black heathens as thou, we will make in on them, and they are sure."

"Ay; but I promised this piece of necessary villany only on one condition," said Hayraddin.—"I will not have a hair of the young man's head touched. If you swear this to me, by your Three dead Men of Cologne, I will swear to you, by the Seven Night Walkers, that I will serve you truly as to the rest. And if you break your oath, the Night Walkers shall wake you seven nights from your sleep, between night and morning, and, on the eighth, they shall strangle and devour you."

"But, donner and hagel, what need you be so serious about the life of this boy, who is neither your blood nor kin?" said the German.

"No matter for that, honest Hemrick; some men have pleasure in cutting throats, some in keeping them whole.—So swear to me, that you will spare him life and limb, or, by the bright star Aldeboran, this matter shall go no further.—Swear, and by the Three Kings, as you call them, of Cologne—I know you care for no other oath."

"Du bist ein comische man," said the lanknecht, "I swear."

"Not yet," said the Bohemian—"Fence about, brave lanknecht, and look to the mat, else the Kings may not hear you."

The soldier took the oath in the manner prescribed, and then declared that he would be in readiness, observing the place was quite convenient, being scarce five miles from their present leaguer.

"But, were it not making sure work to have a falmlen of riders on the other road, by the left side of the inn, which might trap them if they go that way?"

The Bohemian considered a moment, and then answered, "No—the appearance of their troops in that direction might alarm the garrison of Namur, and then they would have a doubtful fight, instead of assured success. Besides, they shall travel on the right bank of the Meuse, for I can guide them which way I will, for, sharp as the same Scottish mountaineer is, he hath never asked any one's advice, save mine, upon the direction of their route.—Undoubtedly, I was assigned to him by an assured friend, whose word no man mistrusts till they come to know him a little."

"Hark ye, friend Hayraddin," said the soldier, "I would ask you somewhat.—You and your brother were, as you say yourself, gross earten-deuter, that is, star lookers and grater-ears.—Now, what hooker was it made you not foresee him, your brother Zamei, to be hanged?"

"I will tell you, Hemrick," said Hayraddin;—"If I could have known my brother was such a fool as to tell the counsel of King Louis to Duke Charles of Burgundy, I could have foretold his death as sure as I can foretell fair weather in July. Louis hath both ears and hands at the Court of Burgundy, and Charles's counsellors love the chink of French gold as well as thou dost the clatter of a wine-pot.—But fare thee well, and keep appointment—I must await my early Scot a bow-shot without the gate of the den of the lazy swine yonder, else will be think me about some caution which bodes no good to the success of his journey."

"Take a draught of comfort first," said the langknecht, rendering him a flask,—"but I forget; thou art best enough to drink nothing but water, like a vile vessel of Mahound and Termagand."

"Thou art thyself a vessel of the wine-measure and the flagon," said the Bohemian,—"I marvel not that thou art only trusted with the bloodthirsty and violent part of executing what better heads have devised. He must drink no wine, who would know the thoughts of others, or hide his own. But why preach to thee, who hast a thorn as eternal as a nail-bank in Arahim? Fare thee well.—Take my comrade Tunco with thee—his appearance about the monastery may breed suspicion."

The two worthies parted, after each had again pledged himself to keep the rendezvous at the Cross of the Three Kings.

Quentin Durward watched until they were out of sight, and then descended from his place of concealment, his heart throbbing at the narrow escape which he and his fair charge had made—of indeed, it could yet be achieved from a deep-laid plan of villainy. Afraid, on his return to the monastery, of stumbling upon Hayraddin, he made a long detour, at the expense of traversing some very rough ground, and was thus enabled to return to his asylum on a different point from that by which he left it.

On the route, he communed earnestly with himself concerning the safest plan to be pursued. He had formed the resolution, when he first heard Hayraddin avow his treachery, to put him to death as soon as the conference broke up, and his companions were at a sufficient distance; but when he heard the Bohemian express so much interest in saving his own life, he felt it would be ungrateful to execute upon him, in its repair, the punishment his treachery had deserved. He therefore resolved to spare his life, and even, if possible, still to use his services as a guide, under such precautions as should ensure the security of the precious charge, to the preservation of which his own life was internally devoted.

But whither were they to turn—the Countess of Creve could neither obtain shelter in Burgundy, from which they had fled, nor in France, from which they had been in a manner expelled. The violence of Duke Charles in the one country, was scarcely more to be feared than the cold and tyrannical jealousy of King Louis in the other. After deep thought, Durward could form no better or safer plan for their security, than that, evading the armies afloat, they should take the road to Lagny by the left bank of the Marne, and throw themselves, as the ladies originally designed, upon the protection of the exiled Bishop. That Prelate's will to protect them could not be doubted, and, if reinforced by this Burgundian party of men-at-arms, he might be considered as having the power. At any rate, if the dangers to which he was exposed from the hostility of William de la March, and from the troubles in the city of Lagny, appeared imminent, he would still be able to protect the unfortunate ladies until they could be dispatched to Germany with a suitable escort.

To sum up this reasoning—for when in a mental argument conducted without some reference to selfish considerations?—Quentin imagined that the death or captivity to which King Louis had, in cold blood, condemned him, set him at liberty from his engagements to the crown of France; which, therefore, it was his determined purpose to renounce. The Bishop of Lagny was likely, he concluded, to need soldiers, and he thought that, by the interposition of his fair friends, who now, especially the elder Countess, treated him with much familiarity, he might get some command, and perhaps might have the charge of conducting the ladies of Creve to some place more safe than the neighbourhood of Lagny. And, to conclude, the ladies had talked, although almost in a sort of jest, of raising the Countess's own vanguard, and no others did in those stormy times, fortifying her strong castle against all assailants whatever; they had jokingly asked Quentin, whether he would accept the posthumous office of their standard-bearer; and, on his embracing the office with ready gladness, they had, in the same spirit, permitted him both their hands on that confidential honorable appointment. Nay, he thought himself of the Countess Isabelle, one of the best and most beautiful to which true vassal ever homage, trembled when his lips rested on it longer than ceremony required, and that as soon appeared on her cheek and in her eye withdrew it. Something might come of all that brave man, at Quentin Durward's eagerly have taken the thoughts which fell into the considerations which were to direct conduct?

The point settled, he had next to consider whether he was to use the further judicious faithful Bohemian. He had renounced thought of killing him in the wood, and if he other guide and disarmed him alive, it was doing the traitor to the cause of William de la March with intelligence of their intentions. If, of taking the Prince into his country, and him to detain the Bohemian by force, should have time to reach the Bishop's residence, he dared not hazard such a step on one who was tried both as an old man, who held the safety of his convent the great object of his duty, and who trembled a lion of the Wild Boar of Ardennes.

At length Durward settled a plan of action which he could the better reckon, as it rested entirely upon himself, and, in the case he was engaged, he felt himself capable of doing. With a firm and bold heart, the consciousness of the dangers of his situation, Quentin composed to one walking under a light weight of which he was conscious, but which beyond his strength and power of endurance his plan was determined, he reached the convent.

Upon knocking gently at the gate, a lay sister, stationed for that purpose by opened it, and acquainted him that the brethren were engaged in the choir till daybreak, praying to forgive to the community the various which had that evening taken place within.

The worthy friar offered Quentin permission to attend their devotions, but his clothes in a wretched condition, that the young knight was declined the opportunity, and requested permission, to sit by the kitchen fire, in order to being dried before morning, as he was so demure that the Bohemian, when they met, should observe no traces of his having been abroad during the night. The friar not only his request, but afforded him his own camp-fell in very happily with the dress which had to obtain information concerning the which he had heard mentioned by the Bohemian conversation with the langknecht. The friar, upon many occasions with the busy convent abroad, was the person in the first qualified to afford him the information he but observed, that, as true pilgrims, it his duty of the ladies whom Quentin escorted, to read on the right side of the Marne, by the O Kings, where the blessed relics of Caspar, and Belshazzar, (as the Catholic Church in the eastern Marne who come to Bethlehem's offerings,) had rested as they were transplanted to Cologne, and on which spot they had wrought miracles.

Quentin replied, that the ladies were desirous to observe all the holy stations with the utmost regularity, and would certainly visit that of St. Catherine on going to or returning from Cologne. He had heard reports that the road by the right of the river was at present rendered unsafe by the fury of the furious William de la March.

"Now may Heaven forbid," said the friar, "that the Wild Boar of Ardennes should appear to us as we pass up!—Nevertheless, the ladies will be a good better burnt up, even the chance."

"But it will be no barrier between my ladies and the marauder, should we cross the river, and travel on the right bank," answered the Scot.

"Heaven will protect its own, young man," said the friar; "for it were hard to think that the Kings of yonder blessed city of Cologne, who will not endure that a Jew or Infidel should even enter within the walls of their town, could be oblivious enough to permit their worshippers, coming to their shrine as true pilgrims, to be plundered and abused by such a miscreant dog as this Boar of Ardennes, who is worse than a whole desert of Saracen heathens, and all the ten tribes of Israel to boot."

Whatever reliance Quentin, as a sincere Catholic, was bound to rest upon the special protection of Melchior, Caspar, and Balthasar, he could not but recollect, that the pilgrim habits of the ladies being assumed out of mere earthly policy, he and his charge could scarcely expect their countenance on the present occasion, and therefore resolved, as far as possible, to avoid placing the ladies in any predicament where miraculous interposition might be necessary; whilst, in the simplicity of his good faith, he himself vowed a pilgrimage to the Three Kings of Cologne in his own proper person, provided the simulate design of those over whose safety he was now watching should be permitted by those reasonable and royal as well as sainted personages, to attain the desired effect.

That he might enter into this obligation with all solemnity, he requested the friar to show him into one of the various chapels which opened from the main body of the church of the convent, where, upon his knees, and with sincere devotion, he ratified the vow which he had made internally. The distant sound of the choir, the solemnity of the deep and dead hour which he had chosen for this act of devotion, the effect of the glimmering lamp with which the little Gothic building was illuminated—all contributed to throw Quentin's mind into the state when it most readily acknowledges its human frailty, and seeks that supernatural aid and protection, which, in every worship, must be connected with repentance for past sins, and resolutions of future amendment. That the object of his devotion was misplaced, was not the fault of Quentin; and, its purpose being sincere, we can scarce suppose it unacceptable to the only true Deity, who regards the motives, and not the forms of prayer, and in whose eyes the sincere devotion of a heathen is more estimable than the specious hypocrisy of a Pharisee.

Having commended himself and his helpless companions to the Saints, and to the keeping of Providence, Quentin at length retired to rest, leaving the night much edified by the depth and sincerity of his devotion.

CHAPTER XVIII.

PALESTINE

When many a merry tale and many a song Sounded the rough road, we wish'd the rough road long.
The rough road, then, returning in a round,
Show'd us our enchanted sleep, for all was fairy ground.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

By peep of day Quentin Durward had forsaken his little cell, had roused the sleepy grooms, and, with more than his wonted care, seen that every thing was prepared for the day's journey. Girths and bridles, the horse-furniture, and the shoes of the horses themselves, were carefully inspected with his own eyes, that there might be as little chance as possible of the occurrence of any of those casualties, which, petty as they seem, often interrupt or disconcert travelling. The horses were also, under his own inspection, carefully fed, so as to render them fit for a long day's journey, or, if that should be necessary, for a hasty flight.

Quentin then betook himself to his own chamber, armed himself with unusual care, and belted on his sword with the feeling at once of approaching danger, and of stern determination to dare it to the uttermost. His generous feelings gave him a loftiness of mind and a dignity of manner, which the ladies of the court had not yet observed in him, though they had been highly pleased and interested by the grace, yet naïveté, of his general behaviour and conversation, and the mixture of shrewd intelligence which naturally belonged to him, with the simplicity arising from his secluded education and distant country. He let them understand, that it would be necessary that they should prepare for their journey this morning rather earlier than usual; and, accordingly, they left the convent immediately after a morning repast, for which, as well as the other hospitalities of the House, the ladies made acknowledgment by a donation to the altar, befitting rather their rank than their appearance. But this excited no suspicion, as they were supposed to be Englishwomen; and the attributes of superior wealth attached at that time to the insular character as strongly as in our own day.

The Prior blessed them as they mounted to depart, and congratulated Quentin on the absence of his heathen guide; "for," said the venerable man, "better stumble in the path, than be upheld by the arm of a thief or robber."

Quentin was not quite of his opinion; for, dangerous as he knew the Bohemian to be, he thought he could use his services, and, at the same time, baffo his treasonable purpose, now that he saw clearly to what it tended. But his anxiety upon this subject was soon at an end, for the little cavalcade was not an hundred yards from the monastery and the village, before Maugrabin joined it, riding as usual on his little active and wild-looking jennet. Their road led them along the side of the same brook where Quentin had overheard the mysterious conference of the preceding evening, and Hayraddin had not long rejoined them, ere they passed under the very willow-tree which had afforded Durward the means of concealment, when he became an unsuspected hearer of what then passed betwixt that false guide and the lanknecht.

The recollections which the spot brought back stirred Quentin to enter abruptly into conversation with his guide, whom hitherto he had scarce spoken to.

"Where hast thou found night-quarter, thou profane knave?" said the Scot.

"Your wisdom may guess, by looking on my gaberdine," answered the Bohemian, pointing to his dress, which was covered with the seeds of hay.

"A good haystack," said Quentin, "is a convenient bed for an astrologer, and a much better than a heathen scoffer at our blessed religion, and its ministers, ever deserves."

"It suited my Klepper better than me, though," said Hayraddin, patting his horse on the neck; "for he had food and shelter at the same time. The old bald fools turned him loose, as if a wise man's horse could have infected with wit or sagacity a whole convent of asses. Lucky that Klepper knows my whistle, and follows me as truly as a hound, or we had never met again, and you in your turn might have whistled for a guide."

"I have told thee more than once," said Durward, sternly, "to restrain thy ribaldry when thou chancest to be in worthy men's company, a thing which, I believe, hath rarely happened to thee in thy life before now; and I promise thee, that, did I hold thee as faithless a guide as I esteem thee a blasphemous and worthless carter, my Scottish dirk and thy heathenish heart had ere now been acquainted, although the doing such a deed were as ignoble as the sticking of swine."

"A wild boar is near akin to a sow," said the Bohemian, without flinching from the sharp look with which Quentin regarded him, or altering in the slightest degree, the caustic indifference which he affected in his language; "and many men," he subjoined, "find both pride, pleasure, and profit, in sticking them."

Astonished at the man's ready confidence, and uncertain whether he did not know more of his own history and feelings than was pleasant for him to converse upon, Quentin broke off a conversation in which he had gained no advantage over Maugrabin, and fell back to his accustomed post beside the ladies.

We have already observed, that a considerable degree of familiarity had begun to establish itself between them. The elder Countess treated him (being once well assured of the nobility of his birth) like a favoured equal; and though her name showed her regard to their protector less freely, yet, under every disadvantage of bashfulness and timidity, Quentin thought he could plainly perceive, that his company and conversation were not by any means indifferent to her.

Nothing gives such life and soul to youthful gaiety as the consciousness that it is successfully received; and Quentin had accordingly, during the former period of their journey, amused his fair charge with the levity of his conversation, and the songs and tales of his country, the former of which he sang in his native language, while his efforts to render the latter into his foreign and imperfect French, gave rise to a hundred little mistakes and errors of speech, as diverting as the narratives themselves. But on this anxious morning, he rode beside the ladies of Croy without any of his usual attempts to amuse them, and they could not help observing his silence as something remarkable.

"Our young companion has seen a wolf," said the Lady Hameline, alluding to an ancient superstition, "and he has lost his tongue in consequence."

"To say I had tracked a fox were nearer the mark," thought Quentin, but gave the reply no utterance.

"Are you well, Seigneur Quentin?" said the Countess Isabella in a tone of interest at which she herself blushed, while she felt that it was something more than the distance between them warranted.

"He hath set up carousing with the jolly friars," said the Lady Hameline; "the Scots are like the Germans, who spend all their north over the Rhine-"well, and bring only their staggering steps to the dance in the evening, and their aching heads to the ladies' bowers in the morning."

"Nay, gentle ladies," said Quentin, "I deserve not your reproach. The good friars were at their devotions almost all night; and for myself, my drink was barely a cup of their thinnest and most ordinary wine."

"It is the badness of his fare that has put him out of humour," said the Countess Isabella. "Cheer up, Seigneur Quentin, and should we ever visit my ancient Castle of Bracquemont together, if I myself should stand your cup-bearer, and hand it to you, you shall have a generous cup of wine, that the like never grew upon the vines of Hochheim or Johannisberg."

"A glass of water, noble lady, from your hand"—Thus far did Quentin begin, but his voice trembled, and Isabella continued, as if she had been sensible of the tenderness of the allusion upon the personal pronoun.

"The wine was stocked in the deep vaults of Bracquemont, by my great-grandfather the Rhinegrave Godfrey," said the Countess Isabella.

"Who won the hand of her great-grandmother," interrupted the Lady Hameline, interrupting her name, "by proving himself the best man of chivalry, at the great tournament of Strachburg—ten knights were slain in the lists. But those days are over, and no one now thinks of encountering peril for the sake of honour, or to relieve distressed beauty."

To this speech, which was made in the tone in which a modern beauty, whose charms are rather on the wane, may be heard to condemn the rudeness of the present age, Quentin took upon him to reply "that there was no lack of that chivalry which the Lady Hameline seemed to consider as extinct, and that were it raised every where else, it would still glow in the bosoms of the Scottish gentlemen."

"Hear him?" said the Lady Hameline; "he would have us believe, that in his cold and dark country still lives the noble fire which has departed in France and Germany! The poor youth is like a Norse mountaineer, mad with partiality to his native land—he will not tell us of the vines and olives of Scotland."

"No, madam," said Durward; "of the wine and the oil of our mountains I can say little, more than that our swords can compel these rich provinces, to tribute from our wealthier neighbours. But for the unblemished faith and unfaded honour of Scotland, I must now put to the proof how far you can repose trust in them, however mean the individual who can offer nothing more as a pledge of your safety."

"You speak mysteriously—you know of some danger and present danger," said the Lady Hameline.

"I have read it in his eye for this hour past," exclaimed the Lady Isabella, clasping her hands. "Herald Varma, what will become of us?"

"Nothing, I hope, but what you would deem," answered Durward. "Are now I am compelled to ask—Gentle ladies, can you trust me?"

"Trust you?" answered the Countess Hameline—"certainly—But why the question? Or how far do you ask our confidence?"

"I, on my part," said the Countess Isabella, "use you implicitly, and without condition. If you can serve us, Quentin, I will no more look for truth, ere in Heaven."

"Gentle lady," replied Durward, highly gratified, "you do me but justice. My object is to alter course by proceeding directly by the left bank of the Rhine-Lahn, instead of crossing at Namur. The plan from the order assigned by King Louis, and the instructions given to the guide. But I heard among the monastery of marauders on the right bank of the Moselle, and of the march of Burgundian soldiers to suppress them. Both circumstances alarm me for your safety. Have I your permission so far to deviate from the route of your journey?"

"My ample and full permission," answered the younger lady.

"Cousin," said the Lady Hameline, "I believe not you, that the youth seems us well; but looking on we transgress the instructions of King Louis, as previously stated."

"And why should we regard his instructions?" said the Lady Isabella. "I am, I thank Heaven for it, no subject of his, and, as a suppliant, he has thus the confidence he induced me to repose in him. I would not dishonour this young gentleman by supposing his words for an instant against the wisdom of a prudent crafty and selfish design."

"Now may I lead blessing for that very word, lady," said Quentin, smiling, "and if I deserve not to trust your wisdom, tearing with wild horses in the field, and eternal tortures in the next, were I not to pay for my desert."

So saying, he spurred his horse, and rejoined the Bohemians. This worthy seemed of a remarkable temper, if not a forgiving temper. Injury or insult never dwelt, or at least seemed not to dwell, on his recollection; and he entered into the conversation which Durward presently commenced, just as if there had been no unkindly word betwixt them in the course of the morning.

"The dog," thought the Scot, "dares not now, because he intends to clear scores with me at once for ever, when he can catch me by the very throat; but we will try for once whether we cannot find a tor at his own weapons.—Honest Hayreddin," he said, "thou hast travelled with us for ten days, and hast never shown us a specimen of your old fortune-telling; which you are, nevertheless, so fond of practising, that you must needs display your gift every convent at which we stop, at the risk of being repaid by a night's lodging under a boys' coat."

"You have never asked me for a specimen of my skill," said the gypsy. "You are like the rest of the world, contented to ridicule those mysteries which they do not understand."

"Give me then a present proof of your skill," said Quentin, and, unloving his hand, he laid it on the Zingaro.

Hayreddin carefully regarded all the lines which crossed each other on the Scotchman's palm, and noted, with equally scrupulous attention, the language or swellings at the roots of the fingers, which were then believed as necessarily connected with the disposition, habits, and fortune of the individual; the organs of the brain are presumed to be in or out of tune.

"Here is a hand," said Hayraddin, "which speaks toils endured, and dangers encountered. I read in an early acquaintance with the hilt of the sword; and yet some acquaintance also with the clasps of the book."

"This of my past life you may have learned elsewhere," said Quentin; "tell me something of the future."

"This line from the hill of Venus," said the Bohemian, "not broken off abruptly, but attending and accompanying the line of life, argues a certain and great fortune by marriage, whereby the party shall be used among the wealthy and the noble by the influence of successful love."

"Such promises you make to all who ask your advice," said Quentin; "they are part of your art."

"What I tell you is as certain," said Hayraddin, "as that you shall in a brief space be menaced with mighty danger; which I infer from this bright blood-line cutting the table-line transversely, and indicating stroke of sword, or other violence, from which you shall only be saved by the attachment of a faithful friend."

"Thyself, ha?" said Quentin, somewhat indignant at the chiromantist should thus practise on his credulity, and endeavour to found a reputation by predicting the consequences of his own treachery.

"My art," replied the Zingaro, "tells me nought at concerns myself."

"In this, then, the seers of my land," said Quentin, "excel your boasted knowledge; for their skill teaches them the dangers by which they are themselves beset. I left not my hills without having felt a portion of the subtle vision with which their inhabitants are gifted; and I will give thee a proof of it, in exchange for thy specimen of palmistry. Hayraddin, the danger which threatens me lies on the right bank of the river—I will avoid it by travelling to Liege on the left bank."

The guide listened with an apathy, which, knowing the circumstances in which Maugrabin stood, Quentin could not by any means comprehend. "If you accomplish your purpose," was the Bohemian's reply, "the dangerous crisis will be transferred from our lot to mine."

"I thought," said Quentin, "that you said but now, that you could not presage your own fortune?"

"Not in the manner in which I have but now told you," answered Hayraddin; "but it requires the knowledge of Louis of Valois, to presage that he will hang your guide, because your pleasure was to deviate from the road which he recommended."

"The attaining with safety the purpose of the journey, and ensuring its happy termination," said Quentin, "must atone for a deviation from the exact line of the prescribed route."

"Ay," replied the Bohemian, "if you are sure that the King had in his own eye the same termination of his pilgrimage which he insinuated to you."

"And of what other termination is it possible that he could have been meditating? or why should you suppose he had any purpose in his thought, other than was avowed in his direction?" inquired Quentin.

"Simply," replied the Zingaro, "that those who know aught of the Most Christian King, are aware, that the purpose about which he is most anxious, is always that which he is least willing to declare. Let our gracious Louis send twelve embassies, and I will forfeit my neck to the gallows a year before it is due, if in eleven of them there is not something at the bottom of the ink-horn more than the pen has written in the letters of credence."

"I regard not your foul suspicions," answered Quentin; "my duty is plain and peremptory—to convey these ladies in safety to Liege; and I take it on me to think that I best discharge that duty in changing our prescribed route, and keeping the left side of the river Maes. It is likewise the direct road to Liege. By crossing the river, we should lose time, and incur danger, to no purpose—Wherefore should we do so?"

"Only because pilgrims, as they call themselves, destined for Cologne," said Hayraddin, "do not usually descend the Maes so low as Liege; and that the route of the ladies will be accounted contradictory of their professed destination."

"If we are challenged on that account," said Quentin, "we will say that alarms of the wicked Duke of Gueldres, or of William de la Marck, or of the Ecorcheurs and lanzknechts, on the right side of the river, justify our holding by the left, instead of our intended route."

"As you will, my good seignior," replied the Bohemian—"I am, for my part, equally ready to guide you down the left as down the right side of the Maes—Your excuse to your master you must make out for yourself."

Quentin, although rather surprised, was at the same time pleased with the ready, or at least the unrepugnant acquiescence of Hayraddin in their change of route, for he needed his assistance as a guide, and yet had feared that the disconcerting of his intended act of treachery would have driven him to extremity. Besides, to expel the Bohemian from their society, would have been the ready mode to bring down William de la Marck, with whom he was in correspondence, upon their intended route; whereas, if Hayraddin remained with them, Quentin thought he could manage to prevent the Moor from having any communication with strangers, unless he was himself aware of it.

Abandoning, therefore, all thoughts of their original route, the little party followed that by the left bank of the broad Maes, so speedily and successfully, that the next day early brought them to the purposed end of their journey. They found that the Bishop of Liege, for the sake of his health, as he himself alleged, but rather, perhaps, to avoid being surprised by the numerous and mutinous population of the city, had established his residence in his beautiful Castle of Schonwaldt, about a mile without Liege.

Just as they approached the Castle, they saw the Prelate returning in long procession from the neighbouring city, in which he had been officiating at the performance of High Mass. He was at the head of a splendid train of religious, civil, and military men, mingled together, or, as the old ballad-maker expresses it,

"With many a cross-bearer before,
And many a spear behind."

The procession made a noble appearance, as, winding along the verdant banks of the broad Maes, it wheeled into, and was as it were, devoured by, the huge Gothic portal of the Episcopal residence.

But when the party came more near, they found that circumstances around the Castle argued a doubt and sense of insecurity, which contradicted that display of pomp and power which they had just witnessed. Strong guards of the Bishop's soldiers were heedfully maintained all around the mansion and its immediate vicinity; and the prevailing appearances in an ecclesiastical residence, seemed to argue a sense of danger in the reverend Prelate, who found it necessary thus to surround himself with all the defensive precautions of war. The ladies of Croye, when announced by Quentin, were reverently ushered into the great Hall, where they met with the most cordial reception from the Bishop, who met them there at the head of his little Court. He would not permit them to kiss his hand, but welcomed them with a salute, which had something in it of gallantry on the part of a prince to fine women, and something also of the holy affection of a pastor to the sisters of his flock.

Louis of Bourbon, the reigning Bishop of Liege, was in truth a generous and kind-hearted prince; whose life had not indeed been always confined, with precise strictness, within the bounds of his clerical profession; but who, notwithstanding, had uniformly maintained the frank and honourable character of the House of Bourbon, from which he was descended.

In later times, as age advanced, the Prelate had adopted habits more becoming a member of the hierarchy than his early reign had exhibited, and was loved among the neighbouring princes, as a noble ecclesiastic, generous and magnificent in his ordinary mode of life, though preserving no very ascetic severity of character, and governing with an easy indifference, which, amid his wealthy and mutinous subjects,

The Bishop was so fast an ally of the Duke of Burgundy that the latter claimed almost a joint sovereignty in his bishopric, and repaid the good natured ease with which the Prelate admitted claims which he might easily have disputed, by taking his part on all occasions, with the determined and furious zeal which was a part of his character. He used to say, he considered Liège as his own, the Bishop as his brother, (indeed they might be accounted such, in consequence of the Duke having married for his first wife, the Bishop's sister) and that he who annoyed Louis of Bourbon, had to do with Charles of Burgundy, a threat which, considering the character and the power of the prince who used it, would have been powerful with any but the rich and discontented city of Liège, where much wealth had, according to the ancient proverb, made its way.

The Prelate, as we have said, assured the Ladies of Croye of such intervention as his interest at the Court of Burgundy, and to the uttermost, might gain for them, and which, he hoped, might be the more effectual, as Campo-Basso, from some late discomfiture, stood rather lower than formerly in the Duke's personal favour. He promised them also such protection as it was in his power to afford, but the sigh with which he gave the warrant, seemed to show that his power was more precarious than it would be willing to admit.

"At every event, my dearest daughters," said the Bishop, with an air in which, as in his previous replies, a mixture of spiritualunction qualified the hereditary gallantry of the House of Bourbon, "Heaven forbid I should abandon the lamb to the wicked wolf, or noble ladies to the oppression of foreigners. I am a man of peace, though my shade now rings with arms, but be assured I will care for your safety as for my own, and should matters become yet more distracted here, which, with our Lady's grace, we trust will be rather purified than inflamed, we will provide for your self-conduct to Germany, for not even the will of our brother and protector Charles of Burgundy shall prevail with us to dispose of you to any respect contrary to your own inclinations. We cannot comply with your request of sending you to a convent; for, alas! such is the influence of the name of Liège among the inhabitants of Liège, that we know no retreat to which our authority extends, beyond the bounds of our own castle, and the protection of our soldiery. But here you are most welcome, and your train shall have all honourable entertainment, especially this youth, whom you recommend so particularly to our countenance, and on whom in especial we bestow our blessing."

Quentin bowed, as in duty bound, to receive the Episcopal benediction.

"For yourselves," proceeded the good Prelate, "you shall reside here with my sister Isabella, a Canoness of Trèves, and with whom you may dwell in all honour even under the roof of no gay a bachelor as the Bishop of Liège."

He gallantly conducted the ladies to his sister's apartment, as he concluded the harangue of welcome, and his Master of the Household, an officer, who, having taken Deacon's orders, held something between a secular and ecclesiastical character, entertained Quentin with the hospitality which his master enjoyed, while the other personages of the retinue of the Ladies of Croye were committed to the inferior departments.

In this arrangement Quentin could not help remarking, that the presence of the Bohemian, so much objected to in country convents, seemed, in the household of this wealthy, and perhaps we might say worldly prelate, to attract neither objection nor remark.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE CITY.

Good things, sweet things, let me not see you go To any maiden not of mine! — Julius Cæsar

Separated from the Lady Isabella, whose looks had been for so many days his food and drink, Quentin felt a strange vacancy and chilliness of the heart, which he had not yet experienced in any of the vicissitudes to which his life had subjected him. No doubt the cessation of the close and unavailing intimacy and intimacy between them was the necessary consequence of the Countess having obtained a place of settled her residence, but, under what pretext could she, had she meditated such an inappropriately have had a gallant young squire, such as Quentin, in constant attendance upon her?

But the shock of the separation was not the more welcome that it seemed unavoidable, and the good heart of Quentin swelled at finding he was parted with like an ordinary position, or an escort whom duty is discharged, while his eyes sympathized so far as to drop a secret tear or two over the ruin of all those airy castles, so many of which he had employed himself in constructing during their too interesting journey. He made a manly but, at first a vain effort, to throw off this mental despondency, and in, yielding to the feelings he could not suppress, he sat him down in one of the deep recesses formed by a window which lighted the great Gothic hall of Schonwaldt, and there seated upon his hard fustian, which had not assigned him rank or wealth sufficient to procure him a darning suit.

Quentin tried to dissipate the sadness which overtook him by dispatching Charlot, one of the valets, with letters to the court of Liège, announcing the arrival of the Ladies of Croye at Liège. At length by natural buoyancy of temper returned, much excited by the tale of an old remount which had been just pointed at Strachouse, and which lay beside him in the window, the tale of which was forth.

Loves the King's daughter of Burgundy)*

While he was tracing the "letters black" of the ditty so congenial to his own situation, Quentin was interrupted by a touch on the shoulder, and looking up, beheld the Bohemian standing by him.

Hayraddin, never a welcome sight, was absent from his late treachery and Quentin sternly asked him, why he dared to take the freedom to touch a Christian and a gentleman.

"Singer," answered the Bohemian, "because I wished to know if the Christian gentleman had lost his feeling as well as his eyes and ears. I have stood speaking to you these five minutes, and you have stared on that scrap of yellow paper, as if it were a spell to turn you into a statue, and had almost wrought half its purpose."

"Well, what dost thou want? Speak, and be gone!"

"I want what all men want, though few are satisfied with it," said Hayraddin; "I want my due, my ten crowns of gold for guiding the ladies hither."

"With what face darrest thou ask any guardian beyond my opening thy worthless life?" said Quentin, fiercely, "thou knowest that it was thy purpose to have betrayed them on the road."

"But I did not betray them," said Hayraddin; "if I had, I would have asked no pardon from you or from them, but from him whom thou keepst upon the right hand side of the tree might have benefited. The party that I have served is the party who must pay me."

"Thy guardian perish with thee, then, traitor!" said Quentin, holding out the money. "Get thee to the Host of Ardennes, or to the devil! but have I after out of my sight, lest I send thee thither before thy time."

"The Host of Ardennes?" repeated the Bohemian, with a stronger emotion of surprise than he feignedly expressed, "it was then no vain guess—no general supposition, which made you insist on changing the road? Can it be—are there really in other lands acts of treachery more sure than those of our wondrous tribes? The willow tree under which we spoke would tell no tales. But no—no—Dull that I was! I have it—I have it!—The willow by the brook near your convent—I saw you look towards it as you passed it, about half a mile from your tree of dragons—that could not indeed speak, but it might do one who could hear? I will hold my sword on open plain barefornth; not a bunch of thistle all be near me for a Scot to shroud amongst—Ha! I the best hath best the Zingaro at his own subtle game. But know, Quentin Durward, that you've fooled me to the marring of mine own fortune. You! the fortune I told thee of, from the line on y' hand, had been richly accomplished but for thine obstinacy."

"By Saint Andrew," said Quentin, "thy impudence makes me laugh in spite of myself—How, in what, should thy successful rascality have been service to me? I heard, indeed, that you did promise to save my life, which resolution your wily affairs would speedily have forgotten, had we not come to blows—but in what thy betrayal of one lad could have served me, but by exposing me to death or captivity, is a matter beyond human guess to conjecture."

"No matter thinking of it, then," said Reynaldin, "for I guess still to surprise you with my gratitude. As you kept back my horse I should have held that I were quit, and had left you to your own foolish scheme. As it is I leave your debtor for reader either on the banks of the river."

"Mistaken I have already taken out the payment—paying and showing thee," said Quentin.

"Hard words, as I said once," said the Zingaro, "but not words which make no weight in the balance. Had you struck me, indeed, instead of thrusting—"

"I am likely enough to take out payment in that way, if you provoke me longer."

"I would not advise it," said the Zingaro; "such payment, made by a rash hand, might exceed the debt, and unhappily leave a balance on your side, which I am not one to forget or forgive. And now, farewell, but not for a long space—I go to bid adieu to the Ladies of Croys."

"Then?" said Quentin in astonishment—"then he limited to the presence of the ladies, and here, where of any in a manner reclines under the protection of the Bishop's men, a noble canoness? It is impossible."

"Marathon, however, waits to conduct me to their residence," said the Zingaro, with a sneer; "and I must beg your forgiveness if I leave you something abruptly."

He turned as if to depart, but instantly coming back, said, with a tone of deep and serious emphasis, "I know your hopes—they are daring, yet not vain. I said them—I know your fears—they should teach caution, not timidity. Every woman may be won. Count is but a nickname, which will best fit Quentin as well as the other nickname of duke buffis Charles, or that of king heeds Louis."

But Durward could reply, the Bohemian had left no hall. Quentin instantly followed; but, better acquainted than the Scot with the passages of the castle, Reynaldin kept the advantage which he had often, and the pursuer lost sight of him as he descended a small back staircase. Still Durward followed, though without exact consciousness of his own purpose in doing so. The staircase terminated in a door opening into the alley of a garden, in which he again beheld the Zingaro hastening down a back wall.

On two sides, the garden was surrounded by the buildings of the castle—a huge old pile, partly crenellated, and partly resembling an ecclesiastical building; on the other two sides, the castle was a high crenellated wall. Crossing the alleys of the garden, another part of the building, where a postern-door opened behind a large massive buttress overgrown with ivy, Reynaldin looked back, and waved his hand in signal of an exulting farewell to his follower, who saw that in effect the postern-door was opened by Marathon, and that the vile Bohemian was admitted into the precincts, as he naturally concluded, of the apartment of the Countess of Croys. Quentin, as he saw with indignation, and blamed himself severely that he had not made the ladies sensible of the full infamy of Reynaldin's character, and associated with the machinations against their safety.

The arrogant manner which the Bohemian had presumed to back his suit, added to his anger and his disgust, and he felt as if even the hand of the Countess Isabelle would be profaned, were it possible to attain it by such patronage. "But it is all a deception," he said—"a turn of his brain juggling artifice. He has procured access to those ladies upon some false pretence, and with some mischievous intention. It is well I have learned where they lodge. I will watch Marathon, and select an interview with them, were it but to place them on their guard. It is hard that I must use artifice and brush delay, when such as he have admittance openly and without scruple. They shall find, however, that though I am excluded from their presence, Isabelle's safety is still the chief subject of my vigilance."

While the young lover was thus meditating, an aged gentleman of the Bishop's household approached him from the same door by which he had himself entered the garden, and made him aware, though with the greatest civility of manner, that the garden was private, and reserved only for the use of the Bishop, and guests of the very highest distinction.

Quentin heard him repeat this information twice, as he put the proper construction upon it; and then, starting as from a reverie, he bowed, and hurried out of the garden, the official person following him all the way, and overwhelming him with formal apologies for the necessary discharge of his duty. Nay, so pertinacious was he in his attempts to remove the offence which he conceived Durward to have taken, that he offered to borrow his own company upon him, to contribute to his entertainment; until Quentin, internally cursing his formal stupidity, found no better way of escape, than pretending a desire of visiting the neighbouring city, and setting off thither at such a round pace as speedily subdued all desire in the gentleman-usher to accompany him farther than the draw-bridge. In a few minutes, Quentin was within the walls of the city of Liège, then one of the richest in Flanders, and of course in the world.

Melancholy, even love-melancholy, is not so deeply seated, at least in minds of a manly and elastic character, as the soft enthusiasts who suffer under it are fond of believing. It yields to unexpected and striking impressions upon the senses, to change of place, to such scenes as create new trains of association, and to the influence of the busy hum of mankind. In a few minutes, Quentin's attention was as much engrossed by the variety of objects presented in rapid succession by the busy streets of Liège, as if there had never been a Countess Isabelle, nor a Bohemian, in the world.

The lofty houses,—the stately, though narrow and gloomy streets,—the splendid display of the richest goods and most gorgeous armour in the warehouses and shops around,—the walks crowded by busy citizens of every description, passing and repassing with airs of careful importance or eager bustle,—the huge marts, which transported to and fro the subjects of export and import, the former consisting of broad benches and seats, arms of all kinds, nails and iron work, while the latter comprehended every article of use or luxury, intended either for the consumption of an opulent city, or received in barter, and destined to be transported elsewhere,—all these objects combined to form an engrossing picture of wealth, bustle, and splendour, to which Quentin had been hitherto a stranger. He admired also the various streams and canals, drawn from and communicated with the Meuse, which, traversing the city in various directions, offered to every quarter the commercial facilities of water carriage, and he failed not to hear a mass in the venerable old Church of Saint Lambert, said to have been founded in the eighth century.

It was upon leaving this place of worship that Quentin began to observe, that he, who had been hitherto gazing on all around him with the eagerness of unrestrained curiosity, was himself the object of attention to several groups of substantial-looking burghers, who seemed assembled to look upon him as he left the church, and amongst whom arose a buzz and whisper, which spread from one party to another; while the number of groups continued to segment rapidly, and the eyes of each who added to it were eagerly directed to Quentin, with a stare which expressed much interest and curiosity, mingled with a certain degree of respect.

At length he now formed the centre of a considerable crowd, which yet yielded before him while he continued to move forward; while those who followed or kept pace with him, studiously avoided pressing on him, or impeding his motions. Yet his situation was too embarrassing to be long endured, without making some attempt to extricate himself, and to obtain some explanation.

Quentin looked around him, and fixing upon a jolly, stout-made, respectable man, whom, by his velvet cloak and gold chain, he concluded to be a burgher of eminence, and perhaps a magistrate, he asked him, "Whether he saw any thing particular in his appearance, to attract public attention in a degree so unusual? or whether it was the ordinary custom of the people of Liège thus to throng around strangers who chanced to visit their city?"

"Surely not, good seignior," answered the burgher; "the Liégeois are neither so idly curious as to practise such a custom, nor is there any thing in your dress or appearance, saving that which is most welcome to this city, and which our townsmen are both delighted to see, and desirous to honour."

"Thus sounds very polite, worthy sir," said Quentin; "but by the Cross of Saint Andrew, I cannot even guess at your meaning."

"Your oath, sir," answered the merchant of Liège, "as well as your accent, convinces me that we are right in our conjecture."

"By my patron Saint Quentin?" said Durward, "I am farther off from your meaning than ever."

"There again now," rejoined the Liégeois, looking, as he spoke, most provokingly, yet most civilly, politic and intelligent.—"It is surely not for us to see that which you, worthy seignior, deem it proper to conceal. But why swear by Saint Quentin, if you would not have me construe your meaning?—We know the good Count of Saint Paul, who lies there at present, wishes well to our cause."

"On my life," said Quentin, "you are under some delusion. I know nothing of Saint Paul."

"Nay, we question you not," said the burgher; "although, hark ye—I say, hark in your ear—my name is Pavillon."

"And what is my business with that, Seignior Pavillon?" said Quentin.

"Nay, nothing—only methinks it might satisfy you that I am trustworthy—Here is my colleague Rouslact, too."

Rouslact advanced, a corpulent dignitary, whose fair round belly, like a battering-ram, "did shake the press before him," and who, whispering caution to his neighbour, said, in a tone of rebuke—"You forget, good colleague, the place is too open—the seignior will retire to your house or mine, and drink a glass of Rhenish and sugar, and then we shall hear more of our good friend and ally, whom we love with all our honest Flemish hearts."

"I have no news for any of you," said Quentin, impatiently; "I will drink no Rhenish; and I only desire of you, as men of account and respectability, to disperse this idle crowd, and allow a stranger to leave your town as quietly as he came into it."

"Nay, then, sir," said Rouslact, "since you stand so much on your incognito, and with us, too, who are men of confidence, let me ask you roundly, wherefore wear you the badge of your company if you would remain unknown in Liège?"

"What badge, and what order?" said Quentin; "you look like reverend men and grave citizens, yet, on my soul, you are either mad yourselves, or desire to drive me so."

"Sapement!" said the other burgher, "this youth would make Saint Lambert swear! Why, who wear bonnets with the Saint Andrew's cross and fleur-de-lis, save the Scottish Archers of King Louis's Guards?"

"And supposing I am an Archer of the Scottish Guard, why should you make a wonder of my wearing the badge of my company?" said Quentin, impatiently.

"He has avowed it, he has avowed it!" said Rouslact and Pavillon, turning to the assembled burghers in attitudes of congratulation, with waving arms, extended palms, and large round faces radiating with glee. "He hath avowed himself an Archer of Louis's Guard—of Louis, the guardian of the liberties of Liège!"

A general shout and cry now arose from the multitude, in which were mingled the various sounds of "Long live Louis of France! Long live the Scottish Guard! Long live the valiant Archer! Our liberties, our privileges, or death! No imposts! Long live the valiant Boer of Ardenne! Down with Charles of Burgundy! and confusion to Bourbon and his bishopric!"

Half-stunned by the noise, which began anew in one quarter so soon as it ceased in another, rising and falling like the billows of the sea, and augmented by thousands of voices which roared in chorus from distant streets and market places, Quentin had yet time to form a conjecture concerning the meaning of the tumult, and a plan for regulating his own conduct.

He had forgotten that, after his skirmish with Orleans and Dunois, one of his comrades had, in Lord Crawford's command, replaced the morris, cloven by the sword of the latter, with one of the steel-lined bonnets, which formed a part of the proper and well known equipment of the Scottish Guards. That an individual of this body, which was always kept very close to Louis's person, should have appeared in the streets of a city, whose civil dissensions had been aggravated by the agents of that King, was naturally enough interpreted by the burghers of Liège into a determination on the part of Louis openly to assist their cause; and the appearance of an individual archer was magnified into a pledge of immediate and active support from Louis—say, into an assurance that his auxiliary forces were actually entering the town at one or other, though no one could distinctly tell which, of the city-gates.

To remove a conviction so generally adopted, Quentin easily saw was impossible—nay, that any attempt to undeceive men so obstinately prepossessed in their belief, would be attended with personal risk, which, in this case, he saw little use of incurring. He therefore hastily resolved to temporize, and to get free the best way he could; and this resolution he formed while they were in the act of conducting him to the Stadthaus, where the notables of the town were fast assembling, in order to hear the tidings which he was presumed to have brought, and to regale him with a splendid banquet.

In spite of all his opposition, which was set down to modesty, he was on every side surrounded by the donors of popularity, the unassuming tide of which now floated around him. His two burgher friends, who were Schoppen, or Syndics of the city, had made fast both his arms. Before him, Nikke Blok, the chief of the butcher's incorporation, hastily summoned from his office in the shambles, brandished his death doing axe, yet smeared with blood and brains, with a courage and grace which braver alone could inspire. Behind him came the tall, lean, raw boned, very drunk, and very patriotic figure of Claus Hammerkin, president of the mystery of the workers in iron, and followed by at least a thousand unwashed artificers of his class. Weavers, nailers, ropemakers, artisans of every degree and calling thronged forward to join the procession from every gloomy and narrow street. Escape seemed a desperate and impossible adventure.

In this dilemma, Quentin appealed to Rouslact, who held one arm, and to Pavillon, who had secured the other, and who were conducting him forward at the head of the ovation, of which he had so unexpectedly become the principal object. He hastily acquainted them "with his having thoughtfully adopted the bonnet of the Scottish Guard, on an accident having occurred to the broad-pike in which he had proposed to travel, he regretted that, owing to this circumstance, and the sharp wit with which the Liégeois drew the natural inference of his quality and the purpose of his visit, these things had been abjectly discovered; and he intimated, that, if just now conducted to the Stadthouse, he might un-supply find himself under the necessity of communicating to the assembled notables certain matters, which he was directed by the King to reserve for the secret care of his excellent pumps, Mannheim House-or and Pavilion of Lagny.

This last hint operated like magic on the two citizens, who were the most distinguished leaders of the surly burghers, and were, like all demagogues of our kind, desirous to keep every thing within their own management, as far as possible. They therefore hastily agreed that Quentin should leave the town for the time, and return by night to Lagny, and converse with them privately in the house of Rouver, near the gate opposite to Schonwaldt. Quentin refused not to tell them, that he was at present residing in the Bishop's palace, under pretence of writing despatches from the French Court, although a real error was, as they had well conjectured, signed to the citizens of Lagny; and this tortuous mode of conducting a communication, as well as the respect and rank of the person to whom it was proposed to be intrusted, was an argument to the respect of Lagny, as neither to excite doubt nor surprise.

Almost immediately after this interview was completed, the progress of the multitude brought him opposite to the door of Pavillon's house, in one the principal streets, but which communicated one behind with the Mass, by means of a garden, as well as an extensive manufactory of tan-pots and her conveniences for dressing hides; for the peculiar burgher was a skin-dresser, or currier.

It was natural that Pavillon should desire to do a honour to his dwelling to the supposed envoy of the king, and a halt before his house excited no surprise on the part of the multitude; who, on the contrary, greeted Mannheim Pavillon with a loud shout, as a warrior in his distinguished gear. Quentin coolly had said his remarkable honest, for the cap a skin-maker, and flung a cloak over his other apparel. Pavillon then furnished him with a pasport to pass the gates of the city, and to return by night or day as should suit his convenience; and, finally, committed him to the charge of his daughter.

His kind smiling French look, with instructions over he was to be disposed of, while he himself hastened back to his colleagues, to assume their friends at the Stadthouse, with the best excuse which they could suggest for the disappearance of King Louis's body. We cannot, as the footman says in the play, without the exact nature of the lie which the Bohemian told the flock; but no task is so easy as out of unassuming upon a multitude whose eager predilects have more than half done the business, one or impostor has spoken a word.

The worthy burgher was no sooner gone, than his lump daughter, Trudchen, with many a blush, and many a wreathed smile, which suited very prettily her fine like cherries, laughing blue eyes, and a skin temperately pure, escorted the handsome stranger through the ploughed alleys of the Sieur Pavillon's garden, down to the water-side, and there saw him duly embarked in a boat, which two stout Flemings, their trunk-horn, fur caps, and many-buttoned shoes, had got in readiness with as much haste as the low-country nature would permit.

As the pretty Trudchen spoke nothing but German, Quentin, — no disparagement to his loyal affection to the Countess of Croy, — could only express his thanks by a kiss on those same cherry lips, which was very slightly bestowed, and accepted with all modest reserve; for gallants with a form and face like our Bohemian Archer, were not of every-day occurrence among the burghers of Lagny.

* The adventure of Quentin at Lagny may be thought over-stated, but it is extraordinary what slight circumstances will influence the public mind in a moment of doubt and uncertainty.
 It is not random guess or surmise that, when the Duke was the object of rising against the French king, that and his country received a strong opinion from the landing of a person in a British volunteer-uniform, whose presence, though that of a single individual, was received as a guarantee of success.

While the boat was rowed up the sluggish waters of the Mass, and passed the defences of the town, Quentin had time enough to reflect what account he ought to give of his adventure in Lagny, when he returned to the Bishop's palace of Schonwaldt; and desisting alike to betray any person who had reposed confidence in him, — though by misapprehension, or to conceal from the hospitable Prelate the mutinous state of his capital, he resolved to confine himself to no general account as might put the Bishop upon his guard, while it should point out no individual to his vengeance.

He was landed from the boat, within half a mile of the castle, and rewarded his rowers with a guilder, to the great satisfaction. Yet, short as was the space which divided him from Schonwaldt, the castle-bell had tolled for dinner, and Quentin found, moreover, that he had approached the castle on a different side from that of the principal entrance, and that to go round would throw his arrival considerably later.
 He, therefore, made straight towards the side that was nearest him, as he discerned that it presented an embattled wall, probably that of the little garden already noticed, with a postern opening upon the moat, and a skiff moored by the postern, which might serve, he thought, upon emergency, to pass him over. As he approached, in hopes to make his entrance this way, the postern opened, a man came out, and, jumping into the boat, made his way to the farther side of the moat, and then with a long pole, pushed the skiff back towards the place where he had embarked. As he came near Quentin discerned that this person was the Bohemian, who, avoiding him, as was not difficult, held a different path towards Lagny, and was presently out of his ken.

Here was new subject for meditation. Had this vagabond heathen been all this while with the Ladies of Croy; and for what purpose should they so far have crept with them with their presence? Tormented with this thought, Durward became doubly determined to seek an explanation with them, for the purpose at once of laying bare the treachery of Hayradden, and announcing to them the perilous state in which their protector, the Bishop, was placed, by the mutinous state of his town of Lagny.

As Quentin thus resolved, he entered the castle by the principal gate, and found that part of the family who assembled for dinner in the great hall, including the Bishop's attendant clergy, officers of the household and strangers below the rank of the very first nobility were already placed at their meal. A seat at the upper end of the board, had, however, been reserved beside the Bishop's domestic chaplain, who welcomed the stranger with the old college jest of, Sive comestis sive non, while he took care so to load his plate with dainties, as to take away all appearance of that tendency to rakety, which in Quentin's country, is said to render a joke either no joke, or at best an unsupportable one.

In vindicating himself from the suspicion of ill-breeding, Quentin briefly described the tumult which had been occasioned in the city by his being discovered to belong to the Scottish Archer-guard of Louis, and endeavoured to give a ludicrous turn to the narrative by saying, that he had been with difficulty extricated by a fat burgher of Lagny and his pretty daughter.

But the company were too much interested in the story to taste the jest. All operations of the table were suspended while Quentin told his tale; and when he had ceased, there was a solemn pause, which was broken by the Major-Domo saying, in a low and melancholy tone, "I would to God that we saw these hundred lances of Burgundy!"

"Why should you think so deeply on it?" said Quentin. "You have many soldiers here, whose trade is arms; and your antagonists are only the rabble of a disorderly city, who will fly before the first flutter of a banner with men-at-arms arrayed beneath it."

"You do not know the men of Lagny," said the Chaplain, "of whom it may be said, that, not even excepting those of Ghent, they are at once the fier-est and most honest (most just) in the land," says the Clerk.

out and the most untamable in Europe. Twice has the Duke of Burgundy chastised them for their repeated revolts against their Bishop, and twice hath he suppressed them with much severity, abridging their privileges, taken away their banners, and established rights and claims to himself, which were not before competent over a free city of the Empire—Nay, the last time he defeated them with much slaughter near Saint Tron, where Lagn lost nearly as the good men, what with the sword, what with the sword drowned in the flight, and, thereafter, to disable them from farther mutiny, Duke Charlem refused to enter at any of the gates which they had surrendered, but beating to the ground forty cubits breadth of their city wall, marched into Lagn as a conqueror, with victor clamor, and lance in rest, at the head of his chivalry, by the breach which he had made. Nay, were the Lagns then assured, that, but for the intervention of his father, Duke Philip the Good, the Charles, then called Count of Charolais, would have given this town up to spoil. And yet, with all these fresh recollections, with their breeches unrepented, and their armours scarcely supplied, the night of an Archer's bonnet is sufficient again to stir them to uprise. May God amend all! but I fear there will be bloody work between as fierce a population and as fiery a Sovereign; and I would my excellent and kind master had a son of lower dignity and more civility, for his mine is lined with thorns instead of roses. Thus much I say to you, Seigneur stranger, to make you aware, that, if your affairs detain you not at Schonwaldt, it is a place from which each man of sense should depart as speedily as possible. I apprehend that your ladies are of the same opinion; for one of the grooms who attended them on the route, has been sent back by them to the Court of France with letters, which, doubtless, are intended to announce their going in search of a safer asylum."

CHAPTER XX.

THE HILARY.

On to—thee art made, if thou dost not to be so—First, let me see thy still the office of a priest, and out to meet for him's sake. —Faintly Night.

When the tables were drawn, the Chaplain, who seemed to have taken a sort of attachment to Quentin Durward's society, or who perhaps desired to extract from him farther information concerning the meeting of the morning, led him into a withdrawing apartment, the windows of which, on one side, projected into the garden, and as he saw his companion's eye gaze rather eagerly upon the spot, he proposed to Quentin to go down and take a view of the curious foreign shrubs with which the Bishop had enriched his parterres.

Quentin excused himself, as unwilling to intrude, and therewithal communicated the check which he had received in the morning. The Chaplain smiled, and said, "That there was indeed some ancient prohibition respecting the Bishop's private garden; but then," he added, with a smile, "was when our reverend father was a princely young prelate of not more than thirty years of age, and when many fair ladies frequented the Castle for ghostly consultation. Need there was," he said, with a downcast look, and a smile, half simple and half intelligent, "that these ladies, gained in conversation, who were ever lodged in the apartments now occupied by the noble Canoness, should have some space for taking the air, secure from the intrusion of the profane. But of late years," he added, "this prohibition, although not formally removed, has fallen entirely out of observance, and remains but as the superstition which lingers in the brain of a superannuated gentleman-scholar. If you please," he added, "we will presently descend, and try whether the place be haunted or no."

Nothing could have been more agreeable to Quentin than the prospect of a free entrance into the garden, through means of which, as owing to a chance which had hitherto attended his passage, he hoped to communicate with, or at least obtain sight of, the object of his effusions, from some such secret or hidden window, or similar "cogn of vantage," as at the homestead of the Fleur-de-Lys, near Plessey, or the Dauphin's tower, within that Castle itself. Isabelle seemed still destined, wherever she made her choice, to be the Lady of the Turret.

When Durward descended with his new friend into the garden, the latter seemed a terrestrial philosopher, entirely busied with the things of the earth; while the eyes of Quentin, if they did not seek the heavens like those of an astrologer, ranged at least all around the windows, balconies, and especially the turret, which projected on every part from the inner front of the old building, in order to discover that which was to be his cynosure.

While thus employed, the young lover heard not total neglect, if indeed he heard at all, the enumeration of plants, herbs, and shrubs, which his reverend conductor pointed out to him; of which the two chosen, because of prime use as medicine; and the more chosen for yielding a rare flavour to potage; and a third, choicest of all, because possessed of no merit but its extreme scarcity. Still it was necessary to preserve some semblance at least of attention; which the youth found as difficult, that he fairly waded at the devil the officious naturalist and the whole vegetable kingdom. He was relieved at length by the striking of a clock, which summoned the Chaplain to some official duty.

The reverend man made many unnecessary apologies for leaving his new friend, and concluded by giving him the agreeable assurance, that he might walk in the garden till supper, without much risk of being disturbed.

"It is," said he, "the place where I always study my own humors, as being most untroubled from the resort of strangers. I am now about to deliver one of them in the chapel, if you please to favour me with your audience. I have been thought to have some gift—But the glory be where it is due!"

Quentin excused himself for this evening, under pretence of a severe headache, which the open air was likely to prove the best cure for; and at length the well-meaning priest left him to himself.

It may well be imagined, that in the curious examination which he now made, at more leisure, of every window or aperture which looked into the garden, there did not escape which were in the immediate neighbourhood of the small door by which he had seen Marthon admit Hayraddin, as he proceeded to the apartment of the Canoness. Not nothing struck or showed itself, which could either confirm or confirm the tale which the Bohemian had told, and it was becoming dusk; and Quentin began to be sensible, he scarce knew why, that his mounting as he lay in the garden might be subject of displeasure or suspicion.

Just as he had resolved to depart, and was taking what he had destined for his last turn under the windows which had such attraction for him, he heard above him a slight and cautious sound, like that of a cough, as intended to call his attention, and avoid the observation of others. As he looked up a joyful surprise, a casement opened—a female hand was seen to drop a billet, which fell into a recessed bush that grew at the foot of the wall. The precaution used in dropping this letter, prescribed equal prudence and secrecy in reading it. The garden, surrounded, as we have said, upon two sides by the buildings of the palace, was surrounded, of course by the windows of many apartments, but there was a sort of grove of rock work, which the Chaplain had shown Durward with much complacency. It snatched up the billet, thrust it into his bosom, and led to this place of secrecy, was the work of a single minute. He there opened the precious scroll, and read, at the same time, the memory of the House of Aberbrothach, whose records had rendered him capable of deciphering its contents.

The first line contained the injunction, "Read this in secret,"—and the contents were as follows: "What your eyes have so boldly said, some have perhaps too rashly understood. But, unjust presumption makes its victims bold, and it were better to throw myself on the goodness of one, than to remain object of pursuit to many. Fortune has her ups and downs; but brave men fear not to climb. I dare daunt for one that hazards much, you but pass into this garden at prime to-morrow, with in your cap a blue and white feather; but it is no further commendation. Your stars have, say, destined you for greatness, and disposed of greatness. — Farewell — be faithful, prompt, and able, and doubt not thy fortune." Within this was enclosed a ring with a table diamond, on which were cut, in form of a lozenge, the arms of the House of Croys.

A first feeling of Quenton upon this occasion was mixed ecstasy—a pride and joy which seemed to him to the stars—a determination to do or die, armed by which he treated with scorn the thousand obstacles that placed themselves between him and the goal of his wishes.

This mood of rapture, and unable to endure any rapture which might withdraw his mind, were it for a moment, from so ecstatic a subject of contemplation, Durward, retreating to the interior of the castle, hastily changed his former pretext of a head-ache for not joining the household of the Bishop at supper-time, and, lighting his lamp, betook himself to the chamber which had been assigned him, to read and to meditate again and again, the precious billet, a line a thousand times the no less precious ring of such high wrought feelings could not remain in the same ecstatic tune. A thought crossed him, though he repelled it as ungrateful—as blasphemous—that the frankness of the confession implied him delirious, on the part of her who sent it, then was consistent with the high romanticism of adoration with which he had hitherto worshipped the Lady Isabella. No sooner did this unlovely thought intrude itself, than he hastened to reject it, as he would have stifled a burning and harassing fever, that had intruded itself into his couch. It is for him—him the Favourite—on whom as yet she had stooped from her sphere, to ascribe any to her for the very act of condescension, with which he dared not have raised his eyes towards her. Did not her very dignity of birth and of condition, reverse, in her case, the usual rules which impose silence on the lady until her lover shall have spoken? To these arguments, which he boldly put into his own words, and avowed to himself, his duty might possibly suggest one which he could not embody even mentally with the same frankness—the more of the party beloved might perhaps remit, on the part of the lady, some little departure from common rules; and, after all, as in the case of Isabella, there was example for it in chronicle. The sin of low degree, of whom he had just been reading, was, like himself, a gentleman void of land and reg, and yet the generous Princess of Hungary bowed on him, without scruple, more substantial signs of her affection, than the billet he had just received.

"Welcome," she said, "my worthy knight,
My faithful vassal, my noble's knight;
I will give thee kisses three,
And an ever-blessed peace to thee."

And again the more faithful history made the King himself exclaim,

"I have pleasure many a year Thus to be kissed by courtesy."

Thus, upon the whole, Quenton generously and generously reconciled himself to a line of conduct on the Countess's part, by which he was likely to be highly benefited.

But this scruple was succeeded by another doubt of adoration. The traitor Hayraddin had been the apartments of the lady, for aught Quenton saw, for the space of four hours, and, considering hints which he had thrown out of remaining so long in the most interesting land over the form of Quenton Durward, what should assure him that this traitor was not of his lying? and if so, was not probable that such a dissembling villain had taken that to conceal some new plan of treachery, which to ensnare Isabella out of the protection of the worthy Bishop? This was a matter to be closely looked into, for Quenton felt a repugnance to this individual proportioned to the unabashed impudence with which he had avowed his profanity, and could not bring himself to hope, that any thing in which he was concerned could ever come to an honourable or happy conclusion.

These various thoughts rolled over Quenton's mind like misty clouds, to dash and obscure the fair landscape which his fancy had at first drawn, and his couch was that night a sleepless one. At the hour of prime—say, and an hour before it, was he in the castle-garden, where as one now opposed rather his entrance of his abode, with a further of the sanguine colour, as distinguished as he could by any means procure in such haste. No notice was taken of his appearance for nearly two hours, at length he heard a few notes of the lute, and presently the lattice opened right above the little postern-door at which Hayraddin had admitted Hayraddin, and Isabella, a most lovely beauty, appeared at the opening, greeted him with kindly, half shyly coloured extremely at the deep and significant reverence with which he returned her courtesy—shot the casement, and disappeared.

Daylight and champagne could discover no more! The authenticity of the billet was ascertained—a only remained what was to follow, and of this the fair writer had given him no hint. But no immediate longer impeded. The Countess was in a strong state, under the protection of a Prince, at once respectable for his secular, and venerable for his ecclesiastical authority. There was neither immediate room nor occasion for the exulting Square interfering in the adventure; and it was sufficient if he kept himself prompt to execute her commands whenever they should be communicated to him. But Fate purposed to call him into action sooner than he was aware of.

It was the fourth night after his arrival at Schynwaldt, when Quenton had taken measures for sending back on the morrow, to the Court of Louis, the remaining groom who had accompanied him on his journey, with letters from himself to his uncle and Lord Crawford, renouncing the service of France, for which the treachery to which he had been exposed by the private instructions of Hayraddin gave him an excuse, both in honour and presence, and he bestowed himself to his bed with all the easy-ambitious ideas around him which flutter about the couch of a youth when he loves dearly, and thinks his love as anxiously repaid.

But Quenton's dreams, which at first partook of the nature of those happy influences under which he had fallen asleep, began by degrees to assume a more terrific character.

He walked with the Countess Isabella beside a smooth and inland lake, such as formed the principal characteristic of his native glen; and he spoke to her of his love, without any consciousness of the impediments which lay between them. She blushed and smiled when she listened—even as he might have expected from the tenor of the letter, which, sleeping or waking, lay nearest to his heart. But the scene suddenly changed from summer to winter—from calm to tempest; the winds and the waves rose with such a contest of surge and whirlwind, as if the demons of the water and of the air had been contending for their roaring empires in rival strife. The rising waters seemed to cut off their advance and their retreat—the increasing tempest, which dashed them against each other, seemed to render their retreating on the spot impossible, and the tumultuous sensations produced by the apparent danger awoke the dreamer.

He awoke, but although the circumstances of the vision had disappeared, and given place to reality, the noise which had probably suggested them, still continued to sound in his ears.

Quenton's first impulse was to sit erect in bed, and listen with astonishment to sounds, which, if they had announced a tempest might have shamed the wildest that ever burst down from the Grampians; and again in a minute he became sensible, that the tempest was not excited by the fury of the elements, but by the wrath of man.

He sprung from bed, and looked from the window of his apartment, but it opened into the garden, and on that side all was quiet, though the opening of the casement made him still more sensible to the shouts which reached his ears, that the castle and the castle was beleaguered and assailed, and that by a numerous and determined enemy. Hastily collecting his dress and arms, and putting them on with such celerity as darkness and surprise permitted, he then was startled by a knocking at the door of his chamber. As Quentin did not immediately answer the door which was a slight one, was forced open from without, and the intruder, announced by the peculiar dialect to be the Bohemian, Hayreddin Maugrubin, entered the apartment. A pistol, which he held in his hand, touched by a match, produced a dark flash of ruddy fire, by means of which he kindled a lamp, which he took from his bosom.

"The horoscope of your destiny," he said, "now turns upon the determination of a minute."

"Cut!" said Quentin, in reply, "there is treachery around us, and where there is treachery, thou must have a share in it."

"You are mad," answered Maugrubin. "I never betrayed any one but to gain by it—and wherefore should I betray you, by whose safety I can take more advantage than by your destruction? Hearken for a moment, if it be possible for you, to one word of reason, ere it is sounded into your ear by the death-knell of ruin. The Lancers are up—William de la Marck with his hand leads them—Were there means of resistance, their numbers, and his fury, would overcome them, but there are none to none. If you would save the Countess and your own hopes, follow me in the name of her who sent you a table-diamond, with three leopards engraved on it!"

"Lead the way," said Quentin, hastily. "In that name I dare every danger."

"As I shall manage it," said the Bohemian. "There is no danger, if you can but withhold your hand from strife which does not concern you, for, after all, what is it to you whether the Bishop, as they call him, slays his flock, or the flock slays their shepherd?—Ha! ha! ha! Follow me, but with caution and patience, subdue your own courage, and confide in my prudence—and my debt of thankfulness is paid, and you have a Countess for your spouse. Follow me."

"I follow," said Quentin, drawing his sword; "but the moment in which I detect the least sign of treachery, thy head and body are three yards apart!"

Without more conversation, the Bohemian seeing that Quentin was now fully armed and ready, ran down the stairs before him, and waded fast through various salt-panes, until they gained the little garden. Scarcely a light was to be seen on that side, scarce any bustle was to be heard; but no sooner had Quentin entered the open space, than the noise on the opposite side of the castle became ten times more stunningly audible, and he could hear the various war cries of "Largo! Largo! Bang! Bang! Bang!" shouted by the assailants, while the faint cry of "Our Lady for the Prince Bishop!" was raised in a faint and faltering tone, by those of the Prelate's soldiers who had hastened, though surprised and at disadvantage, to the defence of the walls.

But the interest of the fight, notwithstanding the martial character of Quentin Dorward, was indifferent to him in comparison of the fate of Isabelle of Croys, which, he had reason to fear would be a direct fall one, unless rescued from the power of the traitor and cruel freebooter, who was now, as it seemed, burning the gates of the castle. He recoiled and then, half to the aid of the Bohemian, as men in a desperate illness refuse not the remedy prescribed by quacks and mountebanks, and followed across the garden with the intention of being guided by him until he should discover symptoms of treachery, and then piercing him through the heart, or striking his head from his body. Hayreddin seemed himself conscious that his safety turned on a feather-weight, for he for years, from the moment they entered the open air, all he would give and quack, and seemed to have made a vow to act at once with modesty, courage, and activity.

At the opposite door, which led to the ladies' apartments, upon a low signal made by Hayreddin, appeared two women, muffled in the black silk robe which were then, as now, worn by the women in the Netherlands. Quentin offered his arm to one of them, who clung to it with trembling eagerness, and indeed hung upon him so much, that had her weight been greater, she must have much impeded that retreat. The Bohemian, who conducted the other female, took the road straight for the postern which opened upon the moat, through the garden wall, close to which the little skull was drawn up, by means of which Quentin had formerly observed Hayreddin himself retreating from the castle.

As they crossed, the shouts of storm and assault violence seemed to announce that the castle was the act of being taken; and so dismal was the sound in Quentin's ears, that he could not help exclaiming aloud, "But that my blood is irrevocably devoted to the fulfilment of my present duty, I would leap to the wall, take faithful part with the hospitable Bishop, and silence some of those knaves whose threats are full of irony and robbery!"

The lady, whose arm was still folded in his, pined it lightly as he spoke, as if to make him understand that there was a nearer claim on his chivalry than the defence of Schonwaldt; while the Bohemian exclaimed, loud enough to be heard, "Now, that I feel right Christian frenzy, which would turn back to flight, when love and fortune both demand that we should fly.—On, on—with all the haste you can make—Horses wait us in yonder thicket of willows."

"There are but two horses," said Quentin, who saw them in the moonlight.

"All that I could procure without exciting suspicion and enough, besides," replied the Bohemian.

"You too must ride for Tongres ere the day be over—Marthon will abide with the women of our horde, with whom she is an old acquaintance. Know, she is a daughter of our tribe, and only dwelt apart from you to serve our purpose as occasion should fall."

"Marthon!" exclaimed the Countess, looking aside to her female with a start of surprise; "is not she my kinswoman?"

"Only Marthon," said Hayreddin. "Kinswoman that little piece of deceit, I doted not early of her, the Lady of Croys from the Wild Boar of Ardennes."

"Wretch!" said Quentin, emphatically—"but she is not—she is not too late—I will back to room in Lady Hameline."

"Hemlock," whispered the lady, in a shrill voice, "hang on thy arm, to thank thee for her rescue."

"Ha! what!—How is this?" said Quentin, extracting himself from her hold, and with less gentleness than he would at any other time have used towards female of any rank. "Is the Lady Isabelle thus behind!—Farewell! farewell!"

As he turned to hasten back to the castle, Hayreddin laid hold of him. "Nay, hear you—hear you—run upon your death! What the devil shall do you wear the colours of the old one for? I will wear that blue and white silk again. But she has about as large a dower—has jewels and gold—both gone down, too, upon the carlton."

While he spoke thus, panting on in broken sentences, the Bohemian struggled to detain Quentin, who at length laid his hand on his dagger, in order to extricate himself.

"Nay, if that be the case," said Hayreddin, loosening his hold, "go—and the devil, if there be any, go along with you!"—And, soon as freed from his hold, the Scot shot back to the castle with the gust of the wind.

Hayreddin then turned round to the Countess Hameline, who had sunk down on the ground, between alarm, fear and disappointment.

"Here has been a mistake," he said; "my lady, and come with me—I will provide you, ere morning comes, a gallanter husband than this unorthodox boy; and if you will not move, you shall have twenty."

The Lady Hameline was so silent in her pos-as, as she was vain and weak in her understanding. Like many other persons, she went tolerably through the ordinary duties of life; but in a crisis of the present, she was entirely incapable of doing more than pouring forth unavailing lamentations, and accusing Hayraddin of being a thief, a base slave, impostor, a murderer.

"Call me Zingaro," returned he, composedly, "and I have said all at once."

"Monster! you said the stars had decreed our union, and caused me to write—O wretch that I am!" exclaimed the unhappy lady.

"And so they had decreed your union," said Hayraddin, "had both parties been willing—but think of the blessed constellations can make any one do against his will?—I was led into error with my accursed Christian gallantries, and fopperies, ribands and favours—and the youth prefers veal beef, I think—that's all.—Up and follow me; I take notice, I endure neither weeping nor mourning."

"I will not stir a foot," said the Countess, obstinately.

"By the bright welkin, but you shall, though!" claimed Hayraddin. "I swear to you, by all that our fools believed in, that you have to do with one, who would care little to strip you naked, bind you to trees, and leave you to your fortune!"

"Nay," said Marthon, interfering, "by your favour, she shall not be misused. I wear a knife as well as you, and can use it—She is a kind woman, enough a fool.—And you, madam, rise up and follow.—Here has been a mistake; but it is something to have saved life and limb. There are many in yonder castle who would give all the wealth in the world to stand here we do now."

As Marthon spoke, a clamour, in which the shouts of victory were mingled with screams of terror and despair, was wafted to them from the Castle of Schonwaldt.

"Hear that, lady!" said Hayraddin, "and be thankful you are not adding your treble pipe to yonder concert. Believe me, I will care for you honestly, and the stars shall keep their words, and find you a good husband."

Like some wild animal, exhausted and subdued by error and fatigue, the Countess Hameline yielded herself up to the conduct of her guides, and suffered herself to be passively led whichever way they would. Nay, such was the confusion of her spirits and the exhaustion of her strength, that the worthy couple, who half bore, half led her, carried on their course in her presence without her even understanding it.

"I ever thought your plan was folly," said Marthon. "Could you have brought the young people together, indeed, we might have had a hold on their gratitude, and a footing in their castle. But what chance of so handsome a youth wedding this old fool?"

"Rizpah," said Hayraddin, "you have borne the name of a Christian, and dwelt in the tents of those spotted people, till thou hast become a partaker in their follies. How could I dream that he would have made scruples about a few years, youth or age, when the advantages of the match were so evident? And you knowest, there would have been no moving under any wench to be so frank as this coming Countess here, who hangs on our arms as dead a weight as a wool-pack. I loved the lad too, and could have done him a kindness: to wed him to his old woman, was to make his fortune: to unite him to Isabelle, were to have brought on him De la Marck, Burgundy, France,—every one that challenges an interest in disposing of her hand. And this silly woman's wealth being chiefly in gold and jewels, we should have had our share. But the bow-string has burst, and the arrow failed. Away with us—we will bring her to William with the Beard. By the time he has gorged himself with wassail, as he wont, he will not know an old Countess from a young one. Away, Rizpah—bear a gallant heart. The bright Aldeboran still influences the destinies of the Children of the Desert!"

CHAPTER XXI.

THE SACK.

The gates of mercy shall be all shut up,
And the flesh'd soldier, rough and hard of heart,
In liberty of bloody hand shall range,
With conscience wide as hell.—Henry V.

THE surprised and affrighted garrison of the Castle of Schonwaldt had, nevertheless, for some time, made good the defence of the place against the assailants; but the immense crowds which, issuing from the city of Liege, thronged to the assault like bees, distracted their attention, and abated their courage.

There was also disaffection at least, if not treachery, among the defenders; for some called out to surrender, and others, deserting their posts, tried to escape from the castle. Many threw themselves from the walls into the moat, and such as escaped drowning, flung aside their distinguishing badges, and saved themselves by mingling among the motley crowd of assailants. Some few, indeed, from attachment to the Bishop's person, drew around him, and continued to defend the great keep, to which he had fled; and others, doubtful of receiving quarter, or from an impulse of desperate courage, held out other detached bulwarks and towers of the extensive building. But the assailants had got possession of the courts and lower parts of the edifice, and were busy pursuing the vanquished, and searching for spoil, while one individual, as if he sought for that death from which all others were flying, endeavoured to force his way into the scene of tumult and horror, under apprehensions still more horrible to his imagination, than the realities around were to his sight and senses. Whoever had seen Quentin Durward that fatal night, not knowing the meaning of his conduct, had accounted him a raging madman; whoever had appreciated his motives, had ranked him nothing beneath a hero of romance.

Approaching Schonwaldt on the same side from which he had left it, the youth met several fugitives making for the wood, who naturally avoided him as an enemy, because he came in an opposite direction from that which they had adopted. When he came nearer, he could hear, and partly see, men dropping from the garden-wall into the castle fosse, and others who seemed precipitated from the battlements by the assailants. His courage was not staggered, even for an instant. There was not time to look for the boat, even had it been practicable to use it, and it was in vain to approach the postern of the garden, which was crowded with fugitives, who ever and anon, as they were thrust through it by the pressure behind, fell into the moat which they had no means of crossing.

Avoiding that point, Quentin threw himself into the moat, near what was called the little gate of the castle, and where there was a drawbridge, which was still elevated. He avoided with difficulty the fatal grasp of more than one sinking wretch, and, swimming to the drawbridge, caught hold of one of the chains which was hanging down, and, by a great exertion of strength and activity, swayed himself out of the water, and attained the platform from which the bridge was suspended. As with hands and knees he struggled to make good his footing, a lanzknecht, with his bloody sword in his hand, made towards him, and raised his weapon for a blow, which must have been fatal.

"How now, fellow!" said Quentin, in a tone of authority—"Is that the way in which you assist a comrade?—Give me your hand."

The soldier in silence, and not without hesitation, reached him his arm, and helped him upon the platform, when without allowing him time for reflection, the Scot continued in the same tone of command—"To the western tower, if you would be rich—the Priest's treasury is in the western tower."

These words were echoed on every hand: "To the western tower—the treasure is in the western tower!" And the stragglers who were within hearing of the cry, took, like a herd of raging wolves, the direction opposite to that which Quentin, come life, come death, was determined to pursue.

Bearing himself as if he were one, not of the conquered, but of the victors, he made a way into the garden, and pushed across it, with less interruption than he could have expected, for the cry of "To the western tower!" had carried off one body of the assailants, and another was summoned together, by war-cry and trumpet sound, to assist in repelling a desperate assault, attempted by the defenders of the keep, who had hoped to cut their way out of the castle, bearing the bishop along with them. Quentin, therefore, crossed the garden with an eager step and throbbing heart, commending himself to those heavenly powers which had protected him through the numberless perils of his life, and told in his determination to succeed, or leave his life in this desperate undertaking. Ere he reached the garden, three men rushed on him with levelled lances, crying, "Lage, Lage!"

Putting himself in defence, but without striking, he replied, "France, France, stand to Lage!"

"Vivat France!" cried the burghers of Lage, and passed on. The same signal proved a talisman to avert the weapons of four or five of La March's followers, whom he found struggling in the garden, and who sat upon him, crying, "Sanghis!"

In a word, Quentin began to hope, that his character as an emissary of King Louis, the private instigator of the insurgents of Lage, and the secret supporter of William de la March, might possibly bear him through the horrors of the night.

On reaching the turret, he shuddered when he found the little side-door, through which Marthon and the Countess Hameline had shortly before joined him, was now blockaded with more than one dead body.

Two of them he dragged hastily aside, and was stepping over the third body, in order to enter the portal, when the supposed dead man laid hand on his cloak, and entreated him to stay and assist him to rise. Quentin was about to use rougher methods than struggling to rid himself of this extremely obnoxious, when the fallen man continued to exclaim, "I am stifled here, in mine own armour!—I am the Syndic Pavillon of Lage! If you are for us, I will attack you—if you are for the other side, I will protect you; but do not—do not leave me to die the death of a smothered pig!"

In the midst of this scene of blood and confusion, the presence of mind of Quentin suggested to him, that this dignitary might have the means of protecting their retreat. He raised him on his feet, and asked him if he was wounded.

"Not wounded—at least I think not"—answered the burgher; "but much out of wind."

"Sit down then on this stone, and recover your breath," said Quentin; "I will return instantly."

"For whom are you?" said the burgher, still doubting him.

"For France—for France," answered Quentin, studying to get away.

"What! my lovely young Archer?" said the worthy Syndic. "Nay, if it has been my fate to find a friend in this fearful night, I will not quit him, I promise you. Go where you will, I follow; and, could I get some of the night lads of our gildry together, I might be able to help you in turn; but they are all squandered abroad like so many pence.—Oh, it is a fearful night!"

During this time, he was dragging himself on after Quentin, who, aware of the importance of securing the countenance of a person of such influence, slackened his pace to assist him, although curving in his heart the encumbrance that retarded him.

At the top of the stair was an anteroom, with boxes and trunks, which bore marks of having been rifled, as some of the contents lay on the floor. A lamp, dying in the chimney, shed a feeble beam on a dead or senescent man, who lay across the hearth.

Bounding from Pavillon, like a greyhound from his keeper's leash, and with an effort which almost overthrew him, Quentin sprang through a second and a third room, the last of which seemed to be the bedroom of the Ladies of Croys. No living mortal was to be seen in either of them. He called upon the Lady Isabelle's name, at first gently, then more loudly, and then with an accent of despairing emphasis, but no answer was returned. He wrung his hands, tore his hair, and stamped on the earth with desperation. At length, a feeble glimmer of light, which shone through a crevice in the wall, showing of a dark nook in the bedroom, announced some sleep or concealment behind the arras. Quentin bent to examine it. He found there was indeed a concealed door, but it resisted his hurried efforts to open it. Heedless of the personal injury he might sustain, he rushed at the door with his whole force and weight of his body, and such was the impetus of an effort made between hope and despair, that it would have burst much stronger fastenings.

He thus found his way, almost headlong, into a small oratory where a female figure, which had been kneeling in agonizing supplication before the holy image, now sunk at length on the floor, amid the new terrors implied in this approaching morn. He hastily raised her from the ground, and, by a joy's gasp, it was she whom he sought to save—the Countess Isabelle. He pressed her to his bosom—he pressed her to awake—entreated her to be of good cheer—for that she was now under the protection of one who had heart and hand enough to defend her against armies.

"Durward!" she said, as she at length collected herself, "is it indeed you?—then there is some joy left. I thought all living and mortal friends had left me to my fate. Do not again abandon me!"

"Never, never!" said Durward. "Whatever shall happen, whatever danger shall approach, may I forfeit the benefits purchased by your blessed eyes, if I be not the sharer of your fate until it is again a happy one!"

"Very pathetic and touching, truly," said a weak, broken, asthmatic voice behind—"A love that I say, and, from my soul, I pity the tender creature, as if she were my own Trudeben."

"You must do more than pity us," said Quentin, turning towards the speaker; "you must assist in protecting us, Meinheer Pavillon. He assured the lady was put under my especial charge by your self the King of France; and, if you and we are to shelter her from every species of offence and violence, your city will also be in the favour of Louis of Vohs. Above all, she must be guarded from the hands of William de la March."

"That will be difficult," said Pavillon, "for the orbicular of Lanzknechts are very devoid of running out the wench; but I'll do my best.—We will to the other apartment, and there I will consider—it is but a narrow stair, and you can keep the door with a pike while I look from the window, and get together some of my brisk boys of the county gildry of Lage, that are as true as the harvest day wear in their girdles.—But first undo me these clasp."

"For I have not worn this corset since the death of Saint Trug," said I am three stone heavier since that time, if there be truth in Dutch beer and scale."

The undling of the iron enclosure gave great tid to the hardest man, who, in putting it on, had more considered La March to the cause of Lage, than his capacity of bearing arms. It afterwards turned out, that being as it were, borne forward involuntarily, and hoisted over the walls by his company as they thronged to the assault, the magistrate had been cured here and there as the tide of attack and defence flowed or ebbed, without the power, latterly, of even standing a word, until, as the sea casts a log of driftwood ashore in the first creek, he had been ultimately thrown down in the entrance to the ladies of Croys's apartments, where the encumbrance of his own armour with the superincumbent weight of run men slain in the entrance, and who fell about him, might have fired him down long enough, had he not been relieved by Durward.

The same warmth of temper which rendered Hermann Pavillon a headstrong and intemperate man in politics, had the more desirable consequence of picking him, in private, a good-tempered, kind-hearted man, who, at sometimes a little misled by vanity, was always well-meaning and benevolent. He told master to have an especial care of the poor pretty boy from the window, and after this unnecessary exhortation, went to hold him from the window. "Laga, Laga, the gallant champion's paid of curriers!" One or two of his immediate followers collected the summons, and at the peculiar whistle with which it was accompanied, (each of the crafts being such a signal among themselves,) and, more doing them, established a guard under the window on which their leader was bawling, and before he passed down.

Master seemed now settling into some sort of tranquillity. All opposition had ceased, and the leaders of the different classes of combatants were taking measures to prevent indiscriminate plunder. The great hall was tolled, as summons to a military council, and its own tongue communicating to Laga its triumphant possession of Schonwaldt by the insurgents, was answered by all the bells in that city. Some distant and clamorous voices seemed to cry, "all to the victors!" It would have been natural, that Master Pavillon should now have called from his window; but, either in reverent care of those whom he had taken under his protection, or perhaps for the other appearance of his own safety, he contented himself with despatching messenger on messenger, to command his lieutenant, Peterkin Goulard, to attend on directly.

Peterkin came at length, to his great relief, as being the person upon whom, on all pressing occasions, whether of war, politics, or commerce, Pavillon was most accustomed to repose confidence. He was stout, square-shouldered, with a square face, and broad back expressive, that announced him to be opinionative and disputative, an advice-giving countenance, and to speak. He was endowed with a bull-jerkkin, worn loose but not useless by his side, and carried a sword in his hand.

"Peterkin, my dear lieutenant," said his commander, "this has been a glorious day—night, I should say—I trust thou art pleased for ever?"

"I am well enough pleased that you are so," said the worthy lieutenant; "though I should not have thought of your celebrating the victory, if you said it was by the sword by yourself, when you are so good as counsel."

"But on I wanted there?" said the Syndic.

"Ay, marry are you, to stand up for the rights of men, that are in more danger than ever," answered the lieutenant.

"Pshaw, Peterkin," answered his principal, "there's not such a stamp of grandeur."

"Grandeur? got I," said Peterkin; "what pleasure other people will always please me. Only I wish we have not got King Mark, instead of King Lag, for the fellow that the Clerk of Saint Lambert told us out of Master's Meep's book."

"I cannot guess your meaning, Peterkin," said the Syndic.

"Why then, I tell you, Master Pavillon, that this day, or hour, is like to make his own den of Schonwaldt, and 'tis probable to turn out as bad a neighbour to our town as ever was the old Bishop, and even. Here has he taken the whole conquest in his own hand, and is only debating whether he should be called Prince or Bishop;—and it is a shame to see how they have mishandled the old man among them."

"I will not permit it, Peterkin," said Pavillon, "I should not like the matter but not the head of the matter. We are in a case in the field, Peterkin, and will not permit these courtesies."

"Ay, ten to one in the field, but only mean to man the castle, besides that Nibbel Black the butcher, and the rabble of the suburbs, take part with William de la Mar, justly for some good brown (for which he had a little) and some cash, and only for and easy words on, who are the crafty, and have no purpose."

"Pshaw," said Pavillon, "we will go straight to the point. I will stay no longer in Schonwaldt."

"But the bridges of this castle are up, master," said Goulard—"the gates locked, and guarded by these lanknichts and, if we were to try to force our way, there follows, whom every day business is war, might make wild work of us, that only fight of a holiday."

"But why has he secured the gates?" said the alarmed burglar; "or what business hath he to make honest men prisoners?"

"I cannot tell—not I," said Peter. "Some noise there is about the Ladies of Croys, who have escaped during the storm of the Castle. That first put the Men with the Beard beside himself with anger, and now he's beside himself with drink sign."

The Burgomaster cast a discontented look towards Quentin, and seemed at a loss what to resolve upon. Durward, who had not lost a word of the conversation, which alarmed him very much, saw nevertheless that their only safety depended on his preserving his own presence of mind, and sustaining the courage of Pavillon. He struck boldly into the conversation, as one who had a right to have a voice in the deliberation.—"I am ashamed," he said, "Master Pavillon, to observe you hesitate what to do on this occasion. Go boldly to William de la Mar, and demand free leave to quit the castle, you, your lieutenant, your squire, and your daughter. He can have no pretence for keeping you prisoner."

"For me and my lieutenant—that is myself and Peter?—good—but who is my squire?"

"I am, for the present," replied the undaunted boy.

"You?" said the embarrassed burglar; "but are you not the envoy of King Louis of France?"

"True, but my message is to the magistracy of Liege—and only in Liege will I deliver it.—Were I to acknowledge my quality before William de la Mar, must I not enter into negotiation with him? ay, and it is like, he detained by him. You must get me secretly out of the Castle in the capacity of your squire."

"Good—my squire,—but you speak of my daughter—my daughter is, I trust, safe in my house in Liege—where I wish her father was, with all my heart and soul."

"This lady," said Durward, "will call you father while we are in this place."

"And for my whole life afterwards," said the Countess, throwing herself at the citizen's feet, and clasping his knees. "Never shall the day pass in which I will not honour you, love you, and pray for you as a daughter for a father, if you will but aid me in this fearful street—O, be not hard-hearted! think your own daughter may kneel to a stranger, to ask him for life and honour—think of this, and give me the protection you would wish her to receive."

"In truth," said the good citizen, much moved with her pathetic appeal—"I think, Peter, that this pretty maiden hath a touch of our Trudchen's sweet look,—I thought so from the first; and that this brisk youth here, who is so ready with his advice, is somewhat like Trudchen's bachelor—I waver a great, Peter, that this is a true-love matter, and it is a sin not to further it."

"It were a shame and an oath," said Peter, a good-natured Fleming, notwithstanding all his self-complacency; and as he spoke, he wiped his eyes with the sleeve of his jerkin.

"She shall be my daughter, then," said Pavillon, "well wrapped up in her black silk veil; and if there are not enough of true-hearted citizens to protect her, being the daughter of their Syndic, it were pity they should ever tug leather more. But hark ye,—questions must be answered—How if I am asked what should my daughter make here at such an onslaught?"

"What should half the women in Liege make here when they followed us to the Castle?" said Peter; "they had no other reason, sure, but that it was just the place in the world that they should not have come to. Our young Frau Trudchen has come a little farther than the rest—that is all."

"Admirably spoken," said Quentin; "only be bold, and take this gentleman's good counsel, noble man—" same, yet endeavoured, by the length and flax beard, to conceal the circumstances that really procured him that denomination. This unusual thickness and projection of the mouth and jaw, which, with the huge projecting ears, gave that resemblance to the bestral creation, and to the delight that De la March had in the forest so called, originally procured for him the name of the Boar of Ardenne. The beard, oily, and uncumbed, neither concealed the errors of the countenance, nor degraded its expression.

Knights and officers sat around the table, with the men of Lange, some of them of the old description; among whom Nibbel Blaker, placed near De la March himself, was had by him tucked up sleeves, which display incised in the elbows with blood, as was a which lay on the table before him. The rare, most of them, their beards long and imitation of their leader, had their hair turned upwards, in the manner that might give the natural ferocity of their appearance; coated, as many of them seemed to be, partly signs of triumph, and partly with the long of wine which they had been quaffing, respectable at once halcyon and disgusting, age which they held, and the songs which without even pretending to pay each other flimsy of listening, were so full of honest bonny, that Quentin blessed God that the of the noise prevented them from being in his companions.

It seems to say, of the better class of bur- were associated with William de la March's this fearful revel, that the wan faces and of the greater part, showed that they liked their entertainment, or feared their as; while some of lower education, or a up brutal, saw only in the atrocious of the gallant bearing, which they would willingly of the tone of which they endeavoured to for as was possible, and stimulated them- the task, by swallowing immense draughts and schwarzbier—indulging a vice which as was too common in the Low Countries, gratification for the least had been as disor- he quality of the company. The whole of of plate—say, even that belonging to the the Church, for the floor of Ardenne re- the imputation of sacrilege—was mingled t-jacks, or huge tankards made of leather, ing horses of the most ordinary description, existence of horror remains to be added cited for; and we willingly leave the rest to the imagination of the reader. Amidst license assumed by the soldiers of De la so who was excluded from the table, (a it, remarkable for his courage and for his favour during the storm of the evening,) gently snatched up a large silver goblet, and off, declaring it should atone for his loss of of the feast. The leader laughed till his at a jest so congenial to the character of any; but when another, less renowned, it m, for audacity in battle, ventured on using freedom, De la March instantly put a check of practice, which would soon have cleared fall the more valuable decorations.—"Hail sit of the thunder!" he exclaimed, "thou not be men when they face the enemy, pretend to be thieves among their friends, on franchises desarted, thou—thou who dost pined gaze and lowered brow, when Con- forced his way over moat and wall, must slayest!—Kiss him up to the sanctified li-window!—He shall beat thee with his: we drink a cup to his safe passage to the on was scarce sooner pronounced than go- d; and in a moment the wretch wrestled at again, suspended from the wall here, still hung there when Quentin and the moonbeam, threw on the castle-floor an uncertain shadow which doubtfully, yet fearfully, intimated the nature of the substance that produced it.

When the Syndic Pavillon was announced from mouth to mouth in this tumultuous meeting, he en- deavoured to assume, in right of his authority and influence, an air of importance and equality, which a glen- at the fearful object at the window, and at the wild scene around him, rendered it very difficult for him to sustain, notwithstanding the exhortations of Peter, who whispered in his ear, with some perturbation, "I y heart, master, or we are but gone men!"

The Syndic maintained his dignity, however, as well as he could, in a short address, in which he com- plimented the company upon the great victory gained by the soldiers of De la March and the good citizens of Lange.

He answered De la March, sarcastically, "we have brought down the game at last, quoth my lady's beech to the wolf-hound. But he! Mr Burgomaster, you come like Mara, with beauty by your side. Who is this fair one?—Unveil, unveil—no woman calls her beauty her own to night."

"It is my daughter, noble leader," answered Pavil- ion, "and I am to pray your forgiveness for her want- ing a veil. She has a vow for that effect to the Three Blessed Kings."

"I will absolve her of it presently," said De la March; "for here, with one stroke of a cleaver, will I consecrate myself Bishop of Lange; and I trust one living bishop is worth three dead kings."

There was a shuddering and murmur among the guests, for the community of Lange, and even some of the rude soldiers, revered the Kings of Cologne, as they were unanimously called, though they respect- ed nothing else.

"Nay, I mean no treason against their defunct an- cestors," said De la March; "only bishop I am deter- mined to be. A prince both secular and ecclesiastical, having power to bind and loose, will best suit a band of reprobates such as you, to whom no one else would give absolution. But come hither, noble Burgomaster—get beside me, when you shall see me make a re- cency for my own preferment.—Bring in our proce- ration in the holy seat!"

A bustle took place in the hall, while Pavillon, en- coming himself from the proffered seat of honour, placed himself near the bottom of the table, his fol- lowers keeping close behind him, not unlike a flock of sheep which, when a stranger dog is in presence, may be sometimes seen to assemble in the rear of an old bel- aether, who is, from office and authority, judg- ed by them to have rather more courage than them- selves. Near the spot sat a very handsome lad, a natural son, as was said, of the ferocious De la March, and towards whom he sometimes showed affection, and even tenderness. The mother of the boy, a beau- tiful concubine, had perished by a blow dealt her by the ferocious leader in a fit of drunkenness or jeal- ousy, and her fate had caused her tyrant as much re- morse as he was capable of feeling. His attachment to the surviving orphan might be partly owing to those circumstances. Quentin, who had learned this point of the leader's character from the old priest, planted himself as close as he could to the youth in question, determined to make him, in some way or other either a hostage or a protector, should either means of easily fail them.

While all stood in a kind of suspense, waiting the event of the orders which the tyrant had issued, one of Pavillon's followers whispered Peter, "Did not our master call that wench his daughter?—Why, it cannot be our Trudehem. This strapping lass is taller by two inches; and there is a black lock of her people forth and v from under her veil. By Saint Michael of the Markes-plaza, you might as well call a black bullcock's hide a white hater's!"

"Hush! hush!" said Peter, with some promise for mind. "What if our master hath a mind to see pure of doc-trinism out of the Bishop's park here, I without our good dame's knowledge? And as it who thee or me to be a spy on him?"

"That will not I, brother," answered the other, "though I would not have thought of his tunnel!"

I ally of the city of Lange?—Soldiers, unless it holds; at dawn; take away the carroux (give the Bishop's corpse a thrust with his foot) which is opened this side among friends, and let adown windows in a fresh carroux."

All unobserved their holds, and the citizens and soldiers moved gazing on each other, as if they scarce knew whether they were friends or foes. Quentin feared took advantage of the moment.

"Hear me," he said, "William De la March, and a burgher and citizen of Lange; and do you, my friend, stand still." (For the boy Carl was attempting to escape from his grasp;) "no harm shall befall a union another of these sharp jabs shall pass me."

"Who art thou, in the first's name," said the soldier De la March, "who art come to hold terms? I take hostages from us in our own law—from us, a exact pledges from others, but yield them to no man."

"I am a servant of King Louis of France," said the man, boldly; "an Archer of his Scottish Guard, my language and dress may partly tell you. I am come to behold and to report your proceedings, and I, with wonder, that they are those of heathens, rather than Christians—of madmen, rather than men of reason. The hosts of Charles of Burgundy will be instantly in motion against you all; and if you wish assistance from France, you must direct yourselves in a different manner. For you, men of Lange, I advise your instant return to your city; and if there is any obstruction offered to or departure, I denounce those by whom it is effected, to my master, his most gracious Majesty's justice."

"France and Lange! France and Lange!" cried the hosts of Pavillon, and several other citizens, and courage began to rise at the bold language of the man.

"France and Lange, and long live the gallant Archer! We will live and die with him!"

William de la March's eyes sparkled, and he grasped his dagger as if about to launch it at the heart of a common speaker, but glancing his eye around, and something in the looks of the soldiers, which he was obliged to respect. Many of them were French, and all of them knew the private upon which William had received, both in men and in arms, from that kingdom: nay some of them were startled at the earnest and sacrilegious action he had been just committing. The name of France, and the words of that night, had an alarming effect, and the extreme impetuosity of at once quarrelling with the Langens and provoking the Monarch of France, made an appalling impression on their minds, and as their interests were. De la March, in fact, he would not be supported, even by his friends, in any further act of immediate violence, replacing the terms of his brow and eye, declared that he had not the least design against the good men of Lange, and if whom were at liberty to depart as before, and at their pleasure; although he had said they would revel one night with him, at least, in honor of their victory. He added, with more than he commonly used, that "he would only to enter into negotiation concerning the peace of the land, and the arrangement of measures for mutual defence, either the next day, or as soon as they would. Mean while he trusted that the good gentleman would honour his feast by remaining a night at Schonwaldt."

The young Scot returned his thanks, but said, his time must be determined by those of Pavillon, to whom he was directed particularly to attach himself; that, unquestionably, he would attend him on the next return to the quarters of the valiant William de la March.

"You depend on my motions," said Pavillon, and added, "you are likely to quit Schonwaldt without an instant's delay; and, if you do not here to Schonwaldt, save in my company, you are likely to see a again in a hurry."

The last part of the sentence the honest citizen measured to himself, afraid of the consequences of giving audible vent to feelings, which, nevertheless, he was unable altogether to suppress.

"Keep close about me, my brave Kurechner lads," he said to his body guard, "and we will get us first as we can out of this den of thieves."

Most of the better citizens of the Langens seemed to entertain similar opinions with the Syndic, and there had been scarce so much joy amongst them at the obtaining possession of Schonwaldt, as now seemed to arise from the prospect of getting safe out of it. They were suffered to leave the castle without opposition of any kind, and glad was Quentin when he turned his back on those formidable walls.

For the first time since they had entered that dreadful hall, Quentin ventured to ask the young Countess how she did.

"Well, well," she answered, in feverish haste, "excellently well—do not stop to ask a question; let us not lose an instant in words—Let us fly—let us fly!"

She endeavored to mend her pace as she spoke; but with so little success, that she must have fallen from exhaustion, had not Durward supported her. With the tenderness of a mother, when she conveys her infant out of danger, the young Scot raised his precious charge in his arms; and, while she encircled his neck with one arm, lest to every other thought save the desire of escaping, he would not have wished one of the risks of the night unencountered, since such had been the conclusion.

The honest Burgomaster was, in his turn, supported and dragged forward by his faithful counsellor Peter and another of his clerks, and then, in breathless haste, they reached the banks of the river, encountering many striding bands of citizens, who were eager to know the event of the siege, and the truth of certain rumours already afloat, that the conquerors had quarrelled among themselves.

Evasive their curiosity as they best could, the exertions of Peter and some of his companions at length procured a boat for the use of the company, and with it an opportunity of enjoying some repose, equally welcome to Isabella, who continued to lie almost motionless in the arms of her preserver, and to the worthy Burgomaster, who, after delivering a broken string of thanks to Durward, whose mind was at the time too much occupied to answer him, began a long harangue, which he addressed to Peter, upon his own courage and benevolence, and the dangers to which those virtues had exposed him, on this and other occasions.

"Peter, Peter," he said, resuming the complaints of the preceding evening, "if I had not had a bold heart, I would never have stood out against paying the burghers-twentieths, when every other living soul was willing to pay the same. Ay, and that a less stout heart had not seduced me into that other battle of Saint Tron, where a Hanault man at arms thrust me into a muddy ditch with his lance, which neither heart nor hand that I had could help me out of, till the battle was over. Ay, and then, Peter, this very night my courage seduced me, moreover, into too strict a corset, which would have been the death of me, but for the aid of this gallant young gentleman, whose trade is fighting, whereas I was him heartily joy. And then for my tenderness of heart, Peter, it has made a poor man of me that in it would have made a poor man of me, if I had not been tolerably well to pass in this wicked world; and Heaven knows what trouble it is like to bring on me yet, with ladies, countesses, and keeping of secrets, which, for aught I know, may cost me half my fortune, and my mark on the bargain?"

Quentin could remain no longer silent, but assured him, that whatever danger or damage he should incur on the part of the young lady now under his protection, should be thankfully acknowledged, and, as far as was possible, repaid.

"I thank you, young Master Squire Archer, I thank you," answered the citizen of Lange; "but who was it told you that I desired any repayment at your hand for doing the duty of an honest man? I only regretted that it might cost me an arm and a leg."

hope I may have leave to pay so much to my household, without either grudging my loss or my peril."

Quentin accordingly concluded that his present friend was one of the numerous class of benefactors to others, who take out their reward in grumbling, without meaning more than, by showing their grivances, to cast a little the idea of the valuable service by which they have secured them, and therefore prudently remained silent, and suffered the Syndic to expander on to his lieutenant concerning the risk and the loss he had encountered by his zeal for the public good, and his disinterested services to individuals, until they reached his own habitation.

The truth was, that the honest citizen felt that he had lost a little consequence, by suffering the young stranger to take the lead at the crisis which had occurred at the castle hall of Schonwaldt; and, however delighted with the effect of Durward's interference at the moment it seemed to him, on reflection, that he had sustained a diminution of importance, for which he endeavoured to obtain compensation, by exaggerating the claims which he had upon the gratitude of his country in general, his friends in particular, and more especially still, on the Countess of Croys, and her youthful protector.

But when the boat stopped at the bottom of his garden, and he had got himself assisted on shore by Peter it seemed as if the touch of his own threshold had at once dissipated those feelings of wounded self opinion and jealousy, and converted the discontented and obscured temagogue into the honest, kind, hospitable, and friendly host. He called loudly for Trudchen, who presently appeared, for fear and anxiety would permit few within the walls of Lure to sleep during that eventful night. She was charged to pay the utmost attention to the care of the beautiful and half-fainting stranger; and, admiring her personal charms, while she paid her distress, Gertrude discharged the hospitable duty with the zeal and affection of a mother.

Late as it now was, and fatigued as the Syndic appeared, Quentin, on his side, had difficulty to escape a flask of choice and costly wine, as old as the battle of Annecour, and must have submitted to take his share, however unwilling, but for the appearance of the mother of the family, whom Pavillon a loud rumour for the keys of the cellar brought forth from her bedroom. She was a jolly little roundabout woman, who had been pretty in her time, but whose principal characteristics for several years had been a red and sharp nose, a shrill voice, and a determination that the Syndic, in consideration of the authority which he exercised when abroad, should remain under the rule of due discipline at home.

So soon as she understood the nature of the debate between her husband and his guest, she declared roundly, that the former, instead of having occasion for more wine, had got too much already, and, far from using, in furtherance of his request, any of the huge bunch of keys which hung by a silver chain at his waist, she turned her back on him without ceremony, and ushered Quentin to the neat and pleasant apartment in which he was to spend the night, armed such appliances to rest and comfort as probably he had till that moment been entirely a stranger to; so much did the wealthy Flemings care, not merely the poor and rude Scots, but the French themselves, in all the conveniences of domestic life.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE FLIGHT.

How did we say,
And I will strive with things impossible;
Yes, get the better of them.

Set on your feet;
And, with a lusty arm and, I assure you,
To do I know not what.—John Gower.

In spite of a mixture of joy and fear, doubt, anxiety, and other agitating passions, the exhausting fatigue of the preceding day was powerful enough to throw the young Scot into a deep and profound repose, which lasted until late on the day following; when his worthy host entered the apartment, with looks of care on his brow.

He seated himself by his guest's bedside, and began a long and complicated discourse upon the domestic duties of a married life, and especially upon the great power and right supremacy which a became married men to sustain in all differences of opinion with their wives. Quentin listened with some anxiety, he knew that husbands, like other belligerent powers, were sometimes disposed to say Tu Idem, rather to conceal a defeat than to celebrate a victory, and he hastened to probe the matter more closely, by hoping their arrival had been attended with no inconvenience to the good lady of the household.

"Inconvenience? no," answered the Burgomaster. "No woman can be less taken unawares than Mother Mabel, always happy to see her friends—ways a clean lodging and a handsome meal ready for them, with God's blessing on bed and board—no woman on earth so hospitable—only 'us pety' temper is something particular."

"Our residence here is disagreeable to her, is short?" said the Scot, starting out of bed, and beginning to dress himself hastily. "Were I but sure the Lady Isabelle were fit for travel after the business of the last night, we would not increase the offence by remaining here an instant longer."

"Nay," said Pavillon, "that is just what the young lady herself said to Mother Mabel; and truly I saw you saw the colour that came to her face as she said it—a milkmaid that has chased five miles to market against the frost wind is a lady compared to it—I do not wonder Mother Mabel may be a little jealous, poor dear soul."

"Has the Lady Isabelle then left her apartment?" said the youth, continuing his toilette operations with more despatch than before.

"Yes," replied Pavillon; "and she expects your approach with much impatience, to discuss the way you shall go—since you are both determined on going. But I trust you will tarry breakfast."

"Why did you not tell me this sooner?" said Durward, impatiently.

"Softly—softly," said the Syndic; "I have told a you too soon, I think, if it puts you into such a hasty flutter. Now I have some more matters for you, if I saw you had some patience to listen to me."

"Speak it, worthy sir, as soon and as fast as you can—I listen devoutly."

"Well, then," resumed the Burgomaster, "I have but one word to say, and that is, that Trudchen, who is so sorry to part with yonder pretty lady as I she had been some sister of hers, wants you to take some other disguise, for there is word in the town that the Ladies of Croys travel the country in pilgrim's dress, attended by a French life-guardman of the Scottish Archers, and it is said one of them was brought into Schonwaldt last night by a Bohemian after he had left it, and it was said still further that the same Bohemian had assured William de la March that you were charged with no message either to him or to the good people of Lure, and that you had stolen away the young Countess, and travelled with her as her paramour. And all this news hath come from Schonwaldt this morning, and it has been told to us and the other councillors, who know not what to advise; for though our own opinion is that William de la March has been a thought too rough both with the Bishop and with ourselves, yet there is a great belief that he is a good natured soul at bottom—that is, when he is sober—and that he is the only leader in the world to command us against the Duke of Burgundy; and, in truth, as matters stand, it is partly my own mind that we must keep far from him, for we have gone too far to draw back."

"Your daughter advises well," said Quentin Durward, abstaining from reproaches or exhortations, which he saw would be alike unavailing to effect a resolution, which had been adopted by the wiser magistrates in compliance at once with the prejudice of his party and the inclination of his wife. "Your daughter counsels well—We must part as we came, and that instantly. We stop, I trust, the ask you for the necessary secrecy, and for the means of escape?"

"With all my heart—with all my heart," said the honest citizen, who, not much satisfied with the display of his own conduct, was eager to find some mode of atonement. "I cannot but remember that I owed you my life last night, both for unclasp[ing] that accursed steel doublet, and helping me through the street scrape, which was worse; for yonder Boar and his brood look more like devils than men. So I will be true to you as blade to hilt, as our cutlers say, who are the best in the whole world. Nay, now you are ready, come this way—you shall see how far I can trust you."

The Syndic led him from the chamber in which he had slept to his own counting-room, in which he transacted his affairs of business; and after bolting the door, and casting a piercing and careful eye around him, he opened a concealed and vaulted closet behind the tapestry, in which stood more than one iron chest. He proceeded to open one which was full of guilders, and placed it at Quentin's discretion, to take whatever sum he might think necessary for his companion's expenses and his own.

As the money with which Quentin was furnished in leaving Plessis was now nearly expended, he hesitated not to accept the sum of two hundred guilders, and by doing so took a great weight from the mind of Pavillon, who considered the desperate transaction in which he thus voluntarily became the creditor, as an atonement for the breach of hospitality which various considerations in a great measure compelled him to commit.

Having carefully locked his treasure-chamber, the faithful Fleming next conveyed his guest to the parlor, where, in full possession of her activity of mind and body, though pale from the scenes of the preceding night, he found the Countess attired in the fashion of a Flemish maiden of the middling class. No other was present excepting Trudchen, who was industriously employed in completing the Countess's dress, and in instructing her how to bear herself. She extended her hand to him, which, when he had reverently kissed, she said to him, "Signior Quentin, we must leave our friends here, unless I would bring on them a part of the misery which has pursued me ever since my father's death. You must change your dress and go with me, unless you also are tired of befriending a being so unfortunate."

"I! I tired of being your attendant!—To the end of the earth will I guard you! But you—you yourself—are you equal to the task you undertake?—Can you, after the terrors of last night?"

"Do not recall them to my memory," answered the Countess; "I remember but the confusion of a hard dream. Has the excellent Bishop escaped?"

"I trust he is in freedom," said Quentin, making signs to Pavillon, who seemed about to enter on the faithful narrative, to be silent.

"Is it possible for us to rejoin him?—Hath he gathered any power?" said the lady.

"His only hopes are in Heaven," said the Scot; "but wherever you wish to go, I stand by your side, a determined guide and guard."

"We will consider," said Isabelle; and after a moment's pause, she added, "A convent would be my choice, but that I fear it would prove a weak defence against those who pursue me."

"Hem! hem!" said the Syndic, "I could not recommend a convent within the district of Liège; because the Boar of Ardenne, though in the time a brave leader, a trusty confederate, and a well-wisher to our city, has, nevertheless, rough humours, and payeth, on the whole, little regard to cloisters, convents, nunneries, and the like. Men say that there are a score of nuns—that is, such as were nuns—who march always with his company."

"Get yourself in readiness hastily, Signior Durward," said Isabelle, interrupting this detail, "since your faith I must needs commit myself."

As soon as the Syndic and Quentin left the room, then Isabelle began to ask of Gertrude various questions concerning the roads, and so forth, with such assurance of spirit and pertinence, that the latter could not help exclaiming, "Lady, I wonder at you!—I have heard of masculine firmness, but yours appears to me more than belongs to humanity."

"Necessity," answered the Countess—"necessity, my friend, is the mother of courage, as of invention. No long time since, I might have fainted when I saw a drop of blood shed from a trifling cut—I have seen men's life-blood flow around me, I may say, in waves, yet I have retained my senses and my self-possession.—Do not think it was an easy task," she added, laying on Gertrude's arm a trembling hand, although she still spoke with a firm voice; "the little world within me is like a garrison besieged by a thousand foes, whom nothing but the most determined resolution can keep from storming it on every hand, and at every moment. Were my situation one whit less perilous than it is—were I not sensible that my only chance to escape a fate more horrible than death, is to retain my recollection and self-possession—Gertrude, I would at this moment throw myself into your arms, and relieve my bursting bosom by such a transport of tears and agony of terror, as never rushed from a breaking heart!"

"Do not do so, lady!" said the sympathizing Fleming; "take courage, tell your beads, throw yourself on the care of Heaven; and surely, if ever Heaven sent a deliverer to one ready to perish, that bold and adventurous young gentleman must be designed for yours. There is one, too," she added, blushing deeply, "in whom I have some interest. Say nothing to my father; but I have ordered my bachelor, Hans Glover, to wait for you at the eastern gate, and never to see my face more, unless he brings word that he has guided you safe from the territory."

To kiss her tenderly was the only way in which the young Countess could express her thanks to the frank and kind-hearted city maiden, who returned the embrace affectionately, and added, with a smile, "Nay, if two maidens and their devoted bachelors cannot succeed in a disguise and an escape, the world is changed from what I am told it went to be."

A part of this speech again called the colour into the Countess's pale cheeks, which was not unnoticed by Quentin's warden appearance. He entered completely attired as a Flemish boor of the better class, in the holiday suit of Peter, who expressed his interest in the young Scot by the readiness with which he parted with it for his use; and swore, at the same time, that, were he to be curried and tugged worse than ever was bullock's hide, they should make nothing out of him, to the betraying of the young folk. Two stout horses had been provided by the activity of Mother Mabel, who really desired the Countess and her attendant no harm, so that she could make her own house and family clear of the dangers which might attend upon harbouring them. She bade them mount and go off with great satisfaction, after telling them that they would find their way to the east gate by keeping their eye on Peter, who was to walk in that direction as their guide, but without holding any visible communication with them.

The instant her guests had departed, Mother Mabel took the opportunity to read a long practical lecture to Trudchen upon the folly of reading romances, whereby the flaunting ladies of the Court were grown so bold and venturesome, that, instead of applying to learn some honest housewifery, they must ride, forsooth, a dangle errant through the country, with no better attendant than some idle squire, debauched page, or rake-belly archer from foreign parts, so the great danger of their health, the impoverishing of their substance, and the irreparable prejudice of their reputation.

All this Gertrude heard in silence, and without reply; but, considering her character, it might be doubted whether she derived from it the practical inference which it was her mother's purpose to enforce.

Meantime, the travellers had gained the eastern gate of the city, traversing crowds of people, who were fortunately too much busied in the political events and rumours of the hour, to give any attention to a couple who had so little to render their appearance remarkable. They passed the guards in virtue of a permission obtained for them by Pavillon, but in the name of his colleague Haseker, and they took leave of Peter Gansler with a friendly though brief exchange of good wishes on either side. Immediately afterwards, they were joined by a stout young man, riding a good grey horse, who presently made himself known as Hans Glover, the bachelor of Trudchen Pavilion. He was a young fellow with a good Flemish countenance—not, indeed, of the most intellectual cast, but arguing more hilarity and good humour than wit, and, as the Countess could not help thinking, scarce worthy to be bachelor to the generous Trudchen. He seemed, however, fully desirous to second the views which she had formed in their favour; for, saluting them respectfully, he asked of the Countess in Flemish, on which read she desired to be conducted?

"Guide me," said she, "towards the nearest town on the frontiers of Brabant."

"You have thus settled the end and object of your journey?" said Quentin, approaching his horse to that of Isabelle, and speaking French, which their guide did not understand.

"Surely," replied the young lady; "for, situated as I now am, it must be of no small detriment to me if I were to prolong a journey in my present circumstances, even though the termination should be a rigorous prison."

"A prison?" said Quentin.

"Yes, my friend, a prison; but I will take care that you shall not share it."

"Do not talk—do not think of me," said Quentin.

"Saw I you but safe, my own concerns are little worth minding."

"Do not speak so loud," said the Lady Isabelle; "you will surprise our guide—you see he has already rode on before us;"—for, in truth, the good natured Fleming, doing as he desired to be done by, had removed from them the constraint of a third person, upon Quentin's first motion towards the lady. "You," she continued, when she noticed they were free from observation, "to you, my friend, my protector, why should I be ashamed to call you what Heaven has made you to me?—to you it is my duty to say that my resolution is taken to return to my native country, and to throw myself on the mercy of the Duke of Burgundy. It was mistaken, though well-meant advice, which induced me ever to withdraw from his protection, and place myself under that of the crafty and false Louis of France."

"And you resolve to become the bride, then, of the Count of Campo-basso, the unworthy favourite of Charles?"

Thus spoke Quentin, with a voice in which internal agony struggled with his desire to assume an indifferent tone, like that of the poor condemned criminal, when, affecting a firmness which he is far from feeling, he asks if the death-warrant be arrived.

"No, Durward, no," said the Lady Isabelle, sitting up erect in her saddle, "in that fatal condition all Burgundy's power shall not snare a daughter of the House of Croye. Burgundy may enter on my lands and fish, he may imprison my person in a convent, but that is the worst I have to expect; and worse than that I will endure ere I give my hand to Campo-basso."

"The worst?" said Quentin; "and what worse can there be than plunder and imprisonment? Oh, think, while you have God's free air around you, and one by your side who will hazard life to conduct you to England, to Germany, even to Scotland, in all of which you shall find generous protectors—O, while this is the case, do not resolve so rashly to abandon the means of liberty, the best gift that Heaven gives!—O well sung a poet of my own land—

"Ah, freedom is a noble thing—Freedom makes men to have living—Freedom the out to pleasure gives—His lives at ease who freely lives.
Grief, distress, poverty, want, are all Gather'd up within the name of that!"

She listened with a melancholy smile to her guide's ode in praise of liberty; and then answered, after a moment's pause, "Freedom is for man alone—women must ever seek a protector, since nature made her incapable to defend herself. And where am I to find one?—Is that voluptuary Edward of England—in the inebriated Wenceslaus of Germany—in Scotland?—Ah, Durward, were I your sister, and could you promise me shelter in some of those mountain-glands which you love to describe, where, for change, or for the few jewels I have preserved, I might lead an unharassed life, and forget the lot I was born to—could you promise me the protection of some honoured matron of the land—of some baron whose heart was as true as his sword—that were indeed a prospect, for which it were worth the risk of future censure to wander farther and wider?"

There was a faltering tenderness of voice with which the Countess Isabelle made this admission, that at once filled Quentin with a sensation of joy, and cut him to the very heart. He hesitated a moment ere he made an answer, hastily reviewing in his mind the possibility there might be that he could procure her shelter in Scotland; but the melancholy truth rushed on him, that it would be alike banal and cruel to point out to her a course, which he had not the most distant power or means to render safe. "Lady," he said at last, "I should act feebly against my honour and oath of chivalry, did I suffer you to ground any plan upon the thoughts that I have the power in Scotland to afford you other protection than that of the poor arm which is now by your side. I scarce know that my blood flows in the veins of an individual who now lives in my native land. The Knight of Inverquharney stormed our castle at midnight, and cut off all that belonged to my name. Were I again in Scotland, our feudal enemies so numerous and powerful, I single and weak; and even had the King a desire to do me justice, he dared not, for the sake of redressing the wrongs of a poor individual, provoke a chief who rides with five hundred horse."

"Alas!" said the Countess, "there is then no corner of the world safe from oppression, since it rises as unrestrained amongst these wild hills which afford us few objects to covet, as in our rich and crowded Lowlands?"

"It is a sad truth, and I dare not deny it," said the Scot, "that, for little more than the pleasure of revenge and the lust of bloodshed, our people charge the work of executioners on each other; and Ogilvie and the like act the same scenes in Scotland, as De la March and his robbers do in the country."

"No more of Scotland, then," said Isabelle, with a tone of indifference, either real or affected—"no more of Scotland,—which indeed I mentioned but to see, if you really dared recommend to me a place of rest, the most distracted kingdom in the world. It was but a trial of your sincerity, which I reject to see may be relied on, even when your pretensions are most strongly excited. So, once more I will think of no other protection than can be offered by the first honourable baron holding of Dalcharlie, to whom I am determined to render myself."

"And why not rather betake yourself to your own estate, and to your own strong castle, as you did when at Tours?" said Quentin. "Why not surround you the vassals of your father, and make treaty with Burgundy, rather than surrender yourself to him? Surely there must be many a bold man that would fight in your cause; and I know at least of one, who would willingly lay down his life to go example."

"Alas!" said the Countess, "that ardent suggestion of the crafty Louis, and, like all which ever suggested, designed more for his advantage than for mine, has become impracticable, even as I was betrayed to Burgundy by the double traitor Zamel Mangrabe. My kinsmen was then captured, and my house garrisoned. Any attempt mine would but expose my dependants to the vengeance of Duke Charles, and why should I become more bloodshed than has already taken place on a worthless an account? No, I will submit myself to my Sovereign as a dutiful vassal, in all which I have my personal freedom of action unimpeded; I rather than I trust my kinswoman, the Countess who first counselled, and indeed urged has already taken this wise and honourable kinswoman!" repeated Quentin, awakened to which the young Countess was a and which the rapid succession of perilous events, had, as matters of nearer concern, faded from his memory.

My aunt—the Countess Hameline of Croye—ought of her?" said the Countess Isabelle, "trust she is now under the protection of Indian banner.—You are silent! Know you her?"

At question, urged in a tone of the most inquiry, obliged Quentin to give some account of what he knew of the Countess's fate. He said that he had been summoned to attend a light from Liege, which he had no doubt Isabelle would be partaker in—he mentioned every that had been made after they had left the forest—and finally, he told his own recollection of the castle, and the circumstances in which he had been taken. But he said nothing of the views with which he had seen the Lady Hameline had left the Schonwaldt, and as little about the float-of her having fallen into the hands of William de la Marck. Delicacy prevented his even mentioning the one, and regard for the feelings of his aunt, at a moment when strength and exertion most demanded of her, prevented him from alluding to the latter, which had, besides, only been a mere rumour.

He, though abridged of those important particulars, made a strong impression on the Countess. She, after riding some time in silence, said at last, in a tone of cold displeasure, "And so you leave my unfortunate relative in a wild forest, the mercy of a wild Bohemian and a traitorous kinswoman?—Poor kinswoman, thou wert wont to be a youth's good faith!"

"Not done so, madam," said Quentin, not unreasonably offended at the turn thus given to his conversation. "What had been the fate of one to whose aunt, the Countess Hameline of Croye, to the charge of whom she had herself selected as counsellors, the Countess Isabelle had been entrusted by William de la Marck, the Wild Boar of the forest?"

"You are right," said the Countess Isabelle, in a calmer manner; "and I, who have the advantage of a more ardent devotion, have done you foul and wrong. But oh, my unhappy kinswoman! wretch Marthon, who enjoyed so much of your confidence, and deserved it so little—it was she who seduced to my kinswoman the wretched and Hayraddin Maugrabin, who, by their knowledge in soothsaying and astrology, and a great ascendancy over her mind; it was by strengthening their predictions, encouraged her to know not what to call them—delusions of the senses, matches and lovers, which my kinswoman rendered ungraceful and improbable. At that, from the beginning, we have been seduced by these snares by Louis of France, in order to determine us to take refuge at his Court, or to put ourselves into his power; after which, on our part, how unkingly, unknightly, and gentleman-like, he hath conducted himself towards us, you, Quentin Durward, can bear witness."

But alas! my kinswoman—what think you of her fate?"

Quentin, desiring to inspire hopes which he scarce dared answer, that the avarice of these men was stronger than any other passion; that even when he left them, seemed to act as the Lady Hameline's protectress; and, in fact, it was difficult to conceive any object these could accomplish by the ill usage or murder of the Countess, whereas they might be gainers by her death, and putting her to ransom.

The Countess Isabelle's thoughts from this subject, Quentin frankly told her the contents of the Maugrabin, which he had discovered in the night-quarter near Namur, and which appeared the result of an agreement betwixt the King and William de la Marck. Isabelle shuddered with horror, and then recovering herself, said, "I am ashamed, and I have sinned in permitting myself so far to doubt of the saints' protection, as for an instant to have deemed possible the accomplishment of a scheme so utterly cruel, base, and dishonourable, while there are pitying eyes in Heaven to look down on human miseries. It is not a thing to be thought of with fear or abhorrence, but to be rejected as such a piece of incredible treachery and villainy, as it were atheism to believe could ever be successful. But I now see plainly why that hypocritical Marthon often seemed to foster every seed of petty jealousy or discontent betwixt my poor kinswoman and myself, whilst she always mixed with flattery, addressed to the individual who was present, whatever could prejudice her against her absent kinswoman. Yet never did I dream she could have proceeded so far as to have caused my once affectionate kinswoman to have left me behind in the perils of Schonwaldt, while she made her own escape."

"Did the Lady Hameline not mention to you, then," said Quentin, "her intended flight?"

"No," replied the Countess, "but she alluded to some communication which Marthon was to make to me. To say truth, my poor kinswoman's head was so turned by the mysterious jargon of the miserable Hayraddin, whom that day she had admitted to a long and secret conference, and she threw out so many strange hints, that—that—in short, I cared not to press on her, when in that humour, for any explanation. Yet it was cruel to leave me behind her."

"I will excuse the Lady Hameline from intending such unkindness," said Quentin; "for such was the agitation of the moment, and the darkness of the hour, that I believe the Lady Hameline as certainly conceived herself accompanied by her niece, as I at the same time, deceived by Marthon's dress and demeanour, supposed I was in the company of both the Ladies of Croye:—and of her especially," he added, with a low but determined voice, "without whom the wealth of worlds would not have tempted me to leave Schonwaldt."

Isabelle stooped her head forward, and seemed scarce to hear the emphasis with which Quentin had spoken. But she turned her face to him again when he began to speak of the policy of Louis; and it was not difficult for them, by mutual communication, to ascertain that the Bohemian brothers, with their accomplice Marthon, had been the agents of that crafty monarch, although Zanet, the elder of them, with a perfidy peculiar to his race, had attempted to play a double game, and had been punished accordingly. In the same humour of mutual confidence, and forgetting the singularity of their own situation, as well as the perils of the road, the travellers pursued their journey for several hours, only stopping to refresh their horses at a retired dorf, or hamlet, to which they were conducted by Hans Glover, who, in all other respects, as well as in leaving them much to their own freedom in conversation, conducted himself like a person of reflection and discretion.

Meantime, the artificial distinction which divided the two lovers, (for such we may now term them,) seemed dissolved, or removed, by the circumstances in which they were placed; for if the Countess boasted the higher rank, and was by birth entitled to a fortune incalculably larger than that of the youth, whose revenue lay in his sword, it was to be considered that, for the present, she was as poor as he, and for her safety, honour, and life, exclusively indebted to his presence of mind, valour, and devotion. They spoke not indeed of love, for though the young lady, her heart full of gratitude and confidence, might have pardoned such a declaration, yet Quentin, on whose tongue there was laid a check, both by natural timidity and by the sentiments of chivalry, would have held it an unworthy abuse of her situation had he said any thing which could have the appearance of taking undue advantage of the opportunities which it afforded them. They spoke not then of love, but the thoughts of it were on both sides unavoidable; and then they were placed in that relation to each other, in which sentiments of mutual regard are rather understood than announced, and which, with the freedom which it permits, and the uncertainties that attend it, often forms the most delightful hours of human existence, and as frequently leads to those which are darkened by disappointment, sickness, and all the pains of blighted hope and unrequited attachment.

It was two hours after noon, when the travellers were alarmed by the report of the guide, who, with paleness and horror in his countenance, said that they were pursued by a party of De la March's Schwarz-reiters. These soldiers, or rather bandits, were bands levied in the Lower Circle of Germany, and resembled the lanzknechts in every particular, except that the former acted as light cavalry. To maintain the name of Black Troopers, and to strike additional terror into their enemies, they usually rode on black chargers, and smeared with black ointment their arms and accoutrements, in which operation their hands and faces often had their share. In morals and in ferocity these Schwarz-reiters emulated their pedestrian brethren the lanzknechts.*

On looking back, and discovering along the long level road which they had traversed a cloud of dust advancing, with one or two of the headmost troopers riding furiously in front of it, Quentin addressed his companion—"Dearest Isabelle, I have no weapon left save my sword, but since I cannot fight for you, I will fly with you. Could we gain yonder wood that is before us ere they come up, we may easily find means to escape."

"So be it, my only friend," said Isabelle, pressing her horse to the gallop; "and thou, good fellow," she added, addressing Hans Glover, "get thee off to another road, and do not stay to partake our misfortune and danger."

The honest Fleming shook his head, and answered her generous exhortation, with Nicht, nicht! das geht nicht,† and continued to attend them, all three riding towards the shelter of the wood as fast as their jaded horses could go, pursued, at the same time, by the Schwarz-reiters, who increased their pace when they saw them fly. But notwithstanding the fatigue of the horses, still the fugitives, being unarmed, and riding lighter in consequence, had considerably the advantage of the pursuers, and were within about a quarter of a mile of the wood, when a body of men-at-arms, under a knight's pennon, was discovered advancing from the cover, so as to intercept their flight.

"They have bright armour," said Isabelle; "they must be Burgundians. Be they who they will, we must yield to them, rather than to the lawless miscreants who pursue us."

A moment after, she exclaimed, looking on the pennon, "I know the cloven heart which it displays! It is the banner of the Count of Crèvecoeur, a noble Burgundian—to him I will surrender myself."

Quentin Durward sighed; but what other alternative remained? and how happy would he have been but an instant before, to have been certain of the escape of Isabelle, even under worse terms? They soon joined the band of Crèvecoeur, and the Countess demanded to speak to the leader, who had halted his party till he should recognise the Black Troopers; and as he gazed on her with doubt and uncertainty, she said, "Noble Count, Isabelle of Croye, the daughter of your old companion in arms, Count Reinold of Croye, renders herself, and asks protection from your valour for her and hers."

"Thou shalt have it, fair kinswoman, were it against a host—always stopping my lie Burgundy. But there is little time to talk: filthy looking fiends have made a halt, intended to dispute the matter—By Saint Burgundy, they have the insolence to advance the banner of Crèvecoeur!—What! w knaves be ruled?—Daimein, my lance—Adner—Lay your spears in the rest—Crèvecoeur!"

Crying his war-cry, and followed by his arms, he galloped rapidly forward to the Schwarz-reiters.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE SURRENDER.

James or none, Sir Knight, I am your capt!
But with me what your nobleness suggests!
Thinking the chance of war may one day give!
Where I must now be reckon'd—'t' the roll
Of melancholy prisoners.—Anonymous.

THE skirmish betwixt the Schwarz-reit Burgundian men-at-arms lasted scarcely a few minutes, so soon were the former put to the superiority of the latter, in armour, weight and military spirit. In less than the space mentioned, the Count of Crèvecoeur, with sword upon his horse's mane ere he should back to the verge of the forest, where he had remained a spectator of the combat. One people followed him, while the other continued the flying enemy for a little space causeway.

"It is a shame," said the Count, "that of knights and gentlemen should be the blood of those brutal swine."

So saying, he returned his weapon to and added, "This is a rough welcome to my pretty cousin, but wandering princes must expect such adventures. And well I can assure you, let me assure you, the Black Troopers countess's coronet as little as a country-w and I think your return is not qualified assistance."

"My Lord Count," said the Lady Isabelle, "out farther preface, let me know if I am and where you are to conduct me."

"You know, you silly child," answered "how I would answer that question, do my own will. But you and your fool-making, marriage-hunting aunt, have made use of your wings of late, that I fear you contented to fold them up in a cage for a For my part, my duty, and it is a sad ended when I have conducted you to the Duke, at Peronne; for which purpose, I came to deliver the command of this party to my nephew, Count Stephen, who with you thither, as I think you may need see—And I hope the young giddy pate will his duty wisely."

"So please you, fair uncle," said Count "if you doubt my capacity to conduct arms, even remain with them yourself, as the servant and guard of the Countess Croye."

"No doubt, fair nephew," answered "this were a goodly improvement on my methinks I like it as well in the way I Please you, therefore, to take notice, that now here is not to hunt after and stick to hogs, for which you seemed but now to be a special vocation, but to collect and bring tidings what is going forward in the count concerning which we hear such wild rum some half score of lances follow me, and main with my banner, under your guidance. * Pyrrus describes this species of soldiers as follows:—"He that at this day looks upon their Schwarz-reiters, (that is, Black horsemen) must confess, that to make their horses and bodies shine they make themselves as black as soldiers. These horsemen wear black clothes and poor though they be, spend an small time in brushing them. The most of them have black horses, which while they painfully dress, and as I have said, delight to have their boots and shoes shine with hickling stuff, their hands and faces become black, and thereof they have their famous name. Yet I have heard Germans say, that they do this only to make themselves black to seem more terrible to their enemies."—Pyrrus Monarch's History. Edition 1637, p. 168.

"The Countess of Croy," said Quentin, "is best judge if I have rendered any service, and to her I refer you on that matter. My answers you will yourself judge of when you ask me your questions."

"Umph!—haughty enough," muttered the Count of Crèvecoeur, "and very like one that wears a lady's favour in his hat, and thinks he must carry things with a high tone, to honour the precious remnant of silk and tinsel. —Well, sir, I trust it will be no abatement of your dignity, if you answer me how long you have been about the person of the Lady Isabella of Croy?"

"Count of Crèvecoeur," said Quentin Durward, "if I answer questions which are asked in a tone approaching towards insult, it is only least injurious inference should be drawn from my silence respecting one to whom we are both obliged to render justice. I have acted as escort to the Lady Isabella since she left France to return into Flanders."

"Ho! ho!" said the Count; "and that is to say, since she fled from Poitiers-le-Tours?—You, an Archer of the Scottish Guard, accompanied her, of course, by the express orders of King Louis?"

However little Quentin thought himself indebted to the King of France, who, in contriving the surprise of the Countess Isabella by William de la March, had probably calculated on the young Scotsman being slain in her defence, he did not yet conceive himself at liberty to betray any trust which Louis had reposed, or had seemed to repose in him, and therefore replied to Count Crèvecoeur's question, "that it was sufficient for him to have the authority of his superior officer for what he had done, and he inquired no further."

"It is quite sufficient," said the Count. "We know the King does not permit his officers to send the Archers of his Guard to France like paladins by the bridle-rein of wandering ladies, unless he hath some politic purpose to serve. It will be difficult for King Louis to continue to aver so boldly, that he knew not of the Ladies of Croy's having escaped from France, since they were escorted by one of his own Life-guard.—And whither, Sir Archer, was your retreat directed?"

"To Lange, my lord," answered the Scot; "where the ladies desired to be placed under the protection of the late Bishop."

"The late Bishop?" exclaimed the Count of Crèvecoeur; "is Louis of Bourbon dead?—Not a word of his illness had reached the Duke—Of what did he die?"

"He sleeps in a bloody grave, my lord—that is, if his murderers have conferred one on his remains."

"Murdered?" exclaimed Crèvecoeur again—"Holy Mother of Heaven!—young man, it is impossible!"

"I saw the deed done with my own eyes, and many an act of horror besides."

"Saw it! and made not in to help the good Prelate?" exclaimed the Count, "or to raise the castle against his murderers?—Know'st thou not, that even to look on such a deed, without punishing it, is profane sacrilege?"

"To be brief, my lord," said Durward, "on the spot was done, the castle was stormed by the blood-thirsty William de la March, with the help of the insurgent Langue."

"I am struck with thunder!" said Crèvecoeur. "Lange in insurrection?—Schonwaldt taken?—the Bishop murdered?—Murmurer of sorrow never did one man unfold such a packet of woes!"

"Speak—know you of this assault—of this insurrection—of this murder?—Speak—then art one of Louis's trusted Archers, and it is he that has aimed this painful arrow.—Speak, or I will have thee torn with wild horses!"

"And if I am so torn, my lord, there can be nothing rent out of me, that may not become a true Scottish gentleman. I know no more of these villanies than you,—was so far from being partaker in them, that I would have withstood them to the uttermost, had my means, in a twentieth degree, equalled my inclination. But what could I do?—they were hundreds, and I but one. My only care was to rescue the Countess Isabelle, and in that I was happily successful. Yet, had I been near enough when the ruffian deed was so cruelly done on the old man, I had saved his gray hairs, or I had avenged them; and as it was, my abhorrence was spoken loud enough to prevent other horrors."

"I believe thee, youth," said the Count; "thou art neither of an age nor nature to be trusted with such bloody work, however well fitted to be the squire of dames. But alas! for the kind and generous Prelate, to be murdered on the hearth where he so often entertained the stranger with Christian charity and princely bounty—and that by a wretch, a monster! a portentous growth of blood and cruelty!—bred up in the very hall where he has imbrued his hands in his benefactor's blood! But I know not Charles of Burgundy—nay, I should doubt of the justice of Heaven,—if vengeance be not as sharp, and sudden, and severe, as this villany has been unexampled in atrocity. And, if no other shall pursue the murderer,"—here he paused, grasped his sword, then quitting his bridle, struck both gauntleted hands upon his breast, until his corselet clattered, and finally held them up to Heaven, as he solemnly continued—"I—I, Philip Crèvecoeur of Cordes, make a vow to God, Saint Lambert, and the Three Kings of Cologne, that small shall be my thought of other earthly concerns, till I take full revenge on the murderers of the good Louis of Bourbon, whether I find them in forest or field, in city or in country, in hall or plain, in King's court, or in God's church! and thereto I pledge lands and living, friends and followers, life and honour. So help me God and Saint Lambert of Lège, and the Three Kings of Cologne!"

When the Count of Crèvecoeur had made his vow, his mind seemed in some sort relieved from the overwhelming grief and astonishment with which he had heard the fatal tragedy that had been acted at Schonwaldt, and he proceeded to question Durward more minutely concerning the particulars of that disastrous affair, which the Scot, nowise desirous to abate the spirit of revenge which the Count entertained against William de la March, gave him at full length.

"But those blind, unsteady, faithless, fickle beasts, the Ligeois," said the Count, "that they should have combined themselves with this execrable robber and murderer, to put to death their lawful Prince!"

Durward here informed the enraged Burgundian that the Ligeois, or at least the better class of them, however rashly they had run into the rebellion against their Bishop, had no design, so far as appeared to him, to aid in the execrable deed of De la March; but, on the contrary, would have prevented it if they had had the means, and were struck with horror when they beheld it.

"Speak not of the faithless, inconstant, plebeian rabble!" said Crèvecoeur. "When they took arms against a Prince, who had no fault, save that he was too kind and too good a master for such a set of ungrateful slaves—when they armed against him, and broke into his peaceful house, what could there be in their intention but murder?—when they banded themselves with the wild Boar of Ardenne, the greatest homicide in the marches of Flanders, what else could there be in their purpose but murder, which is the very trade he lives by? And again, was it not one of their own vile rabble who did the very deed, by their own account?—I hope to see their canals running blood by the light of their burning houses. Oh, the kind, noble, generous lord, whom they have slaughtered!—Other vassals have rebelled under the pressure of imposts and penury; but the men of Lège, in the fulness of insolence and plenty."—He again abandoned the reins of his war-horse, and waving bitterly the hands, which his mail-gloves rendered untractable. Quentin easily as grief which he manifested was augments better recollection of past intercourse with the sufferer, and was silent according to feelings which he was unwilling to and at the same time felt it impossible to

But the Count of Crèvecoeur returned again to the subject—questioned him on particulars of the surprise of Schonwaldt, of the Bishop, and then suddenly, as if collected something which had escaped him, demanded what had become of the Lady and why she was not with her kinswomen he added contemptuously, "that I consider as at all a loss to the Countess! although she was her kinswoman, as whole a well-meaning woman, yet if Cologne never produced such a fantastic hold it for certain, that her niece, who always observed to be a modest and of woman, was led into the absurd frolic of Burgundy to France, by that blundering old, match-making and match-seeking

What a speech for a romantic lover to hear, too, when it would have been in him to attempt what it was impossible achieve,—namely, to convince the Count ardent, that he did foul wrong to the Countess in sense as in beauty—in her modest and orderly young woman; who might have been predated with proper daughter of a sunburnt peasant, who living the oxen, while her father held the plow then, to suppose her under the dominion, prime guidance of a silly and romantic slander should have been repelled down derider's throat. But the open, though a agony of the Count of Crèvecoeur, the tempt which he seemed to entertain for ings which were uppermost in Quentin overawed him; not for fear of the Count ardent—that was a risk which would have his desire of making out a challenge—by ridicule, the weapon of all others most enthusiasts of every description, and who predominance over such minds, often ch absurd, and fully as often smothered the noble.

Under the influence of this fear, of his object of scorn rather than resentment though with some pain, confined his report account of the Lady Helmine to her escape from Schonwaldt before the place. He could not, indeed, have made very distinct, without throwing ridicule relation of Isabelle, and perhaps incurring self, as having been the object of her expectations. He added to his embarrassment that he had heard a report, though a vain, the Lady Helmine having again fallen hands of William de la March.

"I trust in Saint Lambert that he will," said Crèvecoeur; "as, indeed, he is likely to do, for the sake of her money-bags; and I ly to knock her on the head, so soon as either secured in his own grasp, or, emptied."

The Count then proceeded to ask questions concerning the mode in which both conducted themselves on the journey, of intimacy to which they admitted Quentin and other trying particulars, that, vexed and angry, the youth was scarce able to contain himself from the keen-sighted soldier, who seemed suddenly disposed to tell him, saying, at the same time, "I'mph—I conjectured, on one side at least, I trust party has kept her senses better. Come, spur on, and keep the van, while I fall in course with the Lady Isabelle. I think I ed now so much from you, that I can tell these sad passages without hurting her as I have fretted yours a little.—Yet stay, you—one word are you go. You have had d to leave the Countess Isabelle, whom the l fatigue of yesterday, joined to a flight of since morning, and the various distressing s by which it was accompanied, had made of travelling farther, with safety to her.

 The Count consigned her, in a state of aution, to the care of the Abbess of the convent in Charleroi, a noble lady, to th the families of Crèveœur and Croye ed, and in whose prudence and kindness he use confidence.

 also to mount a guard of honour upon the convent during the residence of the Countess Isabelle of Croye,—ostensibly to secure her safety, but perhaps secretly to prevent her attempting to escape.

 The Count only assigned as a cause for the garrison being vigilant, some vague rumours which he had heard of disturbances in the Bishopric of Liege. But he was determined himself to be the first who should carry the formidable news of the insurrection and the murder of the Bishop, in all their horrible reality, to Duke Charles; and for that purpose, having procured fresh horses for himself and suite, he mounted with the resolution of continuing his journey to Peronne without stopping for repose; and informing Quentin Durward that he must attend him, he made, at the same time, a mock apology for parting fair company, but hoped, that to so devoted a squire of dames a night's journey by moonshine would be more agreeable, than supinely to yield himself to slumber like an ordinary mortal.

Quentin, already sufficiently afflicted by finding that he was to be parted from Isabelle, longed to answer this taunt with an indignant defiance; but aware that the Count would only laugh at his anger, and despise his challenge, he resolved to wait some future time, when he might have an opportunity of obtaining some amends from this proud lord, who, though for very different reasons, had become nearly as odious to him as the Wild Boar of Ardennes himself. He therefore assented to Crèveœur's proposal, as to what he had no choice of declining, and they pursued in company, and with all the despatch they could exert, the road between Charleroi and Peronne.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE UNBIDDEN GUEST.

No human quality is so well wove
 In warp and woof, but there's some flaw in it.
 I've known a brave man fly a shepherd's cur,
 A wise man so demean him, drivelling idiocy
 Had well-nigh been ashamed on't. For your crafty,
 Your worldly-wise man, he, above the rest,
 Weaves his own snares so fine, he's often caught in them.
Old Play.

QUENTIN, during the earlier part of the night-journey, had to combat with that bitter heart-ach, which is felt when youth parts, and probably for ever, with her he loves. As, pressed by the urgency of the moment, and the impatience of Crèveœur, they hasted on through the rich lowlands of Hai-nault, under the benign guidance of a rich and lustrous harvest-moon, she shed her yellow influence over rich and deep pastures, woodland, and corn fields, from which the husbandmen were using her light to withdraw the grain, such was the industry of the Flemings, even at that period; she shone on broad, level, and fructifying rivers, where glided the white sail in the service of commerce, uninterrupted by rock or torrent, beside lively quiet villages, whose external decency and cleanliness expressed the ease and comfort of the inhabitants;—she gleamed upon the feudal castle of many a gallant Baron and Knight, with its deep moat, battlemented court, and high belfry,—for the chivalry of Hainault was renowned among the nobles of Europe;—and her light displayed at a distance, in its broad beam, the gigantic towers of more than one lofty minster.

Yet all this fair variety, however differing from the waste and wilderness of his own land, interrupted not the course of Quentin's regrets and sorrows. He had left his heart behind him, when he departed from Charleroi; and the only reflection which the farther journey inspired was, that every step was carrying him farther from Isabelle. His imagination was taxed to recall every word she had spoken, every look she had directed towards him; and, as happens frequently in such cases, the impression made upon his imagination by the recollection of these particulars, was even stronger than the realities themselves had excited.

At length, after the cold hour of midnight was past, in spite alike of love and of sorrow, the extreme fatigue which Quentin had undergone the two preceding days began to have an effect on him, which his habits of exercise of every kind, and his singular alertness and activity of character, as well as the painful nature of the reflections which occupied his thoughts, had hitherto prevented his experiencing. The ideas of his mind began to be so little corrected by the exertion of his senses, worn out and deadened as the latter now were by extremity of fatigue, that the visions which the former drew superseded or perverted the information conveyed by the blunted organs of seeing and hearing; and Durward was only sensible that he was awake, by the exertions which, sensible of the peril of his situation, he occasionally made, to resist falling into a deep and dead sleep. Every now and then, a strong consciousness of the risk of falling from or with his horse roused him to exertion and animation; but ere long his eyes again were dimmed by confused shades of all sorts of mingled colours, the moonlight landscape swam before them, and he was so much overcome with fatigue, that the Count of Crèvecœur, observing his condition, was at length compelled to order two of his attendants, one to each rein of Durward's bridle, in order to prevent the risk of his falling from his horse.

When at length they reached the town of Landrecy, the Count, in compassion to the youth, who had now been in a great measure without sleep for three nights, allowed himself and his retinue a halt of four hours, for rest and refreshment.

Deep and sound were Quentin's slumbers, until they were broken by the sound of the Count's trumpet, and the cry of his Fouriers and harbingers, "Débout! débout!—Ha! Messires, en route, en route!"—Yet, unwelcomely early as the tones came, they awakened him a different being in strength and spirits from what he had fallen asleep. Confidence in himself and his fortunes returned with his reviving spirits, and with the rising sun. He thought of his love no longer as a desperate and fantastic dream, but as a high and invigorating principle, to be cherished in his bosom, although he might never propose to himself, under all the difficulties by which he was beset, to bring it to any prosperous issue.—"The pilot," he reflected, "steers his bark by the polar star, although he never expects to become possessor of it; and the thoughts of Isabelle of Croye shall make me a worthy man-at-arms, though I may never see her more. When she hears that a Scottish soldier, named Quentin Durward, distinguished himself in a well-fought field, or left his body on the breach of a disputed fortress, she will remember the companion of her journey, as one who did all in his power to avert the snares and misfortunes which beset it, and perhaps will honour his memory with a tear, his coffin with a garland."

In this manly mood of bearing his misfortune, Quentin felt himself more able to receive and reply to the jests of the Count of Crèvecœur, who passed several on his alleged effeminacy and incapacity of undergoing fatigue. The young Scot accommodated himself so good-humouredly to the Count's raillery, and replied at once so happily and so respectfully, that the change of his tone and manner made obviously a more favourable impression on the Count than he had entertained from his prisoner's conduct during the preceding evening, when, rendered irritable by the feelings of his situation, he was alternately moodily silent or fiercely argumentative.

The veteran soldier began at length to take notice of his young companion, as a pretty fellow, of whom something might be made; and more than hinted to him, that, would he but resign his situation in the Archer-guard of France, he would undertake to have him enrolled in the household of the Duke of Burgundy in an honourable condition, and would himself take care of his advancement. And although Quentin, with suitable expressions of gratitude, declined this favour at present, until he should find out how far he had to complain of his original patron, King Louis, he, nevertheless, continued to remain on good terms with the Count of Crèvecœur; and, while his enthusiastic mode of thinking, and his foreign and idiomatical manner of expressing himself, often excited a smile on the grave cheek of the Count, that smile had lost all that it had of sarcastic and did not exceed the limits of good humoured manners.

Thus travelling on with much more harm on the preceding day, the little party came within two miles of the famous and strong Peronne, near which the Duke of Burgund lay encamped, ready, as was supposed, to invade France; and, in opposition to which, Louis himself assembled a strong force near Saint I for the purpose of bringing to reason his over-ful vassal.

Peronne, situated upon a deep river, in a strong position, and surrounded by strong bulwarks and moats, was accounted in ancient, as in modern times, one of the strongest fortresses in France. The Count of Crèvecœur, his retinue, and his household, were approaching the fortress about the middle of the afternoon; when, riding through the pleasure of a large forest, which then covered the approach to the town on the east side, they were met by a party of knights of rank, as appeared from the number of the attendants, dressed in the habits worn in times of peace, and who, to judge from the falcons which they carried on their wrists, and the number of spaniels and greyhounds led by their followers, were engaged in the amusement of hawking. But on perceiving the Count of Crèvecœur, with whose appearance and lively conversation they were sufficiently intimate, they quitted the forest, and, which they were making for a heron along the bank of a long canal, and came galloping towards them.

"News, news, Count of Crèvecœur!" cried both together;—"will you give news, or talk, or will you barter fairly?"

"I would barter fairly, Messires," said Crèvecœur, after saluting them courteously, "did I come with any news of importance sufficient to be of equivalent for mine."

The two sportsmen smiled on each other; the elder of the two, a fine baronial figure, with a countenance, marked with that sort of sadness which some physiognomists ascribe to a melancholic temperament, and some, as the Italian statuary of the visage of Charles I., consider as premonitory of an unhappy death,† turning to his companion, "Crèvecœur has been in Brabant, the centre of commerce, and he has learned all its arts; but it will be too hard for us if we drive a bargain."

"Messires," said Crèvecœur, "the Duke of Burgundy takes justice to have the first of my wares, as the market takes his toll before open market begins. My news, are your news of a sad or a pleasant company?"

The person whom he particularly addressed, was a lively-looking man, with an eye of great intelligence, which was corrected by an expression of gravity about the mouth and upper lip—a physiognomy marking a man who saw an object rapidly, but was sage and slow in forming a conclusion, or in expressing opinions. This was the Knight of Hainault, son of Collart, or Niels, known in history, and amongst historians, by the venerable name of Philip des Comines, who lived at a time close to the person of Duke Charles the

* Indeed, though lying on an exposed and warlike position, it was never taken by an enemy, but preserved the promontory Peronne la Pucelle, until the Duke of Wellington, a conqueror of that sort of reputation, took the place in the month of July, and made a noble advance upon Paris in 1815.

† D'Hymbercourt, or Imbercourt, was put to death by the inhabitants of Ghent with the Chancellor of Burgundy, in the year 1477. Mary of Burgundy, daughter of Charles the Bold, appeared in mourning in the market-place, and with her own hands sought the life of her servants from her insurgent and cruel subjects.

‡ Philip des Comines was described in the former edition of this work as a little man, fitted rather for counsel than for action. This was a description made at a venture, to vary the portraits with which the age and work abound. St. Simon, upon the authority of Matthieu d'Arves, a contemporary of Philip des Comines, and had served in his household, described him as a man of tall stature, and a noble presence. The Monsieur Petitot, editor of the edition of Memoirs of the History of France, a work of great value, intimates that Philip des Comines made a figure at the games of chess, pageants exhibited on the wedding of Charles of France with Margaret of England in 1468. See the Chronicle of Troyes, in Petitot's edition of the Memoirs of the History of France, vol. xiii. p. 373. Note. I have lost Oliver de la Marek, who, in lib. ii., chapter iv., of his his most esteemed counsellors. He answered Comines's question concerning the contents of which he and his companion, d'Hymbercourt, were the depositaries. — "See," he said, "like the colours of the rainbow in hue, as they might be viewed from afar, and placed against the black cloud sky—Such a rainbow was never seen in Flanders since that of Noah's ark." "Nay," replied Crèvecoeur, "are altogether met; gloomy, wild, and terrible in their aspect, to be accounted the forerunners of still more dreadful evils which are to ensue." "Must open our bales," said Comines to him, "or our market will be forestalled by others, for ours are public news.—In one word—listen, and wonder—King Louis is here!"

"And the Count, in astonishment; "has retreated without a battle? and do you rely on your dream of peace, after the town is in the French? for I cannot suppose it rely," said d'Hymbercourt, "the banners of the Duke have not gone back a foot; and still he is here." "Edward of England must have come over with his bowmen," said Crèvecoeur, "and, certainly, gained a second field of Poitiers." "Nay," said Comines—"Not a French banner borne down, not a sail spread from England. Edward is too much amused among the citizens of London, to think of playing the Prince. Hear the extraordinary truth, when you left us, that the conference between commissioners on the parts of France and Burgundy was broken up, without apparent chance of success."

"And we dreamt of nothing but war," said Comines, "has followed has been indeed so like a dream." "That I almost expect to find it so. Only one day since, the Duke of Burgundy protested so furiously against farther delay, that he was resolved to send a defiance to the French, and march forward instantly into France. He, commissioned for the purpose, had put on his dress, and had his foot in the stirrup to his horse, when lo! the French herald Montjoy came to our camp. We thought of nothing else, but began to consider how much the Duke at the advice, which had prevented him from the first to declare war. But a council duly assembled, what was our wonder when the herald informed us, that Louis, King of France, scarce an hour's riding behind, intended Charles, Duke of Burgundy, with a small army, that their differences might be settled at an interview!"

"Surprise me, Messieurs," said Crèvecoeur; "you surprise me less than you might have for, when I was last at Plessis-les-Tours, I met Cardinal Balue, offended with his Burgundian at heart, did hint to me, that he would work upon Louis's peculiar foibles, to place himself in such a position as to Burgundy, that the Duke might have an account of these "fierce vanities" containing effusions of the pen of the old French chronicler, who brought shadows, and carried with him whatever any one could wish or demand in regard to that splendid description, knights, dames, chivalry, and store houses of castles, fiery dragons, and there are legends riding upon lions, there are charades, fountains, apertures broken and whole, and hours of Hercules. In such a brilliant medley I was able to find Philip des Comines. He is the first of a gallant band of ambitious knights and the number of twenty who, with the Prince of Artois, encountered in a general tourney with arms under the pennant of Adolf of Cleves, a challenger by the romantic title of Artois de France, though with arms of courtesy, was very fierce by main force, not without difficulty. Philip des Comines, therefore, is to be accounted a man of great worth, when we consider the obscurity which has been of this group, and we are at no loss to estimate the value of his qualifications.

the terms of peace of his own making. But I never suspected that so old a fox as Louis could have been induced to come into the trap of his own accord. What said the Burgundian counsellors?"

"As you may guess," answered d'Hymbercourt; "talked much of faith to be observed, and little of advantage to be obtained, by such a visit; while it was manifest they thought almost entirely of the last, and were only anxious to find some way to reconcile it with the necessary preservation of appearances."

"And what said the Duke?" continued the Count of Crèvecoeur.

"Spoke brief and bold, as usual," replied Comines. "Which of you was it," he asked, "who witnessed the meeting of my cousin Louis and me after the battle of Mont'heri? when I was so thoughtless as to accompany him back within the intrenchments of Paris with half a score of attendants, and so put my person at the King's mercy?" I replied, that most of us had been present; and none could ever forget the alarm which it had been his pleasure to give us. "Well," said the Duke, "you blamed me for my folly, and I confessed to you that I had acted like a giddy-pated boy, and I am aware, too, that my father of happy memory being then alive, my kinsman, Louis, would have had less advantage by acting on my person than I might now have by securing his. But, nevertheless, if my royal kinsman comes hither on the present occasion, in the same singleness of heart under which I then acted, he shall be royally welcome. If it is meant by this appearance of confidence, to circumvent and to blind me, to let me execute some of his politic schemes, by Saint George of Burgundy, let him look to it!" And so, having turned up his mustaches, and stamped on the ground, he ordered us all to get on our horses, and receive so extraordinary a guest."

"And you met the King accordingly?" replied the Count of Crèvecoeur—"Miracles have not ceased!—How was he accompanied?"

"As slightly as might be," answered d'Hymbercourt, "only a score or two of the Scottish Guard, and a few knights and gentlemen of his household—among whom his astrologer, Galeotti, made the gayest figure."

"That fellow," said Crèvecoeur, "holds some dependence on the Cardinal Balue—I should not be surprised that he has had his share in determining the King to this step of doubtful policy. Any nobility of higher rank?"

"There are Monsieur of Orleans and Dunois," replied Comines.

"I will have a route with Dunois," said Crèvecoeur, "wag the world as it will. But we heard that both he and the Duke had fallen into disgrace, and were in prison?"

"They were both under arrest in the Castle of Loches, that delightful place of retirement for the French nobility," said d'Hymbercourt; "but Louis has released them, in order to bring them with him—perhaps because he cared not to leave Orleans behind. For his other attendants, faith, I think his groom, the Hangman Marshal, with two or three of

* A few the battle of Mont'heri, in 1465, Charles, then compe de Charolais, had an interview with Louis under the walls of Paris, each at the head of a small party. The two princes dismounted, and walked together so deeply engaged in discussing the business of their meeting, that Charles forgot the proximity of his situation, and when Louis turned back to ward the town of Paris, from which he came the Count of Charolais kept him company so far as to pass the line of outworks with which Paris was surrounded, and enter a field work which communicated with the town by a trench. At this point he had only five or six persons in company with him. His escort caught alarm for his safety and his, as his followers rode forward from where he had left them, remembering that his grandfather had been assassinated at Montreuil in a similar party on 10th September 1419. To the great joy the Count returned unharmed accompanied with a guard belonging to Louis. The Burgundians taxed him with recklessness in no longer being guarded. "Nay no more of it," said Charles. "I acknowledge the extent of my folly but I was not aware what I was doing till I entered the redoubt." — Mémoires de Philippe des Comines chap. xiii.

Louis was much pleased for his good faith on this occasion, and it was natural that the Duke should call it to recollection when his enemy so unexpectedly put himself in his power by his visit to Paris.

retains, and Oliver, his barber, may be the most considerable—and the whole bevy so poorly arrayed, that by my honour, the King resembles most an old rag-picking to collect desperate debts, attended by a body of catchpoles."

"And where is he lodged?" said Crèvecoeur.

"Nay, that," replied Comines, "is the most marvellous of all. Our Duke offered to let the King's Sher-Guard have a gate of the town, and a bridge over the Somme, and to have assigned to us himself the adjoining house, belonging to a filthy burgess, Giles Orthen; but, in going thither, King espied the banners of De Lau and Pencil de Tre, whom he had banished from France; and red, as it would seem, with the thought of lodging near refugees and malecontents of his own making, he craved to be quartered in the Castle of Peronne, and there he hath his abode accordingly."

"Why, God ha mercy!" exclaimed Crèvecoeur, "is not only venturing into the lion's den, but putting his head into his very jaws—Nothing less than the very bottom of the rat trap would serve the old politician!"

"Nay," said Comines, "D'Hymberecourt hath not given you the speech of Le Glorieux, which, in my mind, was the shrewdest opinion that was given. And what said his most illustrious wisdom?"

"As the Duke," replied Comines, "was hastily stringing some vessels and ornaments of plate, and like, to be prepared as presents for the King, his requie, by way of welcome on his arrival, double not thy small brain about it, my friend," said Le Glorieux, "I will give thy cousin a nobler and a fitter gift than thou canst, and it is my cap and belt, and my hauberk to boot; for, the more he is a greater fool than I am, for putting himself in thy power. But if I give him no reason to repent it, arrah, how then?" said the Duke, then, truly Charles, thou shalt have cap and doublet, as the greatest fool of the three of us. I promise you this knavish quip touched the Duke closely, saw him change colour and bite his lip.—And now, our news are told, noble Crèvecoeur, and what do you say they resemble?"

"A mine full charged with gunpowder," answered Crèvecoeur, "to which, I fear, it is my fate to bring a kindled lustre. Your news and mine are like a gun and fire, which cannot meet without bursting to flame, or like certain chemical substances which must be mingled without an explosion. Friends, gentlemen—ride close by my rein; and when I tell what has chanced in the bishopric of Liege, I ask you will be of opinion, that King Louis might safely have undertaken a pilgrimage to the inferregions, as to a damned visit to Peronne."

The two nobles drew up close on either hand of Comin, and listened, with half-suppressed exclamations and gestures of the deepest wonder and interest, to his account of the transactions at Liege. When he had finished, Comin was then called forward, and examined and re-examined on the particulars of the Bishop's death, until at length he refused to answer any further interrogatories, not knowing where they were asked, or what use might be made of the replies.

They now reached the rich and level banks of the Somme, and the ancient walls of the little town of Peronne in Picardy, and the deep green meadows joining now whitened with the numerous tents of the Duke of Burgundy's army, amounting to about ten thousand men.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE INTERVIEW.

When Princes meet, Astrologers may mark it
An ominous conjunction, full of boding,
Like that of Mars with Saturn. —Old Play

John hardly knows whether to term it a privilege or a penalty annexed to the quality of princes, that,

The poster of Charles of Burgundy, of whom more herein their intercourse with each other, they are regulated by the respect which is due to their own rank and dignity, to regulate their feelings and expressions by a severe etiquette, which precludes all violent or avowed display of passion, and which but too the whole world are aware that this assumed composure is a matter of ceremony, might justify profound dissimulation. It is no less certain, however, that the oversteering of these bounds of decorum, for the purpose of giving more direct vent to their angry passions, has the effect of compromising their dignity with the world in general, as was particularly noted when those distinguished Francis the First, and the Emperor Charles, each other the lie direct, and were desirous of settling their differences hand to hand in a single combat.

Charles of Burgundy the most hasty and impatient, nay, the most imprudent prince of his age, found himself, nevertheless, fettered within the circle which prescribed the most profound deference to Louis, as his Suzerain and liege Lord who designed to confer upon him, a vessel of the most distinguished honour of a personal visit. Prodded in his ducal mantle, and attended by a great number of officers, and principal knights and nobles, he came in gallant cavalcade, to receive Louis XI. His attire absolutely blazed with gold and silver, the wealth of the Court of England being exhausted by the wars of York and Lancaster, and the expenditure of France limited by the exigencies of the moment, that of Burgundy was for the time the most magnificent in Europe. The cortege of Louis, on the contrary, was few in number and comparatively mean in appearance, and the exterior of the King himself, in a threadbare cloak, with his wonted red hat-crowned hat stuck full of unguis, rendered the contrast yet more striking; and as the Duke, rebuffed with the coronet and mantle of state, threw himself from his noble charger, and, kneeling on his knee, offered to hold the stirrup while Louis dismounted from his little ambling palfrey, the effect was almost grotesque.

The greeting between the two potentates was, of course, as full of affected kindness and complaisance, as it was totally devoid of sincerity. But the temper of the Duke rendered it much more difficult for him to preserve the necessary appearance of grace, respect, and demeanour; while in the King, every appearance of dissimulation and dissimulation seemed so much a part of his nature, that those best acquainted with him could not have distinguished what was feigned from what was real.

Perhaps the most accurate illustration was that unworthy two such high potentates, would be to suppose the King in the situation of a stranger perfectly acquainted with the habits and dispositions of the can be race, who, for some purpose of his own, is desirous to make friends with a large and very crafty, that holds him in a species of awe, and is therefore a worry him on the first symptoms either of diffidence or of umbrage. The mastiff growls, and shows his bristles, shows his teeth, yet is restrained by upon the intruder, who seems at the same time so kind and so confiding, and therefore the animal endures advances which are far from exciting his watchful at the same time the slightest opportunity which may justify him in his own eyes for seizing his friend by the throat.

The King was no doubt sensible from the sound voice, constrained manner, and abrupt gestures of the Duke, that the game he had to play was difficult, and perhaps he more than once regretted that he had ever taken it in hand. But repentance was too late, and all that remained for him was that of a dexterity of management, which the King, in a great degree, at least with any man that ever lived.

The demeanour which Louis ever towards the Duke, was such as to resemble the kind and smiling of the heart at a moment of adversity, when, with an honoured and tried friend, from whom he had been estranged by temporary considerations, he passed away, and forgot as soon as returned. The King blamed himself for not having sooner taken the decisive step, of convincing his kind and good friend as a mark of confidence as he was now and the angry passages which had occurred to them were nothing in his remembrance weighed against the kindness which he had shown him when an exile from France, and under the Duke of Burgundy, as Philip the father of Charles was currently called, and remembered instances of his paternal kindness.

"I think, cousin," he said, "your father made little account of this affection, betwixt you and me; for I remember, when by an accident I had bewildered myself in a hunting-party, I found the Good Duke spreading you with leaving me in the forest, as if you had been careless of the safety of an elder brother."

The Duke of Burgundy's features were naturally harsh and severe; and when he attempted to smile, it was a polite acquiescence to the truth of what the King told him, the grimace which he made was truly diabolical.

"Prince of dissemblers," he said, in his secret soul,
"would that it stood with my honour to remind you how you have requited all the benefits of our House!"

"And then," continued the King, "if the ties of consanguinity and gratitude are not sufficient to bind us together, my fair cousin, we have those of spiritual relationship, for, I am godfather to your fair daughter Mary, who is as dear to me as one of my own children, and when the Saints (their holy name be blessed) sent me a little blossom which withered in the course of three months, it was your princely father who held it at the font, and celebrated the ceremony of baptism, with richer and prouder magnificence than Paris itself could have afforded. Never shall I forget the deep, the indelible impression, which the generosity of Duke Philip, and yours, my dearest cousin, made upon the half-broken heart of the poor exile!"

"Your Majesty," said the Duke, compelling himself to make some reply, "acknowledged that slight obligation in terms which overpaid all the display which Burgundy could make, to show due sense of the honour you had done its Sovereign."

"I remember the words you mean, fair cousin," said the King, smiling; "I think they were, that in gratitude of the benefit of that day, I, poor wanderer, had nothing to offer, save the persons of myself, of my wife, and of my child.—Well, and I think I have differently well redeemed my pledge."

"I mean not to dispute what your Majesty is pleased to aver," said the Duke; "but"—

"But you ask," said the King, interrupting him,
"how my actions have accorded with my words—Marry thus the body of my infant child Joachim rests in Burgundian earth—my own person I have this morning placed unreservedly in your power—and, for that of my wife, truly, cousin, I think, considering the period of time which has passed, you will scarce insist on my keeping my word in that particular. She was born on the day of the Blessed Annunciation," he crossed himself, and muttered an Ora pro nobis; "some fifty years since; but she is as far distant than Rheims, and if you insist on my promise being fulfilled to the letter, she shall presently wait your pleasure."

Angry as the Duke of Burgundy was at the barefaced attempt of the King to assume towards him a tone of friendship and intimacy, he could not help laughing at the whimsical reply of that singular monarch, and his laugh was as discordant as the shrill tones of passion in which he often spoke.
Having laughed longer and louder than was at that period, or would now be, thought fitting the time and occasion, he answered in the same time, bluntly declaring the honour of the Queen's company, but stating his willingness to accept that of the King's daughter, whose beauty was celebrated.

"I am happy, fair cousin," said the King, with one of those dubious smiles of which he frequently made use, "that your gracious pleasure has not fixed on my younger daughter Joan. I should otherwise have had spear-breaking between you and my cousin Charles; and, had harm come of it, I must on

"Nay, nay, my royal sovereign," said Charles, "the Duke of Orleans shall have a rupture from me in the path which he has per amore. The cause in which I couch as against Orleans, must be fair and straight."

Louis was far from taking amiss the brewing on the personal deformity of the Prince.
On the contrary, he was rather pleased to see the Duke was content to be amused with brogin which he was himself a proficient, and (according to the modern phrase) spared immortal hypocrisy. Accordingly, he speedily though he felt it impossible to play the pasthe grossness of his character, and to Louis, t though capable of assuming any mood of so-tercourse, that which really suited him be-mingled with grossness of ideas, and caustic in expression.

Both Princes were happily able to preserve the period of a banquet at the town-house ronne, the same kind of conversation, on whi met as on a neutral ground, and which, a easily perceived, was more available than as to keep the Duke of Burgundy in that state

But when the King, expressing himself in the reputation of the good little town than you are—Peronne being, as you know far exceed, one of those upon the same river Somme, which, pledged to your father of happy memory for redemption of the boy, are liable to be redeemed upon repayment. And to speak truth, coming, like an honest debtor disposed to clear off my obligations of every kind, I have brought here a few European medals coined with silver for the redemption—enough to maintain even your princely and royal establishment, far count, for the space of three years."

"I will not receive a penny of it," said the Duke, turning his mustaches, "the day of redemption is past, my royal cousin; nor was there ever serious purpose that the right should be enforced, the count of those towns being the sole recompense my father ever received from France, when, in a happy hour for your family, he consented to forget the murder of my grandfather, and to exchange the alliance of England for that of your father—Saint George! if he had not so acted, your royal self, far from having towns on the Somme, could scarce have kept those beyond the Loire. No—I will not receive a stone of them, were I to receive for every stone as rendered its weight in gold. I thank God, and the wisdom and valour of my ancestors, that the revenues of Burgundy, though it be but a duchy, will maintain my state, even when a King is my guest, without obliging me to barter my heritage."

"Well, far count," answered the King, with the same cold and placid manner as before, and unperturbed by the loud tone and violent gestures of the Duke. "I see that you are so good a friend to France, that you are unwilling to part with ought that belongs to her. But we shall need some moderator in these affairs when we come to treat of them in council. What say you to Saint Paul?"

"Neither Saint Paul, nor Saint Peter, nor a' o' a Saint in the Calendar," said the Duke of Burgundy, "shall preach me out of the possession of Peronne."

"Nay, but you mistake me," said King Louis, smiling. "I mean Louis de Luxembourg, our trusty ambassador, the Count of Saint Paul—Ah! Saint Mary of Brabant! we lack but his head at our conference, the best head in France, and the most useful to the restoration of perfect harmony between us."

"By Saint George of Burgundy!" said the Duke. "I marvel to hear your Majesty talk thus of a man false and perjured both to France and Burgundy, one, who hath ever endeavoured to fan into a flame our frequent differences, and that with the purpose of giving himself the air of a mediator. I swear by the Order I wear, that his marches shall not be long a resource for him."

"Be not so warm, cousin," replied the King, smiling, and speaking under his breath, "when I wished for the constable's head, as a means of ending the settlement of our trifling differences, I had no desire for his body, which might remain at Saint Quentin with much convenience."

"Ho! ho! I take your meaning, my royal cousin, said Charles, with the same discontent laugh which some other of the King's courtiers piteously had exerted, and added, stamping with his heel on the ground, "I allow, in that sense, the head of the Constable might be useful at Peronne."

Then, and other discourses, by which the King mixed hints at serious affairs and matters of mirth and amusement, did not follow each other consecutively, but were adroitly introduced during the time of the banquet at the Hotel de Ville, during a subsequent interview in the Duke's own apartments, and in short, an occasion seemed to render the introduction of such delicate subjects easy and natural.

Indeed, however rashly Louis had placed himself in a risk, which the Duke's fiery temper, and the mutual subjects of exaggerated enmity which subsisted between them, rendered of doubtful and perilous issue, never pilot on an unknown coast conducted better with more firmness and prudence. He assumed, indeed, with the utmost address and precision, the depths and shallows of his rival's mind and temper, and manifested neither doubt nor fear, when the result of his experiments discovered much more of sunken rocks, and of dangerous shoals, anchorage.

At length a day closed, which must I wearisome one to Louis, from the close vigilance, perspiration, and attention, which was required, as it was a day of constraint from the necessity of suppressing the vein to which he was on the general hotel controlled vent.

No sooner had the latter retired into his room, after he had taken a formal leave for the night, than he gave way to the passion which he had so long suppressed on oath and abusive epithet, as his jesting, said, "fell that night upon heads which never count for" his domestic reprobates of that board of injurious language, who not in decency bestow on his royal self his absence, and which was yet become altogether suppressed. The jests of some effect in tranquillizing the Duke's—he laughed loudly, threw the paper, and equal himself to be disrobed in tranquillity of a deep cup of wine and spices, was slept soundly.

The countess of King Louis is more wroth than that of Charles; for the violent, exaggerated and headlong passion, so and more to the brutal than the intelligent person, has little to interest us, in comparison of the deep workings of a vigorous and powerful mind.

Louis was escorted to the lodgings in the Castle, or Citadel of Peronne, by his own and harbingers of the Duke of Burgundy, received at the entrance by a strong guard and men at arms.

As he descended from his horse to a bridge over a moat of unusual width, looked on the sentinels, and observed who accompanied him, with other Burgundians. They wear Saint Andrew's crosses—of my Scottish Archers."

"You will find them as ready to die in France," said the Burgundian, whose eyes detected in the King's tone of speech a doubtless Louis would have concealed. "They wear the Saint Andrew's Cross, the badge of the order of the Golden Fleece, the Duke of Burgundy's Order."

"Do I not know it?" said Louis, whose which he himself wore in compliment to one of the dearest bonds of fraternity between my kind brother and myself. We in chivalry, as in spiritual relationship, birth, and friends by every tie of kindred neighbourhood.—No farther than the noble lords and gentlemen! I can proceed no farther—you have done me enough."

"We were charged by the Duke," said court, "to bring your Majesty to your I trust your Majesty will permit us to obey command."

"In this small matter," said the King, "you will allow my command to extend with you his large subjects.—I am content, and my lords something fatigued. O hath its toil, as well as great pain. I joy your society better to-morrow. An Seigneur Philip of Comines—I am told an historian of the time—we that dwell in history, must speak you fair, for men have a sharp point, when you will. Go lords and gentlemen, to all and each of you."

The Lords of Burgundy retired, with the grace of Louis's manner, and the attention of his attentions; and the King only one or two of his own personal staff, the archway of the inner-court of the Peronne, looking on the huge tower which of the angles, being in fact the Donjon, Keep, of the place. This tall, dark, man was seen clearly by the same moon which illumined Quentin Durward between Charles's which, as the reader is aware, shows a

The great Keep was in form nearly resembling the Tower in the Citadel of London, but still different in its architecture, deriving its date, as it were, from the days of Charlemagne. The top of a tremendous thickness, the windows ill, and grouted with bars of iron, and the huge walls of the building cast a dark and portentous shadow over the whole of the court yard.

"Not to be lodged there," the King said, with a frown, "that had something in it ominous."

"I replied the gray-headed seneschal, who stood upon him unheeded. "God forbid!—Your apartments are prepared in these lower courts which are hard by and in which King John slept before the battle of Poitiers."

"—that is no lucky omen neither," muttered he; "but what of the Tower, my old friend? I should you desire of Heaven that I may not lodged there."

"My gracious liege," said the seneschal, "I avoid of the Tower at all—only that the angry lights are seen, and strange noises heard at night; and there are reasons why that may be, for anciently it was used as a state prison, and are many tales of devils which have been told."

asked no further questions; for no man was allowed then to report the secrets of a prison. At the door of the apartments destined for which, though of later date than the Tower, the both ancient and gloomy, stood a small the Scottish Guard, which the Duke, although not to concede the point to Louis, had ordered reduced, as to be near the person of their lord—the faithful Lord Crawford was at their head.

"King," where hast thou been to-day? Art thou of Burgundy as unapproachable as to neglect his bravest and most noble gentleman that is a court? I saw you not at the banquet," cried he, my liege, said Crawford—tuned glad with me. The day has been that I could stand a carousal with the best men in this land and in the race of his own grape; but a few points now flutters me, and I think it is your Majesty's service to set in this an easy my callous."

"I am ever proud," said the King; "but surely in the land when you have so few men to fight—and a time of festivity requires not so off-dance on your part as a time of danger." "I have few men to command," said Crawford, "the more need to keep the knaves in fitting; and whether this business be like to end in fighting, God and your Majesty know an old John of Crawford."

"I do not apprehend any danger," said he hastily, yet in a whisper.

"I answered Crawford, "I wish I did; for, as the Frenchmen used to say, apprehended danger is always defended danger.—The word for it, if your Majesty please?"

"I am of Burgundy, in honour of our host and of that you love, Crawford."

"I quarrel with neither Duke nor drink, as call—Crawford, "provided always that both be a good night to your Majesty!"

"I am, my trusty Scot," said the King, and he to his apartments.

At the door of his bedroom Le Belafre was placed. "Follow me higher," said the King, as he went; and the Archer accordingly, like a piece of machinery set in motion by an artist, strode after the apartment and came not there fixed, as if motionless, attending the royal command as you heard from that wandering Paladin, then," said the King, "for he both does as much, like a young knight who had not out of his adventures, he sent us home two prisoners—the first fruits of his chivalry."

"I heard something of that," said Le Belafre, "I hope your Majesty will believe, that if he had wrongfully, it was in no shape by my."

"An Earl of Douglas, so called."

prompt or example, once I never was so bold as to unbecome any of your Majesty's most illustrious houses, better knowing my own condition, and"—

"Be silent on that point," said the King; "your nephew did his duty in the matter."

"There indeed," continued Belafre, "he had the cue from me." "Quentin," said I to him, "whatever comes of it, remember you belong to the Scottish Arch-guard, and do your duty whatever comes of it."

"I promised he had some such exquisite instruction," said Louis, "but it concerns me that you answer my first question. Have you heard of your nephew of late?—Stand aback, my masters," he added, withdrawing the gentlemen of his chamber, "for this concerneth no ears but mine."

"Surely, please your Majesty," said Belafre, "I have seen this very evening the green Chariot, whom my kinsman dispatched from Lange, or some castle of the Bishop's which is near it, and where he hath lodged the ladies of Croys in safety."

"Now our Lady of Heaven be praised for it!" said the King. "Art thou sure of it?—sure of the good news?"

"As sure as I can be of ought," said Le Belafre; "the fellow, I think, hath letters for your Majesty from the ladies of Croys."

"Haste to get them," said the King—"Give thy herquebus to one of these knaves—to Oliver—to any one.—Now our Lady of Embrun be praised!" and all-ver shall be the arrows that surrounds her high altar!"

Louis, in this fit of gratitude and devotion, doled, as usual, he had written from the figures with which it was garnished that which represented his favourite image of the Virgin placed it on a table, and kneeling down, repeated reverently the vow he had made.

The gentleman being the first messenger whom Durward had of speech from Schonwaldt, was now introduced with his letters. They were addressed to the King by the ladies of Croys, and barely thanked him in very cold terms for his courtesy while at his court, and, something more warmly, for having permitted them to retire and sent them in safety from his dominions, expressions at which Louis laughed very heartily, instead of resenting them. He then demanded of Charlot, with obvious interest, whether they had not sustained some alarm or attack upon the road? Charlot, a stupid fellow, and selected for that quality, gave a very confused account of the affray in which his companion, the Gascon, had been killed, but knew of no other. Again Louis demanded of him, minutely and particularly, the route which the party had taken to Lange; and seemed much interested when he was informed, in reply, that they had, upon approaching Namur kept the more direct road to Lange, upon the right bank of the Meuse, instead of the left bank, as recommended in their route. The King then ordered the man a small present, and dismissed him, dismissing the anxiety he had expressed, as if it only concerned the safety of the ladies of Croys.

Yet the news, though they inferred the failure of one of his own favourite plans, seemed to imply more internal satisfaction on the King's part than he would have probably indicated in a case of brilliant success. He sighed like one whose breast has been relieved from a heavy burden, muttered his devotional acknowledgments with an air of deep sanctity, raised up his eyes, and hastened to adjust newer and more schemes of ambition.

With such purpose, Louis ordered the attendance of his astrologer, Martinus Galeotti, who appeared with his usual air of assumed dignity, yet not without a shade of uncertainty on his brow, as if he had doubted the King's kind reception. It was, however, favourable, even beyond the warmest which he had ever met with at any former interview. Louis turned him his friend, his father-in-law—the glassy which a king should look into distant futurity, and concluded by thrusting on his finger a ring of very considerable value. Galeotti, not aware of the circumstances which had thus suddenly raised his character in the estimation of Louis, yet understood his own position too well to let that ignorance be seen. He received with grave modesty the promise of Louis, which he contended were only due to the nobleness of the science which he practised, a science the rather the more deserving of admiration on account of its working miracles through means of so feeble an agent as himself; and he and the King took leave, for once much satisfied with each other.

On the Astrologer's departure, Louis threw himself into a chair, and appearing much exhausted, dismissed the rest of his attendants, excepting Oliver alone, who, creeping around with gentle assiduity and noiseless step, assisted him in the task of preparing for repose.

While he received this assistance, the King, unlike to his wont, was so silent and passive, that his attendant was struck by the unusual change in his deportment. The worst minds have often something of good principle in them—banditti show fidelity to their captain, and sometimes a protected and promoted favourite has felt a gleam of sincere interest in the monarch to whom he owed his greatness. Oliver le Diable, le Mauvais, (or by whatever other name he was called expressive of his evil propensities,) was, nevertheless, scarcely so completely identified with Satan as not to feel some touch of grateful feeling for his master in this singular condition, when, as it seemed, his fate was deeply interested, and his strength seemed to be exhausted. After for a short time rendering to the King in silence the usual services paid by a servant to his master at the toilet, the attendant was at length tempted to say, with the freedom which his Sovereign's indulgence had permitted him in such circumstances, "Vite-dieu, Sir, you seem as if you had lost a battle; and yet I, who was near your Majesty during this whole day, never knew you fight a field so gallantly."

"A field!" said King Louis, looking up, and assuming his wonted causticity of tone and manner; "Pardieu-dieu, my friend Oliver say I have kept the arena in a bull-fight; for a blinder, and more stubborn, untamable, uncontrollable brute, than our cousin of Burgundy, never existed, save in the shape of a Marcan bull, trained for the bull feasts. Well, let it pass—I dodged him bravely. But, Oliver, rejoice with me that my plans in Flanders have not taken effect, whether as concerning those two rambling Princesses of Croye, or in Liège—you understand me?"

"In faith, I do not, Sir," replied Oliver; "it is impossible for me to congratulate your Majesty on the failure of your favourite schemes, unless you tell me some reason for the change in your own wishes and views."

"Nay," answered the King, "there is no change in either, in a general view. But, Pardieu-dieu, my friend, I have this day learned more of Duke Charles than I before knew. When he was Count de Charolais, in the time of the old Duke Philip and the banished Dauphin of France, we drank, and hunted, and rambled together—and many a wild adventure we have had. And in those days I had a decided advantage over him like that which a strong spirit naturally assumes over a weak one. But he has since changed—has become a dogged, daring, assuming, disputatious dogmatist, who nourishes an obvious wish to drive matters to extremities, while he thinks he has the game in his own hands. I was compelled to glide as gently away from each offensive topic, as if I touched red-hot iron. I did but hint at the possibility of those erratic Countesses of Croye, ere they attained Liège, (for thither I frankly confessed that, to the best of my belief, they were gone,) falling into the hands of some wild snapper upon the frontiers, and, Pardieu-dieu! you would have thought I had spoken of ecnilege. It is needless to tell you what he said, and quite enough to say, that I would have held my head's safety very insecure, if, in that moment, accounts had been brought of the success of thy friend, William with the Beard, in his and thy honest scheme of bettering himself by marriages."

"No friend of mine, if it please your Majesty," said Oliver—"neither friend nor plan of mine."

"True, Oliver," answered the King; "thy plan had not been to wed, but to have such a bridegroom."

Well, thou didst wish her as bad a one, w didst modestly hint at thyself. However lucky the man who has her not; for hang it quarter, were the most gentle words which the cousin spoke of him who should wed the Countess, his vassal, without his most durn mon."

"And he is, doubtless, as jealous of his success in the good town of Liège?" asked the

"As much, or much more so," replied "as your understanding may easily antick ever since I resolved on coming hither, my gers have been in Liège, to repress, for the every movement to insurrection; and my and bustling friends, Rousleer and Pavillon ders to be quiet as a mouse until this happy between my cousin and me is over."

"Judging then, from your Majesty's account Oliver, dryly, "the utmost to be hoped I meeting is, that it should not make your worse!—Surely this is like the crane that I head into the fox's mouth, and was glad her good fortune that it was not bitten off. Majesty seemed deeply obliged even now to philosopher who encouraged you to play as game."

"No game," said the King, sharply, "despaired of until it is lost, and that I have to expect it will be in my own case. On the if nothing occurs to stir the rage of this madman, I am sure of victory; and surely, a little obliged to the skill which selects agent, as the conductor of the ladies of Croy whose horoscope so far corresponded with he hath saved me from danger, even by obedience of my own commands, and is route which avoided De la March's ambush."

"Your Majesty," said Oliver, "may fit agents who will serve you on the terms; rather after their own pleasure than your bona."

"Nay, nay, Oliver," said Louis, impatient heathen poet speaks of Vota diis credula!—wishes, that is, which the saints grant their wrath; and such, in the circumstances have been the success of William de la Ma ploit, had it taken place about this time, as am in the power of the Duke of Burgun than my own art foresaw—fortified by the laotti;—that is, I foresaw not the misadvent la March's undertaking, but I foresaw the padition of yonder Scottish Archer should pily for me—and such has been the issue, t a manner different from what I expected stars, though they foretell general results silent on the means by which such are accom being often the very reverse of what we even desire.—But why talk I of these my thea, Oliver, who art in so far worse than devil, who is thy namesake, since he bali trembles; whereas thou art an infidel bo lition and to science, and wilt remain so own destiny is accomplished, which, as t scope and phynognomy shike assure me, t the intervention of the gallows?"

"And if it indeed shall be so," said Oliver signed tone of voice, "it will be so ordered, I was too grateful a servant to hesitate at a the commands of my royal master."

Louis burst into his usual sardonic laugh, hast broke thy lance on me fairly, Oliver; Our Lady, thou art right, for I defied thee in pntres, tell me in sadness, dost thou dim thing in these men's measures towards w may argue any suspicion of ill usage?"

"My lady," replied Oliver, "your Maja yonder learned philosopher, look for argu stars and heavenly host—I am an earthly m consider but the things connected with my w But, methinks, there is a lack of that care precise attention on your Majesty, which as to a welcome guest of a degree so far abo The Duke, to-night, pleaded weariness, as your Majesty not farther than to the street, in the officers of his household the task of conveying you to your lodgings. The rooms here are hastily and carelessly fitted up—the tapestry is hung up queerly—and, in one of the pieces, as you may observe, the figures are reversed, and stand on their heads, while the trees grow with their roots uppermost."

"Pshaw! accident, and the effect of hurry," said the King. "When did you ever know me concerned about such trifles as these?"

"Not on their own account are they worth notice," said Oliver; "but as intimating the degree of esteem in which the officers of the Duke's household observe your Grace to be held by him. Believe me, that had his danger seemed sincere that your reception should be in all points marked by scrupulous attention, the aim of his people would have made minutes do the work of days. And when," he added, pointing to the hall and over, "was the furniture of your Majesty's tent of other substance than silver?"

"Nay," said the King, with a constrained smile, "that last remark upon the shaving utensils, Oliver, is too much in the style of those own peculiar occupations to be combated by any man. True it is, that when I was only a refugee, and an exile, I was served upon gold plate by order of the same Charles, who accounted silver too mean for the Dauphin, though he seems to hold that metal too rich for the King of France. Well, Oliver, we will to bed—Our resolution has been made and executed; there is nothing to be done but to play manfully the game on which we have entered. I know that my cousin of Burgundy, like other wild hells, shuts his eyes when he begins his career. I have but to watch that moment, like one of the terrors whom we saw at Compiègne, and his impetuousness places him at my curb of his upper lip, and the proud glance of his eye intimates his consciousness, that the words he used were but empty compliment, and that his fine army, at his own unlimited disposal, was as ready to march against Paris as in any other direction. It must have added to Louis's mortification, that he recognized, as forming part of this host, many banners of French nobility, not only of Normandy and Bretagne, but of provinces more immediately subjected to his own authority, who, from various causes of discontent, had joined and made common cause with the Duke of Burgundy.

True to his character, however, Louis seemed to take little notice of these malecontents, while, in fact, he was revolving in his mind the various means by which it might be possible to detach them from the banners of Burgundy, and bring them back to his own, and resolved for that purpose, that he would cause those to whom he attached the greatest importance to be secretly sounded by Oliver and other agents.

He himself laboured diligently, but at the same time cautiously, to make interest with the Duke's chief officers and advisers, employing for that purpose the usual means of flattery and frequent notice, adroit flattery, and liberal presents; not, as he represented, to alienate their faithful services from their noble master, but that they might lend their aid in preserving peace betwixt France and Burgundy,—an end so excellent in itself, and so obviously tending to the welfare of both countries, and of the reigning Princes of either.

The notice of so great and so wise a King was in itself a mighty bribe; promises did much, and direct gifts, which the customs of the time permitted the Burgundian courtiers to accept without scruple, did still more. During a bear-hunt in the forest, while the Duke, eager always upon the immediate object, whether business or pleasure, gave himself entirely up to the ardour of the chase, Louis, unrestrained by his presence, sought and found the means of speaking secretly and separately to many of those who were reported to have most interest with Charles, among whom D'Hymbercourt and Cocones were not forgotten; nor did he fail to mix up the advances which he made towards those two distinguished persons with praises of the valour and military skill of the first, and of the profound sagacity and literary talents of the latter historian of the period.

Such an opportunity of personally conciliating, or, if the reader please, corrupting, the ministers of Charles, was perhaps what the King had proposed to himself, as a principal object of his visit, even if his art should fail to cajole the Duke himself. The connexion betwixt France and Burgundy was so close, that most of the nobles belonging to the latter country had hopes or actual interests connected with the former, which the favour of Louis could advance, or his personal displeasure destroy. Formed for this and every other species of intrigue, liberal to profusion when it was necessary to advance his plans, and skilful in putting the most plausible colour upon his proposals and presents, the King contrived to reconcile the spirit of the proud to their profit, and to hold out to the real or pretended patriot the good of both France and Burgundy, as the ostensible motive; whilst the party's own private interest, like the concealed wheel of some machine, worked not the less powerfully that its operations were kept out of sight. For each man he had a suitable bait, and a proper mode of presenting it; he poured the guerdon into the sleeve of those who were too proud to extend their hand, and trusted that his bounty, though it descended like the dew, without noise and imperceptibly, would not fail to produce, in due season, a plentiful crop of good will at least, perhaps of good offices, to the donor. In fine, although he had been long paving the way by his ministers for an establishment of such an interest in the Court of Burgundy, as should be advantageous to the interests of France, Louis's own personal exertions, directed doubtless by the information of which he was previously possessed, did more to accomplish that object in a few hours, than his agents had effected in years of negotiation.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE REFLECTION.

The following story, and much amusement all, when in the darkest eye, the capital place, against the death, creative through the cloud. The story's name.

The preceding chapter, agreeable to its title, was designed as a retrospect, which might enable the reader fully to understand the terms upon which the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy stood together when the former moved, partly perhaps by his belief in astrology which was represented as favourable to the issue of such a measure, and in a great measure doubtless by the conscious superiority of his own powers of mind over those of Charles, had adopted the extraordinary and upon any other ground altogether inexplicable, resolution of committing his person to the faith of a fierce and exasperated enemy—a resolution also the more rash and unaccountable, as there were various examples in that stormy time to show that safe-conducts, however solemnly pledged, had proved no assurance for those a whose favour they were conceived; and indeed the murder of the Duke's grandfather, at the bridge of Montreuil, in presence of the father of Louis, and at an interview solemnly agreed upon for the establishment of peace and amity, was a horrible precedent, should the Duke be disposed to resort to the temper of Charles, though rough, fierce, and unyielding, was not, unless in the full blaze of passion, faithless or ungracious, faults which really belong to colder dispositions. He was at no pains to show the King more courtesy than the laws of hospitality positively demanded; but, on the other hand, he evinced no purpose of oversteering their

On the following morning after the King's arrival, he was a general muster of the troops of the Duke of Burgundy which were so numerous and so excellently equipped, that, perhaps, he was not sorry to have an opportunity of displaying them before his guest. Indeed, while he paid the necessary compliments of a vassal to his liege, in declaring that these were the King's, and not his own, the

One man alone the King missed, whom he had been particularly desirous of contributing, and that was the Count de Crévecoeur, whose firmness, during his conduct as Envoy at Pisa, far from exciting Louis's resentment, had been viewed as a reason for making him his own if possible. He was not particularly gratified when he learnt that the Count, at the head of a hundred lances, was gone towards the frontiers of Brabant, to assist the Bishop in fear of necessity, against William de la Marck and his discontented subjects; but he considered himself that the appearance of this force, joined with the distractions which he had sent by his other movements, would serve to prevent any premature disturbances in that country, the breaking out of which might, he foresaw, render his present situation very precarious.

The Court upon this occasion dined in the forest when the hour of noon arrived, as was common in those great hunting parties; an arrangement at this time particularly agreeable to the Duke, dear to him as he was to abridge that ceremonious and degrading solemnity with which he was otherwise under the necessity of receiving King Louis. In fact the King's knowledge of human nature had in one particular misled him on this remarkable occasion. He thought that the Duke would have been immeasurably flattered to have received such a mark of consideration and confidence from his lige lord, but he forgot that the dependence of this Duke upon the Crown of France was precisely the subject of gaining merit in return to a Prince so powerful, as was this and all present as Charles, whose aim it certainly was to establish an independent kingdom. The presence of the King at the Court of the Duke of Burgundy, imposed on that prince the necessity of exhibiting himself in the subordinate character of a vassal, and of discharging many rites of feudal observance and deference, which to one of his haughty disposition, resembled derogation from the character of a Sovereign Prince, which on all occasions he affected as far as possible to sustain.

But although it was possible to avoid much ceremony by having the dinner upon the green turf, with sound of bagpipes, broaching of barrels, and all the freedom of a sylvan meal, it was necessary that the evening repast should, even for that very reason, be held with more than usual solemnity.

Previous orders for this purpose had been given, and, upon returning to Peronne, King Louis found a banquet prepared with such a profusion of splendour and magnificence, as became the wealth of his formidable vassal, possessed as he was of almost all the Low Countries, then the richest portion of Europe. At the head of the long board, which groined under plate of gold and silver filed to profusion with the most exquisite designs, sat the Duke, and on his right hand, upon a seat more elevated than his own, was placed his royal guest. Behind him stood on one side the son of the Duke of Gueldres, who officiated as his grand carver;—on the other, Le Glorieux, his jester, without whom he seldom dined; for, like most men of his hasty and coarse character, Charles carried to extremity the general taste of that age for court fools and jesters, experiencing that pleasure in their display of eccentricity and mental infirmity, which his more acute, but not more benevolent rival, loved better to extract from marking the imperfections of humanity in its nobler specimens, and finding subject for mirth in the "fores of the brave, and follies of the wise." And indeed, if the anecdote related by Brantome be true, that a court fool, having overheard Louis, in one of his agonies of repentant devotion, confess his accusation to the poisoning of his brother, Henry Count of Guyenne, divulged it next day at dinner before the assembled court, that monarch might be supposed rather more than satisfied with the pleasantness of professed jesters for the rest of his life.

But, on the present occasion, Louis neglected not to take notice of the favourite buffoon of the Duke, and to applaud his repartees, which he did the rather that he thought he saw that the folly of Le Glorieux, however grossly it was sometimes displayed, covered more than the usual quantity of shrewd and acute observation proper to his class.

In fact, Tiel Weerswiler, called Le Glorieux, was by no means a jester of the common stamp. He was a tall, fine-looking man, excellent at many exercises, which seemed scarce reconcilable with much intellectuality, because it must have required patience and attention to attain them. He usually followed the Duke to the chase and to the fight; and at Montferrary, when Charles was in considerable personal danger, wounded in the throat, and likely to be made prisoner by a French knight who had hold of his horse's rein, Tiel Weerswiler charged the assassin so forcibly, as to overthrow him and disengage his master. Perhaps he was afraid of this being thought too coarse a service for a person of his condition, and that it might excite his animosity among those knights and nobles, who had left the care of their master's person to the court-fool. At any rate, he chose rather to be laughed at than proved to be a schismatist, and made such gallanting boasts of his exploits in the battle, that most men thought the rescue of Charles was as much on the cap of his tale; and it was on this occasion he acquired the title of Le Glorieux, (or the boastful,) by which he was ever afterwards distinguished.

Le Glorieux was dressed very richly, but with little of the usual distinction of his profession; and that little rather of a symbolical than a very literal character. His head was not shorn, on the contrary, he wore a profusion of long curled hair, which descended from under his cap, and joining with a well-arranged, and handsomely trimmed beard, set off features, which, but for a wild lightness of eye, might have been termed handsome. A ring of scarlet velvet curled across the top of his cap, indicated, rather than positively represented, the professional cock's comb, which distinguished the head gear of a fool or right of office. His hauberk, made of ebony, was crested, as usual, with a fool's head, with one eye formed of silver; but so small, and so minutely carved, that, till very closely examined, it might have passed for an official badge of a more solemn character. These were the only badges of his office which his dress exhibited. In other respects, it was such as to match with that of the most courtly nobles. He bore a model of gold; he wore a chain of the same metal around his neck; and the richness of his rich garments was not much more surpassing than those of young gallants who have their clothes made in the extremity of the existing fashion.

To this personage Charles, and Louis, in answer of his host, often addressed themselves during the entertainment; and both seemed to murmur, by hearty laughter, their amusement at the answers of Le Glorieux.

"Whose words be those that are vaunted?" said Charles to the jester.

"One of those at least should be mine by right of custom," Charles replied Le Glorieux.

"Why so brave?" said Charles.

"Because they belong to the Seigneur D'Hymbre court and the Countess, who are gone so far to fit their falcons, that they have forgot their sense. They who would rather look at a kite on the way than a pheasant on the board, are of kin to the fox, and he should succeed in the stoop, as a part of the movable estate."

"That is but a stale jest, my friend Tiel," said the Duke; "but, fools or wise men, have come the Glorieux."

As he spoke, Comines and D'Hymbre court entered the room, and, after having made their reverence to the two Princes, examined in silence the seats which were left vacant for them.

"What ho! ere," exclaimed the Duke, addressing them, "your sport has been either very good or very bad, to lead you so far and so late. So Tiel de Comines, you are departed—both D'Hymbre court won so heavy a wager on you?—You are a philosopher, and should not grieve at bad fortune.—By Saint George! D'Hymbre court looks as sad as this dot.—How now, ere? Have you found no game? or have you lost your falcons? or has a witch come or way? or has the Wild Huntsman* met you in the forest? By my honour, you seem as if you were me to a funeral, not a festival."

While the Duke spoke, the eyes of the company were all directed towards D'Hymbercourt and Desmines; and the embarrassment and dejection of their countenances, neither being of that class of sons to whom such expression of anxious melancholy was natural, became so remarkable, that the mirth and laughter of the company, which the rapid circulation of goblets of excellent wine had raised to considerable height, was gradually hushed; and, without being able to assign any reason for such a change in their spirits, men spoke in whispers to each other, as on the eve of expecting some strange and important tidings.

"What means this silence, Messires?" said the Duke, elevating his voice, which was naturally harsh. "If you bring these strange looks, and this stranger silence, into festivity, we shall wish you had abode in the marshes seeking for herons, or rather for woodcocks and howlets."

"My gracious lord," said Des Comines, "as we were about to return hither from the forest, we met the Count of Crèvecœur."

"How!" said the Duke; "already returned from the forest?—but he found all well there, doubtless?"

"The Count himself will presently give your grace an account of his news," said D'Hymbercourt, "which we have heard but imperfectly."

"Body of me, where is the Count?" said the Duke.

"He changes his dress, to wait upon your Highness," answered D'Hymbercourt.

"His dress? Saint-bleu!" exclaimed the impatient prince, "what care I for his dress? I think I have conspired with him to drive me mad!"

"Or rather, to be plain," said Des Comines, "he wishes to communicate these news at a private audience."

"Teste-dieu! my Lord King," said Charles, "this is ever the way our counsellors serve us—If they have got hold of aught which they consider as important for our ear, they look as grave upon the matter, and are as proud of their burden as an ass of a pack-saddle.—Some one bid Crèvecœur come to me directly!—He comes from the frontiers of Liege, and, at least," (he laid some emphasis on the word,) "have no secrets in that quarter which we could wish to have proclaimed before the assembled court."

All perceived that the Duke had drunk so much wine as to increase the native obstinacy of his disposition, and though many would willingly have suggested that the present was neither a time for hearing nor for taking counsel, yet all knew the impetuosity of his temper too well to venture on farther interference, and sat in anxious expectation of the tidings which the Count might have to communicate.

A brief interval intervened, during which the Duke remained looking eagerly to the door, as if in a state of impatience, whilst the guests sat with their heads bent on the table, as if to conceal their curiosity and anxiety. Louis alone maintaining perfect composure, continued his conversation alternately with the grand carver and with the jester.

At length Crèvecœur entered, and was presently greeted by the hurried question of his master, "What news from Liege and Brabant, Sir Count?—the report of your arrival has chased mirth from our table; we hope your actual presence will bring it back to us."

"My liege and master," answered the Count, in a firm, but melancholy tone, "the news which I bring you are fitter for the council board than the banquet table."

"Out with them, man, if they were tidings from the East!" said the Duke; "but I can guess them. The Liegeois are again in mutiny."

"They are, my lord," said Crèvecœur, very gravely. "Look there, man," said the Duke, "I have hit upon it."

The famous apparition, sometimes called le Grand Veneur, gives some account of this hunting spectre.

at once on what you have been so much afraid to mention to me—the harebrained burghers are again in arms. It could not be in better time, for we may at present have the advice of our own Suzerain," bowing to King Louis, with eyes which spoke the most bitter, though suppressed resentment, "to teach us how such mutineers should be dealt with.—Hast thou more news in thy packet? Out with them, and then answer for yourself why you went not forward to assist the Bishop."

"My lord, the farther tidings are heavy for me to tell, and will be afflicting to you to hear.—No aid of mine, or of living chivalry, could have availed the excellent Prelate. William de la Marck, united with the insurgent Liegeois, has taken his Castle of Schonwaldt, and murdered him in his own hall."

"Murdered him!" repeated the Duke, in a deep and low tone, but which nevertheless was heard from the one end of the hall in which they were assembled to the other; "thou hast been imposed upon, Crèvecœur, by some wild report—it is impossible!"

"Alas! my lord!" said the Count, "I have it from an eyewitness, an archer of the King of France's Scottish Guard, who was in the hall when the murder was committed by William de la Marck's order."

"And who was doubtless aiding and abetting in the horrible sacrilege!" exclaimed the Duke, starting up and stamping with his foot with such fury, that he dashed in pieces the footstool which was placed before him. "Bar the doors of this hall, gentlemen—secure the windows—let no stranger stir from his seat, upon pain of instant death!—Gentlemen of my chamber, draw your swords." And turning upon Louis, he advanced his own hand slowly and deliberately to the hilt of his weapon, while the King, without either showing fear or assuming a defensive posture, only said,

"These news, fair cousin, have staggered your reason."

"No!" replied the Duke, in a terrible tone, "but they have awakened a just resentment, which I have too long suffered to be stifled by trivial considerations of circumstance and place. Murderer of thy brother!—rebel against thy parent!—tyrant over thy subjects!—treacherous ally!—perjured King!—dishonoured gentleman!—thou art in my power, and I thank God for it."

"Rather thank my folly," said the King; "for when we met on equal terms at Montlhéry, methinks you wished yourself farther from me than we are now."

The Duke still held his hand on the hilt of his sword, but refrained to draw his weapon, or to strike a foe, who offered no sort of resistance which could in anywise provoke violence.

Meanwhile, wild and general confusion spread itself through the hall. The doors were now fastened and guarded by order of the Duke; but several of the French nobles, few as they were in number, started from their seats, and prepared for the defence of their Sovereign. Louis had spoken not a word either to Orleans or Dunois since they were liberated from restraint at the Castle of Loches, if it could be termed liberation, to be dragged in King Louis's train, objects of suspicion evidently, rather than of respect and regard; but, nevertheless, the voice of Dunois was first heard above the tumult, addressing himself to the Duke of Burgundy.—"Sir Duke, you have forgotten that you are a vassal of France, and that we, your guests, are Frenchmen. If you lift a hand against our Monarch, prepare to sustain the utmost effects of our despair; for, credit me, we shall feast as high with the blood of Burgundy as we have done with its wine.—Courage, my Lord of Orleans—and you, gentlemen of France, form yourselves round Dunois, and do as he does!"

It was in that moment when a King might see upon what tempers he could certainly rely. The few independent nobles and knights who attended Louis, most of whom had only received from him frowns of discountenance, unappalled by the display of infinitely superior force, and the certainty of destruction in case they came to blows, hastened to array themselves around Dunois, and, led by him, to press towards the head of the table where the contending Princes were seated.

On the contrary, the wiles and agents whom Louis had dragged forward out of their biting and natural places, into importance which was not due to them, showed cowardice and cold heart, and, remaining still in their seats, seemed resolved not to provoke their fate by intermeddling, whatever might become of their benefactor.

The first of the more generous party was the venerable Lord Crawford, who, with an agility which no one would have expected at his years, forced his way through all opposition, (which was the less violent, as many of the Burgundians, either from a point of honour, or a secret inclination to prevent Louis's impending fall, gave way to him,) and threw himself boldly between the King and the Duke. He then placed his bonnet from which his white hair cascaded in dishevelled tresses, upon one side of his head; his pale cheek and withered brow coloured, and his eagle eye lightened with all the fire of a gallant who is about to dare some desperate action. His cloak was flung over one shoulder, and his action intreated his ready hands to wrap it about his left arm, while he unsheathed his sword with his right.

"I have fought for his father and his grandeur," that was all he said—and, by Saint Andrew and the mother as it will, I will not fail him at this perch.

What has taken some time to narrate, happened, in fact, in the speed of light, for so soon as the Duke perceived his threatening posture, Crawford had thrown himself between him and the object of his vengeance, and the French gentlemen, drawing together as fast as they could, were crowding to the same point.

The Duke of Burgundy still remained with his hand on his sword, and seemed in the act of giving the signal for a general onset, which must necessarily have ended in the massacre of the weaker party, when Crèvecoeur rushed forward, and exclaimed, in a voice like a trumpet, "My noble Lord of Burgundy, beware what you do! This is your hall; you are the King's vessel; do not spill the blood of your guest on your hearth; the blood of your Sovereign on the throne you have elected for him, and to which he came under your safeguard. For the sake of your house's honour, do not attempt to revenge one horrid murder by an other yet worse."

"Out of my road, Crèvecoeur," answered the Duke, "and let my vengeance pass!—Out of my path! The wrath of Kings is to be dreaded like that of Heaven."

"Only when, like that of Heaven, it is just," answered Crèvecoeur, firmly—"Let me pray of you, my lord, to rein the violence of your temper; however justly offended. And for you, my Lords of France, whose remembrance is unswerving, let me recommend you to forbear whatever may lead towards bloodshed."

He is right, said Louis, whose caution forebode him not in that dreadful moment, and who easily foresaw, that if a brawl should commence, more violence would be dared and done in the heat of blood, than was likely to be attempted if peace were preserved. My cousin Orleans and Dunois—and you, my trusty Crawford—bring not on ruin and bloodshed by taking offence too hastily. Our cousin the Duke is chafed at the tidings of the death of a near and loving friend, the venerable Bishop of Langs, whose slaughter we lament as he does. Ancient, and, unhappily recent subjects of jealousy lead him to suspect us of having abetted a crime which our common pleasure should our best murder us on this spot—as his King and his kinsmen, under a false impression of our being accessory to the unhappy accident, our fate will be little lightened, but on the contrary greatly aggravated, by your stirring. Therefore, stand back, Crawford—Were it my last word, I speak as a King to his officer, and demand obedience—Stand back, and, if it is required, yield up your sword. I command you to do so, and your oath obliges you to obey.

True, true, my lord, said Crawford, stepping back, and returning to the sheath the blade he had half drawn—"It may be all very true; but, by my honour, if I were at the head of thousands and ten of my brave fellows, instead of being loaded then the like number of years, I would try could have some reason out of them fit with their golden chains and loupé-up but brow-world dyes and devices on them."

The Duke stood with his eyes fixed on, for a considerable space, and then said, irony, "Crèvecoeur, you say well, and for our honour, that our obligations to this our honoured and loving guest, be not unjust, as in our hasty anger we had at first. We will so act, that all Europe shall see the justice of our proceedings. Gentlemen, you must render up your arms to my officer; master has broken the trees, and has no further benefit of it. In compassion, however, to the sentiments of honour, and in respect to the bath disgraced, and the race from which degenerated, we ask not our cousin Louis."

"Not one of us," said Dunois, "will weapon, or quit the hall, unless we are at least our King's safety, in life and limb."

"Nor will a man of the Scottish Guard, of Crawford," lay down his arms, save a man of the King of France, or his Highness."

"Brave Dunois," said Louis, "and you, Crawford, your valour will do me injury none fit—I trust," he added with dignity, "as I cause, more than in a vain resistance, will cost the lives of my best and bravest your swords—the noble Burgundians, such honourable pledges, will be more able to protect both you and me.—Give up your arms—I am I who command you."

It was then that, in this dreadful emergency, showed the promptitude of decision, and judgment, which alone could have saved him. He was aware, that until actual blows were given, he should have the assistance of most able present to moderate the fury of their passions that were a waste once commenced, and his few adherents must be instantly. At the same time, his worst enemies could his demeanour had in it nothing either of or cowardice. He shunned to aggravate the wrath of the Duke, but he neither seemed to fear it, and continued to look on the calm and fixed attention with which a eye the menacing gestures of a lunatic, a scene that his own steadiness and composure as an insupportable and powerful check on the of insanity.

Crawford, at the King's command, threw to Crèvecoeur, saying, "Take it! and the joy of it.—It is no dishonour to the man who yields it, for we have had no fair play."

"Hold, gentlemen," said the Duke, in voice, as one whom passion had almost utterance, "retain your swords; it is sufficient promise not to use them.—And you, Louis must regard yourself as my prisoner, uncared of having abetted sacrilege and murder him to the Castle—Have him to Karl Herber. Let him have six gentlemen of his train to such as he shall choose.—My Lord of Crawford must leave the Castle, and shall be quartered elsewhere.—Up with every draw down with every portcullis.—Let the gates be trebly guarded.—Draw the floating-bay right-hand side of the river—Draw round my band of Black Wallons, and treble them on every post! You, D'Hymbercourt, his troops of horse and foot make the round of every half-hour during the night, and every morning the next day,—if indeed each ward of cessary after daybreak, for it is like we may in this matter.—Look to the person of Louis love your life!"

He started from the table in terror and darted a glance of mortal anxiety at the rushed out of the apartment.

"Sire," said the King, looking with dismay at him, "grat for the death of his ally bath s

, the all-licensed jester, seizing the amiliarly, began to march along with der a strong guard, yet forgetting no respect, he conducted the King towards ment. I shall attend this celebrated interview, as played upon in the foregoing chapter. Against I suspected the people of Louis in what against who Charles, and persecute and murder their do was not prepared for their coming with much my flow to arms with the tenacity of a Sicilian being prisoner, chained and reviled him, and in a few days he was dead. This news was first spread at the moment when Louis had no co- fring in his power, and the commotion placed guards on the Castle of Peronne and the treasury of the King of France in starting systems, while he pretended the most intimate relations whether he should not put Louis to

At length he only agreed to give Louis

But Louis made of compensating for the effects of his y submitted to this deplorable condition, but a sword was said to have belonged to Char- mithings are from Countess. There is a man of them in the Cathedral of Amiens's Bishop of Four men-at-arms, carrying alternately naked swords and blazing torches, served as the escort, or rather the guard, of King Louis, from the town-hall of Peronne to the Castle; and as he entered within its darksome and gloomy strength, it seemed as if a voice screamed in his ear that warning which the Florentine has inscribed over the portal of the infernal regions, "Leave all hope behind!"

At that moment, perhaps, some feeling of remorse might have crossed the King's mind, had he thought on the hundreds, nay thousands, whom, without cause, or on light suspicion, he had committed to the abysses of his dungeons, deprived of all hope of liberty, and loathing even the life to which they clung by animal instinct.

The broad glare of the torches outshining the pale moon, which was more obscured on this than on the former night, and the red smoky light which they dispersed around the ancient buildings, gave a darker shade to that huge donjon, called the Earl Harbar's Tower. It was the same that Louis had viewed with maddening presentiment on the preceding evening, and of which he was now doomed to become an inhabitant, under the terror of what violence never the wrathful temper of his overgrown vassal might tempt him to exercise in these secret rooms of despotism.

To aggravate the King's painful feelings, he saw, as he crossed the court-yard, several bodies, every one of which had been hastily flung a military cloak. He was not long of discerning that they were corpses of slain archers of the Scottish Guard, who having disputed, as the Count Crèvecoeur informed him, the command given them to quit the post near the King's apartments, a brawl had ensued between them and the Duke's Walloon body-guards, and before it could be composed by the officers on either side, several lives had been lost.

"My trusty Scots!" said the King, as he looked upon this melancholy spectacle; "had they brought only man to man, all Flanders, ay, and Burgundy to boot, had not furnished champions to mate you."

"Yes, an it please your Majesty," said Belafre, who attended close behind the King. "Masonry mows the meadow—few men can fight more than two at once. I myself never care to meet three, unless it be in the way of special duty, when one must not stand to count heads."

"Art thou there, old acquaintance?" said the King, looking behind him, "then I have one true subject with me yet."

"And a faithful minister, whether in your councils, or in his offices about your royal person," whispered Oliver de Dan.

"We are all faithful," said Tristan l'Hermite, gruffly; "for should they put to death your Majesty, there is no one of us whom they would suffer to survive you, even if we would."

"Now, that is what I call good corporal bail for fidelity," said Le Glorieux, who, as already mentioned, with the readiness proper to an infirm brain, had thrust himself into their company.

Meanwhile the Seneschal, hastily summoned, was turning with laborious effort the ponderous key which opened the reluctant gate of the huge Gothic Keep, and was at last fain to call for the assistance of one of Crèvecoeur's attendants. When they had succeeded, six men entered with torches and showed the way through a narrow and winding passage, commanded at different points by shot holes from vaults and casements constructed behind, and in the thickness of the massive walls. At the end of this passage, arose a stair of corresponding rudeness, consisting of huge blocks of stone, roughly dressed with the hammer, and of unequal height. Having mounted this ascent, a strong iron-clenched door admitted them to what had been the great hall of the donjon, lighted but very faintly even during the daytime, (for the apertures, diminished in appearance by the excessive thickness of the walls, resembled slits rather than windows,) and now, but for the blaze of the torches, almost perfectly dark. Two or three bats, and other birds of evil presage, roused by the unusual glare, flew against the lights, and threatened to extinguish them; while the Seneschal formally apologized to the King, that the State-hall had not been put in order, such was the hurry of the notice sent to him; and adding, that, in truth, the apartment had not been in use for twenty years, and rarely before that time, so far as ever he had heard, since the time of King Charles the Simple.

"King Charles the Simple!" echoed Louis; "I know the history of the Tower now.—He was here murdered by his treacherous vassal, Herbert, Earl of Vermandois—So say our annals. I knew there was something concerning the Castle of Peronne which dwelt on my mind, though I could not recall the circumstance.—Here, then, my predecessor was slain?"

"Not here, not exactly here, and please your Majesty," said the old Seneschal, stepping with the eager haste of a cicerone, who shows the curiosities of such a place—"Not here, but in the side-chamber a little onward, which opens from your Majesty's bedchamber."

He hastily opened a wicket at the upper end of the hall, which led into a bedchamber, small, as is usual in such old buildings; but, even for that reason, rather more comfortable than the waste hall through which they had passed. Some hasty preparations had been here made for the King's accommodation. Arras had been tacked up, a fire lighted in the rusty grate, which had been long unused, and a pallet laid down for those gentlemen who were to pass the night in his chamber, as was then usual.

"We will get beds in the hall for the rest of your attendants," said the garrulous old man; "but we have had such brief notice, if it please your Majesty.—And if it please your Majesty to look upon this little wicket behind the arras, it opens into the little old cabinet in the thickness of the wall where Charles was slain; and there is a secret passage from below, which admitted the men who were to deal with him. And your Majesty, whose eyesight I hope is better than mine, may see the blood still on the oak-floor, though the thing was done five hundred years ago."

While he thus spoke, he kept fumbling to open the postern of which he spoke, until the King said, "Forbear, old man—forbear but a little while, when thou mayst have a newer tale to tell, and fresher blood to show.—My Lord of Crèvecœur, what say you?"

"I can but answer, Sire, that these two interior apartments are as much at your Majesty's disposal as those in your own Castle at Plessis, and that Crèvecœur, a name never blackened by treachery or assassination, has the guard of the exterior defences of it."

"But the private passage into that closet, of which the old man speaks?" This King Louis said in a low and anxious tone, holding Crèvecœur's arm fast with one hand, and pointing to the wicket door with the other.

"It must be some dream of Mornay's," said Crèvecœur, "or some old and absurd tradition of the place;—but we will examine."

He was about to open the closet door, when Louis answered, "No, Crèvecœur, no—Your honour is sufficient warrant.—But what will your Duke do with me, Crèvecœur? He cannot hope to keep me long a prisoner; and—in short, give me your opinion, Crèvecœur."

"My Lord and Sire," said the Count, "how the Duke of Burgundy must resent this horrible cruelty on the person of his near relative and ally, is for your Majesty to judge; and what right he may have to consider it as instigated by your Majesty's emissaries, you only can know. But my master is noble in his disposition, and made incapable, even by the very strength of his passions, of any underhand practices. Whatever he does, will be done in the face of day, and of the two nations. And I can but add, that it will be the wish of every counsellor around him—accepting perhaps one—that he should behave in matter with mildness and generosity, as we justice."

"Ah! Crèvecœur," said Louis, taking his hand if affected by some painful recollections, "happy is the Prince who has counsellors near who can guard him against the effects of his angry passions! Their names will be read in letters, when the history of his reign is perused. Noble Crèvecœur, had it been my lot to have as thou art about my person?"

"It had in that case been your Majesty's to have got rid of them as fast as you could," Le Glorieux.

"Aha! Sir Wisdom, art thou there?" said Louis, turning round, and instantly changing the pathos in which he had addressed Crèvecœur, adopting with facility one which had a turn of irony in it—"Hast thou followed us hither?"

"Ay, sir," answered Le Glorieux, "Wisdom may follow in motley, where Folly leads the way in purple."

"How shall I construe that, Sir Solomon?" answered Louis—"Wouldst thou change condition with me?"

"Not I, by my halidome," quoth Le Glorieux, "you would give me fifty crowns to boot."

"Why, wherefore so?—Methinks I could be well enough contented, as princes go, to have thee for a king."

"Ay, Sire," replied Le Glorieux; "but the question is, whether, judging of your Majesty's wit from it having lodged you here, I should not have cause to be ashamed of having so dull a fool."

"Peace, sirrah!" said the Count of Crèvecœur, "your tongue runs too fast."

"Let it take its course," said the King; "I know of no such fair subject of raillery, as the follies of those who should know better.—Here, my sagacious friend, take this purse of gold, and with it the advice never to be so great a fool as to deem yourself wiser than other people. Prithce, do me so much favour as to inquire after my astrologer, Martin Galeotti, and send him hither to me presently."

"I will, without fail, my Liege," answered the jester; "and I wot well I shall find him at Jan Dopplethur's; for philosophers, as well as fools, know where the best wine is sold."

"Let me pray for free entrance for this learned person through your guards, Seignior de Crèvecœur," said Louis.

"For his entrance, unquestionably," answered the Count; "but it grieves me to add, that my instructions do not authorize me to permit any one to enter your Majesty's apartments.—I wish your Majesty good night," he subjoined, "and will presently make such arrangements in the outer hall, as may put the gentlemen who are to inhabit it, more at their ease."

"Give yourself no trouble for them, Sir Count," replied the King, "they are men accustomed to hardships at defiance; and, to speak truth, excepting that I wish to see Galeotti, I would desire a little further communication from without this night as may be consistent with your instructions."

"These are, to leave your Majesty," replied Crèvecœur, "undisputed possession of your own apartments. Such are my master's orders."

"Your master, Count Crèvecœur," answered Louis, "whom I may also term mine, is a right gracious master.—My dominions," he added, "are somewhat shrunk in compass, now that they have dwindled to an old hall and a bedchamber; but they are still wide enough for all the subjects which I can at present boast of."

The Count of Crèvecœur took his leave; and shortly after, they could hear the noise of the sentinels moving to their posts, accompanied with the word of command from the officers, and the tread of the guards who were relieved. At length all became still, and the only sound which filled the air was the sluggish murmur of the river Somme, as it glided, deep and muddy, under the walls of the castle.

person from the Madonna of Rimbrun, a favourite dol, to whom he often paid his vows.

"Sweet Lady of Clery," he exclaimed, clasping his hands and beating his breast while he spoke—"blessed Mother of Mercy! thou who art competent with Omnipotence, have compassion with me a sinner! It is true, that I have something neglected thee for thy blessed sister of Rimbrun; but I am a King, my power is great, my wealth boundless; and, were it otherwise, I would double the gabulle on my subjects, rather than not pay my debts to you both.
Undo these iron doors—fill up those tremendous moats—lead me, as a mother leads a child, out of this present and pressing danger! If I have given thy sister the county of Houlagne, to be held of her for ever, have I no means of showing devotion to thee also? Thou shalt have the broad and rich province of Champagne; and its vineyards shall pour their abundance into thy convent. I had promised the province to my brother Charles; but he, thou knowest, is dead—poisoned by that wicked Abbé of Saint John d'Angely, whom, if I live, I will punish!
—I promised this once before, but this time I will keep my word.—If I had any knowledge of the crime, believe, dearest patroness, it was because I knew no better method of quieting the discontents of my kingdom. O, do not reckon that old debt to my account to-day; but be, as thou hast ever been, kind, benig-nant, and easy to be entreated! Sweetest Lady, work with thy child, that he will pardon all past sins, and one—one little deed which I must do this night—nay, it is no sin, dearest Lady of Clery—no sin, but an act of justice privately administered; for the villain is the greatest impostor that ever poured falsehood into a Prince's ear, and leads besides to the filthy heresy of the Greeks. He is not deserving of thy protection; have him to my care; and hold it as good service that I rid the world of him, for the man is a nervesnapper and wizard, that is not worth thy thought and care—a dog, the extinction of whose life ought to be of as little consequence in thine eyes, as the treading out a spark that drops from a lamp, or springs from a fire. Think not of this little matter, gentlest, kindest Lady, but only consider how thou canst best aid me in my troubles! and I have bid my royal squire to thy effigy, in token that I will keep my word concerning the county of Champagne, and that this shall be the last time I will trouble thee in affairs of blood, knowing thou art so kind, so gentle, and so tender-hearted."

After this extraordinary contract with the object of his adoration, Louis recited, apparently with deep devotion, the seven penitential psalms in Latin, and several aves and prayers especially belonging to the service of the Virgin. He then arose, satisfied that he had secured the intercession of the Saint to whom he had prayed, the rather, as he craftily reflected, that most of the sins for which he had requested her mediation on former occasions had been of a different character, and that, therefore, the Lady of Clery was less likely to consider him as a hardened and habitual sinner of blood, than the other saints whom he had more frequently made confidants of his crimes in that respect.

While I perused these passages in the old manuscript above-mentioned I could not help feeling astonished that an intelligent narrator as that of Louis XI certainly was could so deeply mistake by a sort of misapprehension of which one would think the all-powerful sagacity incapable. But the force of the King's prayer, on a similar occasion, as preserved by Brantôme, was of a totally fully an extraordinary. It is that which being overheard by a friend or servant was by him made public and set on light as not of a private which might never have been suspected.
The way in which the story is narrated by the corrupted narrator who could not with all that is rational as well as with all that is prodigious in worthy the reader's notice. The words are so obscure and so vague that they are not worth with hearts of the reader will then, capable and willing to make their mistake of language.

Among the numerous great tricks of disguise often seen, and famous of gallantry which the good King (Louis XI) did in his time he put to death his brother the Duke de Guyenne, at the moment when the Duke least thought of such a thing, and when the King was making the greatest show of love to him during his life and of affection to him at his death, saying the most ravishing words with an art that I would never have been known had not the King taken care to have covered a fool who had betrayed to his dearest brother. This is allegory that Louis, being engaged in his dearest projects, and

When he had thus cleared his conscience, or rather whited it over like a sepulchre, the King thrust his head out at the door of the hall, and summoned Le Balafre into his apartment. "My good soldier," he said, "thou hast served me long, and hast had little promotion. We are here in a case where I may either live or die; but I would not willingly die an ungrateful man, or leave, so far as the saints may place it in my power, either a friend or an enemy unrecompensed. Now, I have a friend to be rewarded, that is thyself—an enemy to be punished according to his deserts, and that is the base, treacherous villain, Martius Galeotti, who, by his impostures and specious falsehoods, has trained me hither into the power of my mortal enemy, with as firm a purpose of my destruction, as ever butcher had of slaying the beast which he drove to the shambles."

"I will challenge him on that quarrel, since they say he is a fighting blade, though he looks somewhat unwieldy," said Le Balafre. "I doubt not but the Duke of Burgundy is so much a friend to men of the sword, that he will allow us a fair field within some reasonable space; and if your Majesty live so long, and enjoy so much freedom, you shall behold me do battle in your right, and take as proper a vengeance on this philosopher as your heart could desire."

"I commend your bravery and your devotion to my service," said the King. "But this treacherous villain is a stout man-at-arms, and I would not willingly risk thy life, my brave soldier."

"I were no brave soldier, if it please your Majesty," said Balafre, "if I dared not face a better man than he. A fine thing it would be for me, who can neither read nor write, to be afraid of a fat lurdane, who has done little else all his life!"

"Nevertheless," said the King, "it is not our pleasure so to put thee in venture, Balafre. This traitor comes hither, summoned by our command. We would have thee, so soon as thou canst find occasion, close up with him, and smite him under the fifth rib—Dost thou understand me?"

"Truly I do," answered Le Balafre; "but, if it please your Majesty, this is a matter entirely out of my course of practice. I could not kill you a dog, unless it were in hot assault, or pursuit, or upon defiance given, or such like."

"Why sure thou dost not pretend to tenderness of heart?" said the King; "thou who hast been first in storm and siege, and most eager, as men tell me, on the pleasures and advantages which are gained on such occasions by the rough heart and the bloody hand?"

"My lord," answered Le Balafre, "I have neither feared nor spared your enemies, sword in hand. And an assault is a desperate matter, under risks which raise a man's blood so, that, by Saint Andrew, it will not settle for an hour or two,—which I call a fair license for plundering after a storm. And God pity us poor soldiers, who are first driven mad with danger, and then madder with victory. I have heard of a legion consisting entirely of saints; and methinks it would take them all to pray and intercede for the rest of the army, and for all who wear plumes and corselets, buff-coats and broadswords. But what your Majesty purposes is out of my course of practice, though I will never deny that it has been wide enough. As for the astrologer, if he be a traitor, let him e'en die a traitor's death—I will neither meddle nor make with it. Your Majesty has your Provost, and two of his Marshal's-men without, who are more fit for orisons at the high altar of our Lady of Clery, whom he called his good patroness, and no person nigh except this fool, who, without his knowledge, was within earshot, he thus gave vent to his pious homilies:—

"Ah, my good Lady, my gentle mistress, my only friend, in whom alone I have resource, I pray you to supplicate God in my behalf, and to be my advocate with him that he may pardon me the death of my brother whom I caused to be poisoned by that wicked Abbot of Saint John. I confess my guilt to thee as to my good patroness and mistress. But then what could I do? he was perpetually causing disorder in my kingdom.—Cause me then to be pardoned, my good Lady, and I know what a reward I will give thee."

This singular confession did not escape the jester, who upbraided the King with the fratricide in the face of the whole company at dinner, which Louis was fain to let pass without observation, in case of increasing the slander dealing with him than a Scottish gentleman of my family and standing in the service."

"You say well," said the King; "but, at least, it belongs to thy duty to prevent interruption, and to guard the execution of my most just sentence."

"I will do so against all Peronne," said Le Balafre. "Your Majesty need not doubt my fealty in that which I can reconcile to my conscience, which, for mine own convenience and the service of your royal Majesty, I can vouch to be a pretty large one—at least, I know I have done some deeds for your Majesty, which I would rather have eaten a handful of my own dagger than I would have done for any else."

"Let that rest," said the King; "and hear you—when Galeotti is admitted, and the door shut on him, do you stand to your weapon, and guard the entrance on the inside of the apartment. Let no one intrude—that is all I require of you. Go hence, and send the Provost-Marshal to me."

Balafre left the apartment accordingly, and in a minute afterwards Tristan l'Hermite entered from the hall.

"Welcome, gossip," said the King; "what think'est thou of our situation?"

"As of men sentenced to death," said the Provost-Marshal, "unless there come a reprieve from the Duke."

"Reprieved or not, he that decoyed us into this snare shall go our fourrier to the next world, to take up lodgings for us," said the King, with a grim and ferocious smile. "Tristan, thou hast done many an act of brave justice—finis—I should have said finis coronat opus. Thou must stand by me to the end."

"I will, my liege," said Tristan; "I am but a plain fellow, but I am grateful. I will do my duty within these walls, or elsewhere; and while I live, your Majesty's breath shall pour as potential a note of condemnation, and your sentence be as literally executed, as when you sat on your own throne. They may deal with me the next hour for it if they will—I care not."

"It is even what I expected of thee, my loving gossip," said Louis; "but hast thou good assistance?—the traitor is strong and able-bodied, and will doubtless be clamorous for aid. The Scot will do nought but keep the door; and well that he can be brought to that, by flattery and humouring. Then Oliver is good for nothing but lying, flattering, and suggesting dangerous counsels; and, Ventre Saint-dieu! I think is more like one day to deserve the halter himself, than to use it to another. Have you men, think you, and means, to make sharp and sure work?"

"I have Trois-Echelles and Petit-André with me," said he—"men so expert in their office, that out of three men, they would hang up one ere his two companions were aware. And we have all resolved to live or die with your Majesty, knowing we shall have as short breath to draw when you are gone, as ever fell to the lot of any of our patients.—But what is to be our present subject, an it please your Majesty? I love to be sure of my man; for, as your Majesty is pleased sometimes to remind me, I have now and then mistaken the criminal, and strung up in his place an honest labourer, who had given your Majesty no offence."

"Most true," said the other. "Know then, Tristan, that the condemned person is Martius Galeotti.—You start, but it is even as I say. The villain hath trained us all hither by false and treacherous representations, that he might put us into the hands of the Duke of Burgundy without defence."

"But not without vengeance?" said Tristan: "were it the last act of my life, I would sting him home like an expiring wasp, should I be crushed to pieces on the next instant!"

"I know thy trusty spirit," said the King, "and the pleasure which, like other good men, thou dost find in the discharge of thy duty, since virtue, as the schoolmen say, is its own reward. But away, and prepare the priests, for the victim approaches."

"Would you have it done in your own presence, my gracious liege?" said Tristan.

Louis declined this offer; but charged the Provost-

Marched to have every thing ready for the punctual execution of his commands the moment the Astrologer left his apartment: "for," said the King, "I will see the villain once more, just to observe how he bears himself towards the master whom he has led into the trap. I shall have to see the man of approaching death strike the colour from that ruddy cheek, and dim that eye which laughed as it led. — Oh, that there were but another with him, whose words needed his prognostications! But if I survive this — back to your altar, my Lord Cardinal! for some angelic voice protect you — be it spoken under favour of Saint Peter and the blessed Lady of Clery, who is all over mercy. — Why do you tarry? Go get your garments ready. I expect the villain instantly. I say to Heaven he take not fear and come not! — but were indeed a hawk. Beyond, Tristan — then wert not want to be so slow when business was to be done."

"On the contrary, as it like your Majesty, you were ever wont to say that I was too fast, and mistook your purpose, and did the job on the wrong subject. Now, please your Majesty to give me a sign, when you part with Galeotti for the night, whether the business goes on or no. I have known your Majesty once or twice change your mind, and blame my over-despatch."

"That suspicious creature," answered King Louis, "I tell thee I will not change my mind; — but to remove thy remonstrances, observe, if I say to the Provost at parting, 'There is a Heaven above us!' — then let the business go on; but if I say, 'Go in peace,' you will understand that my purpose is altered."

"My head is somewhat of the dullest out of my two departments," said Tristan l'Hermite. "Stay, for me rehearse — If you bid him depart in peace, I say to have him dealt upon?"

"No, no — that, no!" said the King; "in that case you let him pass free. But if I say, 'There is a Heaven above us!' up with him a yard or two nearer the place he is an executioner with."

"I wish we may have the means here," said the Provost.

"Then up with him or down with him, it matters not," answered the King, grimly smiling.

"And the body," said the Provost, "how shall we dispose of it?"

"Let me see an instant," said the King; — the windows of the hall are too narrow; but that projecting arched is wide enough. We will cover with him upon the scaffold, and put a paper on his breast, with the legend, 'Let the justice of the King pass toll-free.' The Duke's officers may come it for dinner if they dare."

The Provost-Marshal left the apartment of Louis, and summoned his two constants to council in an antechamber in the great hall, where Trois-Echelles struck a torch against the wall to give them light. They discoursed in whispers, little noticed by Oliver le Dain, who seemed sunk in dejection, and Le Balais, who was fast asleep.

"Comrades," said the Provost to his executioners, "perhaps you have thought that our vocation was over, or that, at least, we were more likely to be the subjects of the duty of others, than to have any more to discharge on our own parts. But count, my masters! our gracious master has reserved as one noble out of our office, and it must be faithfully executed, as by men who would live in glory."

"Ay, I guess how it is," said Trois-Echelles; "our patron is like the old Kaisers of Rome, who, when things came to an extremity, or, as we would say, to the ladder shot with them, were wont to send from their own numbers of justice some executioner, who might spare their sacred persons from the awkward attempts of a novice or a foreigner in our mystery. It was a pretty custom in France, in a history of Louis XI. observes, that his Provost-Marshal was often as prostrate in execution as the guilty person himself of him whom the King had indicated. The story contained a double execution, by the death of the culprit and the executioner, who was usually a for Echnica; but, as a good catholic, I should make some scruple at laying hands on the Most Christian King."

"Nay, but, brother, you are ever too scrupulous," said Petit-André. "If he issues word and warrant for his own execution, I see not how we can in duty dispute it. He that dwells at Rome must obey the Pope — the Marshal's-men must do their master's bidding, and be the King's."

"Hush, you knaves!" said the Provost-Marshal, "there is here no purpose concerning the King's person, but only that of the Greek heretic pagan and Mahomedan wizard, Martin Galeotti."

"Galeotti?" answered Petit-André; "that comes quite natural. I never knew one of these lightning-main fellows, who pass their life, as one may say, in dancing upon a tight rope, but what they came at length to caper at the end of one — to break?"

"My only concern is," said Trois-Echelles, looking upwards, "that the poor creature must die without confession!"

"Tush! tush!" said the Provost-Marshal, in reply, "he is a rank heretic and necromancer — a whole college of priests could not absolve him from the charge he has deserved. Besides, if he hath a fancy that way, thou hast a gift, Trois-Echelles, to serve him for ghostly father thyself. But, what is more material, I fear you must use your poniards, my mates; for you have not here the fitting conveniences for the exercise of your profession."

"Now, our Lady of the Isle of Paris forbid," said Trois-Echelles, "that the King's command should find me destitute of my tools." I always wear around my body Saint Francis's cord, doubled four times, with a handsome loop at the farther end of it; for I am of the company of Saint Francis, and may wear his cowl when I am in extremis — I thank God and the good fathers of Saurer."

"And for me," said Petit-André, "I have always in my budget a handy block and sheaf, or a pulley on they call it, with a strong screw for securing it where I list, in case we should travel where trees are scarce, or high-branched from the ground. I have found it a great convenience."

"That will suit as well," said the Provost-Marshal; "you have but to screw your pulley into yonder beam above the door, and pass the rope over it. I will keep the fellow in some conversation near the spot until you adjust the noose under his chin, and then —"

"And then we run up the rope," said Petit-André, "and, adieu! our Astrologer is no far in Heaven, that he hath not a foot on earth."

"But these gentlemen," said Trois-Echelles, looking towards the chimney, "do not these help, and so take a handful of our vocation?"

"Hem! no," answered the Provost; "the better only contrives mischief, which he leaves other men to execute; and for the Scot, he keeps the door when the deed is a doing, which he hath not spirit or quickness sufficient to partake in more actively — every one to his trade."

With infinite dexterity, and even a sort of professional delight which sweetened the means of their own precarious situation, the worthy executioners of the Provost's mandates adapted their rope and pulley for putting in force the sentence which had been uttered against Galeotti by the captive Monarch — meaning to rejoice that that last action was to be one so consistent with their past life. Tristan l'Hermite sat eyeing their proceedings with a species of satisfaction; while Oliver paid no attention to them whatever; and Ladovic Lealy, if awaked by the bustle, he looked upon them at all, considered them as engaged in matters entirely unconnected with his own duty, and for which he was not to be regarded as responsible in one way or other.

* The author has endeavored to give to the officer Tristan l'Hermite a species of dogged and brutal fidelity to Louis, similar to the attachment of a bull dog to his master. With all the severity of his execrable character, he was certainly a man of courage, and was, in his youth, made knight on the battle of Poitiers, with a great number of other young nobles, by the banner (young) hand of the older Dauphin, the celebrated son of Charles the Fifth's reign.

Old Play.

When obeying the command, or rather the request of Louis,—for he was in circumstances in which, though a monarch, he could only request Le Glorieux to go in search of Martinus Galeotti,—the latter had no trouble in accepting his commission, betaking himself at once to the best tavern in Peronne, of which he himself was rather more than an occasional frequenter, being a great admirer of that species of liquor which reduced all other men's brains to a level with his own.

He found, or rather observed, the Astrologer in the corner of the public drinking-room—sovereign, as it is called in German and Flemish, from its principal furniture—sitting in close colloquy with a female in a singular, and something like a Moorish or Asiatic garb, who, as Le Glorieux approached Martinus, rose as in the act to depart.

"These," said the stranger, "are news on which you may rely with absolute certainty;" and with that disappeared among the crowd of guests who sat grouped at different tables in the apartment.

"Cousin Philosopher," said the jester, presenting himself, "Heaven no sooner relieves one sentinel than it sends another to supply the place. One fool being gone, here I come another, to guide you to the apartments of Louis of France."

"And art thou the messenger?" said Martinus, gazing on him with prompt apprehension, and discovering at once the jester's quality, though less intimated, as we have before noticed, than was usual, by his external appearance.

"Ay, sir, and like your learning," answered Le Glorieux; "when Power sends Folly to entreat the approach of Wisdom, 'tis a sure sign what foot the patient halts upon."

"How if I refuse to come, when summoned at so late an hour by such a messenger?" said Galeotti.

"In that case we will consult your arm, and carry you," said Le Glorieux. "Here are half a score of stout Burgundian yeomen at the door, with whom the Count of Crèvecoeur has furnished me to that effect. For know, that my friend Charles of Burgundy and I have not taken away our kinsman Louis's crown, which he was as enough to put into our power, but have only filed and elipt it a little; and, though reduced to the size of a spangle, it is still pure gold. In plain terms, he is still paramount over his own people, yourself included, and most Christian King of the old dining-hall in the Castle of Peronne, to which you, as his liege subject, are presently obliged to repair."

"I attend you, sir," said Martinus Galeotti, and accompanied Le Glorieux accordingly—coming, perhaps, that no evasion was possible.

"Ay, sir," said the Fool, as they went towards the Castle, "you do well; for we treat our kinsman as men use an old furnished lion in his cage, and thrust him now and then a calf to mumble, to keep his old jaws in exercise."

"Do you mean," said Martinus, "that the King intends me bodily injury?"

"Nay, that you can guess better than I," said the jester; "for, though the night be cloudy, I warrant you can see the stars through the mist. I know nothing of the matter, not I—only my mother always told me to go warily near an old rat in a trap, for he was never so much disposed to bite."

The Astrologer asked no more questions, and Le Glorieux, according to the custom of those of his class, continued to run on in a wild and disordered stream of sarcasm and folly mingled together, until he delivered the philosopher to the guard at the castle-gate of Peronne; where he was passed from guard to warder, and at length admitted within Robert's Tower.

The hints of the jester had not been lost on Martinus Galeotti, and he saw something which seemed to confirm them in the look and manner of Tristram, whose mode of addressing him, as he marshalled him to the King's bedchamber, was lowering, solemn, and ominous. A close observer of what passed on earth as well as among the heavenly bodies, the pulley and the rope also caught the Astrologer's eye; and as the latter was in a state of vibration, he concluded that some one who had been busy adjusting it had been interrupted in the work by his sudden arrival. All this he saw and summoned together his subtlety to evade the impending danger revealed, should he find that impossible, to defend himself to the last against whomsoever should assail him.

Thus resolved, and with a step and look corresponding to the determination he had taken, Martinus presented himself before Louis, alike unabashed at the miscarriage of his predictions, and undismayed at the Monarch's anger, and its probable consequences.

"Every good planet be gracious to your Majesty," said Galeotti, with an inclination almost Oriental in manner. "Every evil constellation withhold its influence from my royal master!"

"Methinks," replied the King, "that when you look around this apartment, when you think upon its situation, and how guarded, your wisdom might consider that my propitious stars had proved failures, and that each evil conjunction had already done its worst. Art thou not ashamed, Martinus Galeotti, to see me here, and a prisoner, when you recollect by what assurances I was lured hither?"

"And art thou not ashamed, my royal Sir?" replied the philosopher, "thou, whose step is so sure, was so forward, thy apprehension so quick, thy perseverance so unceasing,—art thou not ashamed to turn from the first frown of fortune, like a craven from the first clash of arms? Didst thou propose to become participant of those mysteries which run men above the passions, the machineries, the poise, the sorrows of life, a state only to be attained by rivaling the firmness of the ancient Stone, and then shrink from the first pressure of adversity and forfeit the glorious prize for which thou didst start as a competitor frightened out of the course, like a scared racer, by shadowy and unreal evils?"

"Shadows and unreal!" frontless as thou art!" exclaimed the King, "in this dungeon unreal!—the weapons of the guards of my detested enemy Burgundy which you may hear clash at the gate, or these shadows? What, traitor, are real evils, if imprisonment, dethronement, and danger of life be not so?"

"Ignorance—ignorance, my brother, and ignorance," answered the sage, with great firmness, "is the only real evil. Believe me, that Kings in the plenitude of power, if immersed in ignorance and prejudice, are less free than slaves in a dungeon, and loaded with material chains. Towards thee my happiness it is mine to guide you—be it yours to attend to my instructions."

"And it is to such philosophical freedom that your lessons would have guided me?" said the King, bitterly. "I would you had told me at Plessis, that the dominion promised me so liberally was as rough over my own passions, that the success of what I was assured, related to my progress in philosophy, and that I might become as wise and as learned as strolling mountebank of Italy! I sought surely but attained this mental ascendancy at a more moderate price than that of forsaking the fairest crown of Christendom, and becoming tenant of a dungeon in Peronne!" (Oh, sir, and think not to escape such punishment. There is a Heaven above us.)

"I leave you not to your fate," replied Martinus, "until I have vindicated, even in your eyes, dishonoured as they are, that reputation, a brighter gem than the brightest in thy crown, and at which the world shall wonder, ages after all the race of Capet are mouldered into oblivion in the charnels of Saint Denis."

"Speak on," said Louis; "these impediments do not make me change my purpose or my opinion."

“Yet as I may never again pass judgment as a King, I will not venture thus unheard. Speak, then—though the best thou canst say will be to speak the truth. Confess that I am a dupe, thou an impostor thy pretended science a dream, and the planets which gaze above us as little influential of our destiny, as their shadows, when reflected in the river, are capable of altering its course.”

"And how know'st thou," answered the astrologer boldly, "the secret influence of yonder blessed lights? Speak'st thou of their inability to influence others, when yet thou know'st of their even the weakest, be myself,—weakest because nearest to this wretched earth of ours,—holds under her domination, not such poor streams as the Danube, but the tide of the mighty ocean itself, which ebb and returns as her dark waves and waves, and watch her motions as a slave waits the nod of a Sultan? And you, Louis of Valois, answer my parable in turn—confess, art thou not like the foolish passenger, who becomes wroth with his pilot because he cannot bring to windward, into harbour without experiencing occasionally the adverse force of winds and currents? I said indeed point to thee the probable cause of thine ills; but as prosperous, but it was in the power of heaven alone to conduct thee further; and if the path is rough and dangerous, was it in my power to smooth or render it more safe? Where is thy wisdom yesterday, which taught thee so truly to discern as the ways of destiny are often ruled to our advantage, though in opposition to our wishes?"

"You remind me you remind me," said the King, "of one specific falsehood. You forbade, under Scot's name, that no more money be sent to the East India Company; and then, having so done, you have received, then from the impression from the name of that affair is like to make on the excited brain of the Mad Bull of Burgundy. That is direct falsehood—There cannot be a more certain cause—either value to no serious favourable turn of the market, for which, like an idiot sitting on the bank until a river shall pass away, they would not have me wait minutely. Here thy craft deceived thee—Thou art weak enough to make a specific prediction, which has proved directly false."

"Which will prove most firm and true," answered the Astrologer, boldly. "I would desire no greater triumph of art over ignorance, than that prediction and its accomplishment will afford. I told thee he would be faithful in any honourable communion—faith he not born so?—I told thee he would be sacrificing in ending any evil enterprise—Hath he not saved so? If you doubt it, go ask the Bohemians, Frederick Maureludm."

The King here coloured deeply with shame and rage.

"I told thee," continued the Astrologer, "that the conjunction of planets under which he sat forth, opened danger to the person—and hath not his path been beset by danger?—I told thee that it signified an advantage to the sender—and of that thou wilt soon see the benefit."

"How have the benefits?" explained the King: "Have not the result already, in diagrams and improvements?"

"No," answered the Astrologer, "the End is not a yet—thy own tongue shall ere long confess the magic which thou hast learned from the manner in which the messenger bore himself in discharging his commission."

"This is too—too mean!" said the King, "and you are too slow to deserve and to merit—but hush!—think not my wrongs shall be unavenged.—There is a Heaven

"Objects turned to depart. "Yet stop," said Louis—"these burst thine impostures bravely out—Let us hear your answer to one question, and then we are free.—Can thy pretended shall occur in the case of these own death?"

"Only by referring to the fate of another," said

"I understand not thing anymore," said Judge. "Know them, O'Kara, and Martin, that this only I can tell with certainty concerning mine own death, that it shall take place exactly twenty-four hours before that of your Majesty".

"He! say'st thou?" and Louis, his countenance again altering,—"Hold—hold—go not—wait one moment. Hadst thou, my death should follow mine as closely?"

"Within the space of twenty-four hours," repeated Calista, freely, "if there be one sparkle of true devotion in those bright and mysterious intelligences, which speak, each on their course, though with out a tongue—I wish your Master's road run."

"Hold—hold—go not," said the King, taking him by the arm, and leading him from the door. "Martin Galesiti, I have been a kind master to thee—enriched thee—made thee my friend—my companion the instructor of my studies.—Do open with me, I entreat you.—Is there aught in this art of yours in very deed?—Shall this Poor's mission be, in fact, sensitive to me? And is the measure of our lives

* The death of Mathias Gubotti was in some degree connected with Louis XI. The ambassador was at Lyons, and learning that the King was approaching the city got on horseback in order to meet him. As he threw himself hastily from his horse to pay his respects to the King, he fell with a violence which proved to his extreme surprise, was the cause of his death in 1470.

But the crowd had nearly settled down to sleep when a man, who had an entrance to the balcony of the theatre, came forward and said that the emperor was dead. On that note, a number of young men ran over the walls into the sea, to find where the emperor's last intention was to be taken. Great crowds of the best of his life. (The crowd left at 11:30 p.m.)

The circumstances in which Louis XI received a similar reply from an astrologer are as follows - The monarch in question had perceived that a female favourite, in whom the King was very much attached should die in a week. As he proposed a treat present the King who so much depended on it, the astrologer could have prevented the evil he predicted. He said for the philosopher and had a party stationed to surround him as he retired from the royal presence. Being asked by the King concerning his own fortune, he declared that he perceived signs of some imminent danger. Being further questioned concerning the day of his own death, he was shown enough to gather with confidence that it would be exactly three days hence that of his Majesty. There was, of course, men taken that he should escape his destined fate - and its own over-plot struck predicted by the King, as a man of real wisdom, and infinitely contrasted with royal destiny.

Although almost all the members of Latin republics have as a slogan in the common text celebrated magnitude of political democracy, not its ordinary sense and to be disappointed, if the following conditions connected by these be correct:

Upon our arrival Louis entering to bust and delighted of the weather expressed an intention over his horse whether it would be fair. The sage having returned to his apartment, answered with confidence on the affirmative. At the entrance of the forest the royal carriage was met by a chamberlain who expressed in some respects of the treat his surprise that the King should have thought of hunting in a day which theatrical interest. The latter's graduation proved true. The King and his court were driven from their sport well detached and Louis having asked what the artist had and ordered the men before him. "Now were you more accurate in forecasting the weather my friend" said he "than the learned man?" I am an ignorant man Sir, answered the artist who was of an ardent and cannot read or write. But I have an advantage of my pen, who shall furnish writings with any of them. He will remember. "For you know a thing or two" said the king who alone with his court were in appearance going forward the king called them quickly they came and were with him and against walls and of the King's horse saying he "I hunted yesterday a deer." The King was at once his laughing. "I thought the theatricals had not and enjoyed the great a small pleasure to maintain the acquaintance and to be a great one" as future trust to my artist.

so very—very neatly matched? Confess, my good Martin, you speak after the trick of your trade—Confess, I pray you, and you shall have no displeasure at my hand. I am in years—a prisoner—likely to be deprived of a kingdom—to one in my condition truth is worth kingdoms, and it is from thee, dearest Martin, that I must look for this most valuable jewel.”

“And I have laid it before your Majesty,” said Gaiotto, “at the risk that, in brutal passion, you might turn upon me and rend me.”

“Who, I, Gaiotto?” replied Louis mildly; “Alas! thou mistakest me!—Am I not captive,—and should not I be patient, especially since my anger can only show my impotence?—Tell me then in sincerity—Have you fooled me?—Or is your scotie true, and do you truly report it?”

“Your Majesty will forgive me if I reply to you,” said Martin Gaiotto, “that time only—time and the event, will convince incredulity. It suits ill the place of confidence which I have held at the council-table of the renowned conqueror, Matthias Corvinus of Hungary say, in the cabinet of the Emperor himself—to reiterate assurances of that which I have advanced as true. If you will not believe me, I can but refer to the course of events. A day, or two days’ patience, will prove or disprove what I have averred concerning the young Scot; and I will be contented to die on the wheel, and have my limbs broken joint by joint, if your Majesty have not advantage, and that in a most important degree, from the dauntless conduct of that Quentin Durward. But if I were to die under such torture, it would be well your Majesty should seek a ghostly father; for, from the moment my last groan is drawn, only twenty-four hours will remain to you for confession and penitence.”

Louis continued to keep hold of Gaiotto’s robe as he led him towards the door, and pronounced as he opened it, in a loud voice, “To-morrow we’ll talk more of this. Go in peace, my learned father—Go in peace—Go in peace!”

He repeated these words three times; and, still afraid that the Provost-Marshal might mistake his purpose, he led the Astrologer into the hall, holding fast his robe, as if afraid that he should be torn from him, and put to death before his eyes. He did not unloose his grasp until he had not only repeated again and again the gracious phrase, “Go in peace,” but even made a private signal to the Provost-Marshal, to obtain a suspension of all proceedings against the person of the Astrologer.

Thus did the possession of some secret information, joined to audacious courage and readiness of wit, save Gaiotto from the most imminent danger; and thus was Louis, the most sagacious, as well as the most vindictive, amongst the monarchs of the period, cheated of his revenge by the influence of superstition upon a selfish temper, and a mind to which, from the consciousness of many crimes, the fear of death was peculiarly terrible.

He felt, however, considerable mortification at being obliged to relinquish his purposed vengeance; and the disappointment seemed to be shared by his satellites, to whom the execution was to have been committed. Le Malafre alone, perfectly indifferent on the subject, as soon as the countermarching signal was given, left the door at which he had posted himself, and in a few minutes was fast asleep.

The Provost-Marshal, as the group reclined themselves to repose in the hall after the King retired to his bedchamber, continued to eye the goodly form of the Astrologer, with the look of the mastiff watching a joint of meat which the cook had retrieved from his jaws, while his attendants communicated to each other in brief sentences their characteristic sentiments.

“The poor blinded necromancer,” whispered Trois-Echelles, with an air of spiritual unction and commiseration, to his comrade, Petit-André, “hath lost the fairest chance of expiating some of his vile sorceries, by dying through means of the cord of the blessed Saint Francis! and I had purpose, indeed, to leave the comfortable noose around his neck, to ensure the final flight from his unhappy career.”

“And I,” said Petit-André, “have missed the sweet opportunity of knowing how far a weight of even ten stone will stretch a three-plait cord!—It would have been a glorious experiment in our line,—and the jolly old boy would have died so easily!”

While this whispered dialogue was going forward, Martin, who had taken the opposite side of the large stone fire-place round which the whole group was assembled, regarded him sulkily, and with a look of suspicion. He first put his hand into his vest, and satisfied himself that the handle of a very sharp double-edged poniard which he always carried about him, was deposited conveniently for his grasp; for, as he had a ready notice, he was, though now somewhat unwieldily a powerful athletic man, and prompt and active at the use of his weapon. Satisfied that the trusty instrument was in readiness, he next took from his bosom a scroll of parchment, inscribed with Gothic characters, and marked with cabalistic signs, drew together the word in the fire-place, and made a bar by which he could distinguish the features and attitude of all who sat or lay around the heavy and dim-studded of the Scottish soldier who lay motionless with his rough countenance as immovable as if it were cast in bronze. The pale and anxious face of Oliver who at one time assumed the appearance of steel, but again opened his eyes and raised his head heavily, as if stung by some internal throb, or awakened by some distant sound. The discontented, savage bull-dog aspect of the Provost, who looked frontally at his wall.

Not half satisfied, and greedy yet to kill!”

while the background was filled up by the ghostly hypocritical countenance of Trois-Echelles, whose eyes were cast up towards Heaven, as if he was eternally saying his devotions, and the grim countenance of Petit-André, who amused himself with muttering the graces and wry faces of his comrades before he betook himself to sleep.

Amidst these vulgar and ignoble countenances, nothing could show to greater advantage than the stately form, handsome men and commanding features of the Astrologer, who might have passed for one of the ancient magi, dispossessed in a den of robbers, and about to invoke a spirit to accomplish his liberation. And indeed had he been distinguished by nothing else than the beauty of the graceful and flowing beard which descended over the mysterious run which he held in his hand, one might have been pardoned for regretting that so noble an appearance had been bestowed on one, who put both to naught learning, and the advantages of eloquence, and a magnetic person, to the mean purposes of a cheat and impostor.

Thus passed the night in Count Herbert’s Tower in the Castle of Petoine. When the first light dawn penetrated the ancient Gothic chamber, the King summoned Oliver to his presence, who found the Monarch sitting in his nightgown, and was astonished at the alteration which one night of watch and anxiety had made in his looks. He would have expressed some anxiety on the subject, but the King silenced him by entering into a statement of the various modes by which he had previously endeavoured to form friends at the Court of Burgundy, and which Oliver was charged to prosecute as soon as he should be permitted to stir abroad. And never was the old minister more struck with the clearness of the King’s intellect, and his intimate knowledge of all the great which influence human actions, than he was during that memorable consultation.

About five hours afterwards, Oliver accordingly obtained permission from the Count of Crèvecoeur to go out and execute the commissions which he had entrusted him with; and Louis, sending for the Astrologer in whom he seemed to have reposed so fully, held with him, in like manner, a long consultation, the issue of which appeared to give him new spirits, and confidence than he had at first exhibited, so that he dressed himself, and received the morning compliments of Crèvecoeur with a calmness which the Burgundian Lord could not help wondering, the rather that he had already heard that the Duke had passed several hours in a state of mind which seemed to render the King’s safety very precarious.

CHAPTER XXX.

DISCREPANCY.

Our accounts were like the contrary both,
That each could the strife of meeting strive.

OLD PLAY.

the night passed by Louis was carefully anxious, agitated, that spent by the Duke of Burgundy, had at no time the same mastery over his passions, and, indeed, who permitted them almost a free uncontrolled dominion over his actions, was still so disturbed.

According to the custom of the period, two of his equal and most favoured counsellors, D'Hymbercourt and Des Comines, shared his bedchamber, thus being prepared for them near the head of the bed. Their attendance was never more necessary than upon this night, when, distracted by sorrow, anguish, by the desire of revenge, and by the inner conflict which forbade him to exercise it upon so to his present condition, the Duke's mind resembled a volcano in eruption, which throws forth the different contents of the mountain, mingled molten into one burning mass.

He refused to throw off his clothes, or to make any exertion for sleep; but spent the night in a succession of the most violent bursts of passion. In a paroxysm he talked incessantly to himself, so thick and so rapidly that they were really of his words would give way, choosing for his aid, the words and the handiwork of heart of his dear Bishop of Langs, and recalling the scenes of mortal kindness, affection, and friendship, which had passed between them, and he had wrought self into such a transport of grief, his hands pressed upon his face in the bed, and wept freely, and with the sobs and tears which he could not suppress.

Then starting from the bed, he gave vent to his grief to another and more furious mood, and tread the room hastily uttering incoherent threats, still more menacing oaths of vengeance, while, going with his foot, according to his customary use, he invoked Saint George, Saint Andrew and whatever else he held most holy to bear witness.

He would take bloody vengeance on De la Marek, his people of Langs, and on him who was the author of the whole. These last threats, uttered more wildly than the others, obviously concerned the son of the King, and at one time the Duke expressed his determination to send for the Duke of Brabant, the brother of the King, and with whom he was on the worst terms, in order to compel captive Monarch to surrender either the Crown, or some of its most valuable rights and appanages.

Another day and night passed in the same stormy fitful deliberations, or rather rapid transitions of mood; for the Duke scarcely ate or drank, never used his dress, and, altogether, demeaned himself as in whom rage might terminate in insanity. By degrees he became more composed, and as to hold, from time to time, consultations with ministers, in which much was proposed, but no resolution was taken. Comines assured us, that at one a council was mounted in readiness to depart for purposes of summoning the Duke of Normandy. In that event, the prison of the French monarch, he probably have been found, as in similar cases, off road to his grave.

Other times, when Charles had exhausted his patience with his features fixed in stern and rigid obduracy, like one who broods over some desperate to which he is as yet unable to work up his reason. And unquestionably it would have sounded more than an invidious hint from any of the gallies who attended his person, to have pushed Duke to some very desperate action. But the nobles of Burgundy, from the varied character attached to a portion of a King, and a Lord Paramount, and, as regard to the public faith, as well as that of Duke, which had been pledged when Louis was himself into their power, were almost unanimously inclined to recommend moderate measures; the arguments which D'Hymbercourt and Des Comines had now and then ventured to interpose during the night, were, in the cooler hours of the next morning, advanced and urged by Crèvecoeur and others. Probably there was in behalf of the King might not be entirely disinterested. Many as we have mentioned, had already experienced the bounty of the King; others had other estates or possessions in France, which placed them a little under his influence, and it is certain that the treasure which had landed four miles when the King entered Peronne, became much lighter in the course of these negotiations.

In the course of the third day, the Count of Campo-basso brought his Italian wit to assist the counsellors of Charles, and well was it for Louis, that he had not arrived when the Duke was in his first fury. Immediately on his arrival, a regular meeting of the Duke's counsellors was convened, for considering the measures to be adopted in this singular crisis.

On this occasion, Campo-basso gave his opinion, couched in the apology of the Traveller, the Adversary, and the Fox, and reminded the Duke of the advice which Reynard gave to the man, that he should crush his mortal enemy, now that chance had placed his fate at his disposal. Des Comines, who saw the Duke's eyes sparkle at a proposal which his own violence of temper had already repeatedly suggested, hastened to state the possibility that Louis might not be, in fact, so directly accessory to the sanguinary action which had been committed at Schenwald; that he might be able to clear himself of the imputation laid to his charge, and perhaps to make other arrangements for the destructions which his intrigues had occasioned in the Duke's dominions, and those of his allies; and that an act of violence perpetrated on the King, was sure to bring both on France and Burgundy a train of the most unhappy consequences, amongst which not the least to be feared was, that the English might avail themselves of the commotions and civil discord which must needs ensue, to repossess themselves of Normandy and Guyenne, and renew those dreadful wars, which had only, and with difficulty, been terminated by the union of both France and Burgundy against the common enemy. Finally, he confessed, that he did not mean to urge the absolute and free demand of Louis, but only, that the Duke should avail himself no farther of his present condition, than merely to establish a fair and equitable treaty between the countries, with such security on the King's part, as should make it difficult for him to break his faith, or disturb the internal peace of Burgundy in future. D'Hymbercourt, Crèvecoeur, and others, signified their approbation of the prudent measures proposed by Campo-basso, and their opinion, that in the way of treaty more permanent advantages could be obtained, and in a manner more honourable for Burgundy, than by an action which would stain her with a breach of faith and hospitality.

The Duke listened to these arguments with his looks fixed on the ground, and his brows so knitted together as to bring his bushy eyebrows into one mass. But when Crèvecoeur proceeded to say, that he did not believe Louis either knew of, or was accessory to, the atrocious act of violence committed at Schenwald, Charles raised his head, and darting a fierce look at his counsellor, exclaimed, "Have you now, Crèvecoeur, heard the gold of France clink?—He thinks it rings in my councils as merrily as ever the bells of Saint Denis—Dare any one say that Louis is not the fomenter of these feuds in Flanders?"

"My gracious lord," said Crèvecoeur, "my hand has ever been more conversant with steel than with gold; and so far am I from holding that Louis is free from the charge of having caused the disturbances in Flanders, that it is not long since, in the face of his whole Court, I charged him with that breach of faith, and offered him defiance in your name. But although his intrigues have been doubtless the original cause of these commotions, I am so far from believing that he authorized the death of the Archbishop, that I believe one of his ministers publicly protested against it; and I could produce the man, were it your Grace's pleasure to see him."

"It is our pleasure," said the Duke. "Saint George! can you doubt that we desire to act justly? Even in the highest flight of our passion, we are known for an upright and a just judge. We will see France herself—we will ourselves charge him with our wrongs, and ourselves state to him the reparation which we expect and demand. If he shall be found guilty, loss of this murder, the atonement for other crimes may be more easy—If he hath been guilty, who shall say that a life of penitence in some retired monastery were not a most deserved and a most merited doom?—Who," he added, kneeling as he spoke, "who shall dare to blame a revenge yet more direct and more speedy? Let your witness attend—We will to the Castle at the hour before noon. Some articles we will minute down with which he shall comply or we on his head; others shall depend upon the proof. Break up the council and dismiss yourselves. I will but change my dress, as this is scarce a fitting trim in which to wait on my most gracious Sovereign."

With a deep and better emphasis on the last expression, the Duke arose, and strode out of the room.

"Louis's safety, and what is worse, the honour of Burgundy, depend on a cast of the dice," said D'Hymbercourt to Crèvecoeur and to Des Comines. "Haste thee to the Castle, Des Comines—thou hast a better filed tongue than either Crèvecoeur or I. Explain to Louis what storm is approaching—he will best know how to pilot himself. I trust this life-guardman will say nothing which can aggravate; for who knows what may have been the secret commission with which he was charged?"

"The young man," said Crèvecoeur, "seems bold, yet prudent and wary far beyond his years. In all which he said to me he was tender of the King's character, as that of the Prince whom he serves. I trust he will be equally so in the Duke's presence. I must go seek him, and also the young Countess of Croye."

"The Countess!—you told us you had left her at Saint Bridget's Nunnery?"

"Ay, but I was obliged," said the Count, "to send for her express, by the Duke's orders, and she has been brought hither on a litter, as being unable to travel otherwise. She was in a state of the deepest distress, both on account of the uncertainty of the fate of her kinswoman, the Lady Hameline, and the gloom which overhangs her own; guilty as she has been of a feudal delinquency, in withdrawing herself from the protection of her high lord, Duke Charles, who is not the person in the world most likely to view with indifference what trenches on his original rights."

The information that the young Countess was in the hands of Charles, added fresh and more pointed thorns to Louis's reflections. He was conscious that, by explaining the intrigues by which he had induced the Lady Hameline and her to resort to Peronne, she might supply that evidence which he had removed by the execution of Zamel Maugrabie, and he knew well how much such proof of his having interfered with the rights of the Duke of Burgundy, would furnish both motive and pretext for Charles's availing himself to the uttermost of his present predicament.

Louis discoursed on these matters with great anxiety to the Sire Des Comines, whose acute and political talents better suited the King's temper than the blunt martial character of Crèvecoeur, or the feudal haughtiness of D'Hymbercourt.

"Those iron-handed soldiers, my good friend Comines," he said to his future historian, "should never enter a King's cabinet, but be left with the halberds and pikes in the antechamber. Their hands are indeed made for our use, but the monarch who puts their heads to any better occupation than that of anvil for his enemies' swords and maces, ranks with the fool who presented his mistress with a dog-leash for a carcanet. It is with such as thou, Philip, whose eyes are gilded with the quick and keen sense that sees beyond the exterior surface of affairs, that Princes should share their council-table, their cabinet—what do I say?—the most secret recesses of their soul."

Des Comines, himself so keen a spirit, was naturally gratified with the approbation of the most sagacious Prince in Europe; and he could not so far disguise his internal satisfaction, but that Louis was aware he had made some impression on him.

"I would," continued he, "that I had such a servant, or rather that I were worthy to have such a one! I had not then been in this unfortunate situation; which, nevertheless, I should hardly regret, could I but discover any means of securing the services of so experienced a statesman."

Des Comines said, that all his faculties, such as they were, were at the service of his Most Christian Majesty, saving always his allegiance to his noble lord, Duke Charles of Burgundy.

"And am I one who would seduce you from due allegiance?" said Louis, pathetically. "Alas! am I not now endangered by having reposed too much confidence in my vassal? and can the cause of feudal good faith be more sacred with any than with me, whose safety depends on an appeal to it?—No, Philip Des Comines—continue to serve Charles of Burgundy; and you will best serve him, by bringing round a fair accommodation with Louis of France. In doing thus, you will serve us both, and one, at least, will be grateful. I am told your appointments in this Court hardly match those of the Grand Falconer; and thus the services of the wisest counsellor in Europe are put on a level, or rather ranked below, those of a fellow who feeds and phyces hares! France has wide lands—her King has much gold. Allow me, my friend, to rectify this scandalous inequality. The means are not distant—Permit me to use them."

The King produced a weighty bag of money; but Des Comines, more delicate in his sentiments than most courtiers of that time, declined the proffer, declaring himself perfectly satisfied with the liberality of his native Prince, and assuring Louis that his desire to serve him could not be increased by the acceptance of any such gratuity as he had proposed.

"Singular man!" exclaimed the King, "let me embrace the only courtier of his time, at once capable and incorruptible. Wisdom is to be desired more than fine gold; and believe me, I trust in thy kindness, Philip, at this pinch, more than I do in the purchased assistance of many who have received my gifts. I know you will not counsel your master to abuse such an opportunity, as fortune, and, to speak plain, Des Comines, as my own folly, has afforded him."

"To abuse it, by no means," answered the historian; "but most certainly to use it."

"How, and in what degree?" said Louis. "I am not as yet enough to expect that I shall escape without some ransom—but let it be a reasonable one—mine I am ever willing to listen to—at Paris or at Plessis, equally as at Peronne."

"Ah, but if it like your Majesty," replied Des Comines, "Reason at Paris or Plessis was used to speak in so low and soft a tone of voice, that it could not always gain an audience of your Majesty—at Peronne, she borrows the speaking trumpet of Necessity, and her voice becomes loudly and imperative."

"You are figurative," said Louis, unable to restrain an emotion of peevishness; "I am a dull, blunt man, Sir Des Comines. I pray you leave your tropes, and come to plain ground. What does your Duke expect of me?"

"I am the bearer of no propositions, my lord," said Des Comines; "the Duke will soon explain his own pleasure; but some things occur to me as proposals for which your Majesty ought to hold yourself prepared. As, for example, the final cession of these towns here upon the Somme."

"I expected so much," said Louis.

"That you should disown the Lingois, and Willers de la Mare."

"As willingly as I disclaim Hell and Satan," said Louis.

"Ample security will be required, by possession or occupation of Arras, or otherwise, that France shall in future obtain some stirring up rebellion among the Flemings."

"It is something new," answered the King, "that a vassal should demand pledges from his Sovereign: but let that pass too."

A suitable and independent appanage for your illustrious brother, the ally and friend of my master—Normandy or Champagne. The Duke loves your father's house, my lords."

"So well," answered Louis, "that, were Dieu! he's about to make them all kings.—Is your budget of loans yet amended?"

"Not entirely," answered the counsellor. "It will certainly be required that your Majesty shall further molesting, as you have done of late, the Duke de Burgundy, and that you will no longer contest the right, which he and other grand feudatories have, to strike money, to term themselves dukes and princes by the grace of God!"

"Is it a word, to make so many kings of my vassals. Sir Philip, would you make a Duke of us?—You remember well my brother Charles—he was no trumper Duke of Guyenne than he did. And what will be left to the descendant and representative of Charlemagne, after giving away these rich provinces, even to be crowned with oil at Rheims, and to eat his dinner under a high canopy?"

"We will diminish your Majesty's concern on that score, by giving you a companion in that solitary expedition," said Philip des Comines. "The Duke of Burgundy, though he claims not at present the title of an independent king, deserves nevertheless to be freed in future from the abject marks of subjection required of him to the crown of France; it is his purpose to clothe his ducal coronet with an imperial arch, and surmount it with a globe, in emblem that his dominions are independent."

"And how does the Duke of Burgundy, the sworn enemy of France," exclaimed Louis, starting up, and showing an unwonted degree of emotion. "how does he propose such terms to his Sovereign, as, by every law of Europe, should infer a forfeiture of his life?"

"The doom of forfeiture it would in this case be difficult to enforce," answered Des Comines, calmly. "Your Majesty is aware, that the strict interpretation of the feudal law is becoming obsolete even in the Empire, and that emperor and vassal endeavour to mend their situation in regard to each other as they have power and opportunity. Your Majesty's interference with the Duke's vassals in Flanders will prove an excuspation of my master's conduct, suggesting him to insist that, by enlarging his independence, France should in future be debarr'd from any pretext of doing so."

"Comines, Comines!" said Louis, arising again, and leaving the room in a pensive manner. "this is a shocking lesson on the text Ve videte!—You cannot mean that the Duke will insist on all these hard conditions?"

"At least I would have your Majesty be in a condition to discuss them all."

"I am moderate, Des Comines, moderation is necessary to no one knows better than you—necessary to his ultimate advantage."

"So please your Majesty the merit of moderation, I have observed, most apt to be extolled by the losing party. The winner holds in more esteem the advantages which call on him not to leave an opportunity unimproved."

"Well, we will consider"—replied the King; "but at least thou hast reached the extremity of your Duke's unreasonable passions? there can never be anything of it there here, for as thy brow intimates—what is it? what is it? and it be unless it be my power? what have previous demands, if granted, the degree of all its aims?"

"My Lord," said Des Comines, "what remains to be considered is a thing partly included in a great measure. With all the Duke's own power, though he seems to make your Majesty's accession to it, he is bound to make you aware."

"Perhaps thou," exclaimed the King impatiently, "what is it? Speak out, Sir Philip, am I to send my daughter for a concubine, or what other thing is to be got out of me?"

"No dishonour, my lords; but your Majesty's cause, the illustrious Duke of Orleans!"

"Ha!" exclaimed the King, but Des Comines proceeded without heeding the interruption.

"Having conferred his affections on the young Countess Isabelle de Croye, the Duke expects your Majesty will, on your part, as he on his, yield your assent to the marriage, and unite with him in endowing the right noble couple with such an appanage as, joined to the Countess's estate, may form a full establishment for a child of France."

"Never never!" said the King, bursting out into that emotion which he had of late suppressed with much difficulty, and striding about in a dazed and hasty, which formed the strongest contrast to the self-command which he usually exhibited. "Never, never!—let them bring scoundrels, and about my hair like that of the parish-fool, whom I have so richly rewarded! let them bid the monastery or the grave yawn for me—let them bring red hot basins to scorch my eyes—eyes or scoundrels—whatever they will—but Orleans shall not break his pledged faith to my daughter, or marry another while she lives!"

"Your Majesty," said Des Comines, "are you set your mind so hardly against what is proposed, will consider your own want of power to prevent it. Every wise man, when he sees a rock giving way, withdraws from the bootless attempt of preventing the fall."

"But a brave man," said Louis, "will at least find his grave beneath it. Des Comines, consider the great loss—the utter destruction, such a marriage will bring upon my kingdom. Recollect, I have but one feeble boy, and this Orleans is the next heir—consider that the church hath consented to his union with Joan, which unites so happily the interests of both branches of my family. Think on all this, and think too that this union has been the favourite scheme of my whole life—that I have schemed for it, fought for it, watched for it, prayed for it,—and consent for it. Philip des Comines, I will not forget it! Think, men, think! pity me in this extremity—thy quick brain can quickly find some substitute for this sacrifice—some son to be offered up instead of that project which is dear to me as the Patriarch's only son was to him. Philip, pity me!—you, at least, should know, that to men of judgment and thought, the destruction of the scheme on which they have long dwelt, and for which they have long toiled, is more inexpressibly better than the transient grief of ordinary men, whose pursuits are but the gratification of some temporary passion—you, who know how to sympathize with the deeper, the more genuine distress of baffled prudence and disappointed sagacity,—will you not feel for me?"

"My Lord and King!" replied Des Comines, "I do sympathize with your distress, in so far as duty to my master."

"Do not mention him!" said Louis, setting, or at least appearing to set, aside an irritable and head-long impulse, which withdrew the usual guard which he maintained over his language. "Charles of Burgundy is unworthy of your attachment. He who can insult and strike his counsellors—he who can distinguish the wisest and most faithful among them, by the opprobrious name of Booted Head!"

The wisdom of Philip des Comines did not prevent his having a high sense of personal consequence; and he was so much struck with the words which the King uttered, as it were, in the career of a passion which overleaped ceremony, that he could only reply by repetition of the words "Booted Head." It is impossible that my master the Duke could have so termed the servant who has been at his side since he could mount a palfrey—and that too before a sovereign monarch?—it is impossible!"

Louis instantly saw the impression he had made, and avoiding alike a tone of condolence, which might have seemed insulting, and one of sympathy, which might have savoured of affection, he said, with simplicity, and at the same time with dignity, "My misfortunes make me forget my courtesy, and I had not spoken to you of what it must be unpleasant for you to hear. But you have in reply taxed me with having uttered impossibilities—the touches my honour; yet I must submit to the charge, if I tell you not the circumstances which the Duke, laughing until his eyes ran over, assigned for the origin of that agreeable scene, which I will not offend your ears by repeating. Thus, then, it chanced. You, Sir Philip Des Comines, were at a hunting match with the Duke of Burgundy, your master, and when he alighted after the chase, he required your services, and drawing off his boots, standing in your looks, perhaps some natural resentment of this disparaging treatment, he ordered you to sit down in turn and to deliver you the same office he had just received from you. But offended at your understanding him so fully, he no longer plucked one of your boots off, than he brutally beat it about your head till the blood flowed, exclaiming against the insolence of a subject, who had the presumption to accept of such a service at the hand of his Sovereign; and hence he, or his privileged fool Le Glorieux, is in the current habit of distinguishing you by the absurd and ridiculous name of Tête-bêche, which makes one of the Duke's most ordinary subjects of pleasantry.

While Louis thus spoke, he had the double pleasure of galling to the quick the person whom he addressed—an error which it was in his nature to commit even where he had not, as in the present case, the apology that he did so in pure retaliation, and that of observing that he had at length been able to find a point in Des Comines' character which might wound him gradually from the interests of Burgundy, France, of France. But although the deep resentment which this offended courtier entertained against his master induced him at a future period to exchange the service of Charles for that of Louis, yet at the present moment, he was contented to throw out only some general hints of his friendly inclination towards France, which he well knew the King would understand how to interpret. And indeed it would be unjust to stigmate the memory of the excellent historian with the desertion of his master on this occasion, although he was certainly now possessed with sentiments much more favourable to Louis than when he entered the apartment.

He constrained himself to laugh at the anecdote which Louis had detailed, and then added, "I did not think so trifling a frolic would have dwelt on the mind of the Duke so long as to make it worth telling again. Some such passage there was of drawing off boots and the like, as your Majesty knows that the Duke is fond of rude play, but it has been much exaggerated in his recollection. Let it pass on."

"Ay, let it pass on," said the King; "it is indeed shame it should have detained us a minute. And now, Sir Philip, I hope you are French so far as to afford me your best counsel in these difficult affairs. You have, I am well aware, the clew to the labyrinth, if you would but impart it."

"Your Majesty may command my best advice and service," replied Des Comines, "under reservation always of my duty to my own master."

This was nearly what the courtier had before stated; but he now repeated it in a tone so different, that whereas Louis understood from the former declaration, that the reserved duty to Burgundy was the prime thing to be considered, so he now saw clearly that the emphasis was reversed, and that more weight was now given by the speaker to his promise of counsel, than to a restriction which seemed interposed for the sake of form and consistency. The King resumed his own seat, and compelled Des Comines to sit by him, listening at the same time to that statesman, as if the words of an oracle sounded in his ears. Des Comines spoke in that low and impressive tone, which implies at once great sincerity and some caution, and at the same time so slowly as if he was desirous that the King should weigh and consider each individual word as having its own peculiar and determined meaning. "The things," he said, "which I have suggested for your Majesty's consideration, herein as they sound in your ear are but substitutes for still more violent proposals brought forward in the Duke's councils, by such as are more hostile to your Majesty. And I used words round your Majesty that the more direct and more violent suggestions find ready acceptance with our master, who loves brief and dangerous measures better than those that are safe, but at the same time circuitous."

"I remember"—said the King, "I have seen him swim a river at the risk of drowning, though there was a bridge to be found for riding two hundred yards round."

"True, Sir, and he that weighs not his life against the gratification of a moment of impetuous passion, will on the same impulse, prefer the gratification of his will to the increase of his substantial power."

"Most true," replied the King, "a fool will ever grasp rather at the appearance than the reality of authority. All this I know to be true of Charles of Burgundy. But, my dear friend, Des Comines, what do you infer from these premises?"

"Simply this, my lord," answered the Burgundian, "that as your Majesty has seen a skilful angler control a large and heavy fish, and finally draw him up land by a single hair, which fish had broke through a tackle tenfold stronger, had the fisher possessed to strain the line on him, instead of giving him just enough for all his wild flourishes; even so your Majesty, by gratifying the Duke in those parades in which he has pushed his ideas of honour, and his gratification of his revenge, may evade many of the other unpalatable propositions at which I have hinted, and which, including, I must state openly to your Majesty some of those through which France would be most especially weakened, will slide out of his remembrance and attention, and, being referred to subsequent conferences and future discussion, may be altogether eluded."

"I understand you, my good Sir Philip; but to do better," said the King, "to which of those many propositions is your Duke so much wedded, that contradiction will make him unreasonable and quarrelsome?"

"To any or to all of them, if it please your Majesty, on which you may happen to contradict him. To be precisely what your Majesty must avoid, and to take up my former parable, you must stand upon the watch, ready to give the Duke line enough whenever he shows away under the umbrage of rage. His fury, already considerably abated, will waste itself if he be unopposed, and you will presently find him become more friendly and more accessible."

"Still," said the King, musing, "there must be some particular demands which he deems of as much weight as the other proposals. What I am aware of these, Sir Philip?"

"Your Majesty may make the lightest of his demands the most important, simply by opposing it," said Des Comines, "nevertheless, my lord, thus far I can say, that every shadow of treaty will be broken off, if your Majesty refuses not William de la Mar and the Legation."

"I have already said that I will disown them," said the King, "and well they deserve it at my hand; the villains have committed their quarrel at a moment that might have cost me my life."

"He that fires a train of powder," replied the historian, "must expect a speedy explosion of the city.—But more than mere demolition of their cause will be expected of your Majesty by Duke Charles; he knows that he will demand your Majesty's consent to put the quarrel down, and your royal promise to witness the punishment which he desires for the rebels."

"That may serve counsel with our honour, Des Comines," said the King.

"To refuse it will scarcely consist with your Majesty's safety," replied Des Comines. "Charles is determined to show the people of Flanders, that as long as they are firm, of assistance from France, will not

* The story is told more bluntly and less probably, in the Spanish annals of the period, which allege that Comines, on of a presumptive descendant with his constant good sense, had asked of Charles of Burgundy to draw off his boots, without having been taught with any previous dissimulation to hint to such a request. I have endeavored to give the narrative a less comic complexion, with the same end and judgment of the good sense concerned.

in their motions from the wrath and vengeance grudged."

"Alas! Sir Philip, I will speak plainly," answered he—"Could we but procrastinate the matter, not these rogues of Looze make their own part against Duke Charles? The knaves are numerous and steady—Can they not hold out their town a while?"

"With the help of the thousand archers of France your Majesty promised them, they might have something; but—"

"Have I promised them?" said the King—"Alas!
Sir Philip, you much wrong me in saying so."
But without whom," continued Des Commes, during the interruption, "as your Majesty will be likely find it convenient to supply them, chances will the burghers have of making good own, in whose walls the large breaches made by us after the battle of St. Tron are still unrepaid, at the houses of Hainault, Brabant, and Burgundy advance to the attack twenty men in front?"
"So unimprovident ideas?" said the King—"If they thus neglected their own safety, they deserve y protection.—Pass on—I will make no quarrel of words."

"By next point, I fear, will be closer to your Majesty's heart, and Des Commes."

"Is?" replied the King—"you mean that infernal age? I will not consent to the breach of the contract my daughter Joan and my cousin of Orléans—it would be wounding the sceptre of France and my posterity, for that little boy the Duke is a blighted blossom, which will wither and die. This match between Joan of Orléans and my thought by day, my dream by night—I have, Sir Philip, I cannot give it up! Besides, it suits to require me, with my own hand, to destroy at once my own scheme of policy, and the happiness of a pair brought up for each other."

"Are they then so much attached?" said Des Co-

"One of them at least is," said the King, "and the other whom I am bound to be most anxious. But suffice, Sir Philip,—you are no believer in the force of love."

"Say," said Des Commes, "if it please you, Sir, I so hate an infidel in that particular, that I was it to ask whether it would reconcile you in any way to your engineering in the proposed marriage between the Duke of Orléans and Isabelle de Croys-sac? I to satisfy you that the Countess's inclinations are much fixed on another, that it is likely it will be a match?"

"My Louis replied—"Alas!" he said, "my good cousin, from what sympathies have you drawn a kind man's comfort? Her inclination, indeed!
I, to speak truth, supposing that Orléans desired
Joan, yet, but for this ill-revered web between them, he must needs have married her, and must compare how little chance there is of this love being able to refuse him under a similar condition, and he a Child of France besides—Ah, no, no!—little time of her standing obstinate against the of such a lover—For ever et malade, Philip!"

"Your Majesty may, in the present instance, understand the obstinate courage of this young lady. She was of a race determinedly wild, and I have heard out of Crèvecoeur that she has formed a regular attachment to a young squire, who, to say the least, rendered her many services on the road."

"Ha!" said the King—"an archer of my Guards, some Quentin Durward?"

"The same, as I think," said Des Commes; "he is made prisoner along with the Countess, travelling almost alone together."

"Now, our Lord and our Lady, and Monseigneur at Marten, and Monseigneur Saint Julian, be preserving one of them!" said the King, "and all that I have said to the learned Celestine, who said in very that this youth's destiny was connected with us! If she makes be so attached to him as to make a voluntary to the will of Burgundy, this Quentin is indeed very useful to me."

"I believe, my lord," answered the Burgundian,
Vol. IV. 3 D

"according to Crèvecoeur's report, that there is some chance of her being sufficiently obstinate; besides,
I believe, the noble Duke himself, notwithstanding that your Majesty was pleased to hint in way of supplication, will not willingly renounce his fair cousin, whom he has been long engaged."

"Ungh!" answered the King—"But you have never seen my daughter Joan—A howling man!—an absolute fool, whom I am ashamed of! But let him be only a wise man, and marry her, I will give him leave to be mad for ever for the fairest lady in France. And now Philip, have you given me the full snap of your master's mind?"

"I have pointed you, Sir, of those particulars on which he is at present most disposed to insist. But your Majesty well knows that the Duke's disposition is like a sweeping torrent, which only pauses momentarily toward when its waves encounter an opposition; and what may be presented to chain him into fury, it is impossible even to guess. Were more distinct evidence of your Majesty's practices (pardon the phrase, where there is so little time for a lesson) with the Langens and William de la March to occur unexpectedly, the issue might be terrible—There are strange news from that country, they say La March hath married Hainault the elder Countess of Croys."

"That old fool was so used on marriage, that she would have accepted the hand of Isen," said the King, "but that La March, least as he is, should have married her, rather more surprises me."

"There is a report also," continued Des Commes, that an envoy, or herald, on La March's part, is approaching Peronne, this is like to drive the Duke crazy with rage—I trust that he has no letters, or the like, to show on your Majesty's part."

"Letters to a Wild Boar!" answered the King.—

"No, no, Sir Philip, I was no such fool as to cast pearls before swine—What little intercourse I had with the brute animal was by means, in which I always employed such low-bred slaves and vagabonds, that their evidence would not be received in a trial for robbing a hen roost."

"I can then only farther recommend," said Des Commes, taking his leave, "that your Majesty should remain on your guard, be guided by events, and above all, avoid using any language or argument with the Duke which may better become your dignity than your present condition."

"If my dignity," said the King, "grows troublesome to me,—which it seldom doth while there are deeper interests to think of,—I have a special remedy for that swelling of the heart. It is but looking into a certain annous closet, Sir Philip, and thinking of the death of Charles the Simple, and it cures me as effectually as the cold bath would cool a fever—And now, my friend and monitor, must thou be gone? Well, Sir Philip, the time must come when thou wilt be reading lessons of state policy to the Bull of Burgundy, who is incapable of comprehending your most simple arguments. If Louis of Valois then lives, thou hast a friend in the Court of France—I tell thee my Philip, it would be a blessing to my kingdom should I ever acquire thee; who, with a profound view of subjects of state, hast also a conscience, capable of feeling and discerning between right and wrong. So be to me, our Lord and Lady, and Monseigneur Saint Martin, Oliver and Balise have hearts as hardened as the northern millstone; and my life is embittered by remorse and penances for the crimes they make me commit. Thou, Sir Philip, possessed of the wisdom of present and past times, canst teach how to become great without crimining to be virtuous."

"A hard task, and which few have attained," said the historian; "but which is yet within the reach of princes, who will strive for it. Monseigneur, may be prepared, for the Duke will presently confer with you."

"Louis looked long after Philip when he left the apartment, and at length burst into a bitter laugh."

"He speaks of flattery—I have seen him home a traitor properly tricked! And he thinks himself virtuous because he took no bribe, but contented himself with flattery and promises, and the pleasure of avenging an affront to his vanity!—Why, he is but an animal."

the power for the refusal of the money—not a pit the more honest. He must be mine, though, for he hath the shrewdest head among them—Well, now for our blar game! I am to face this leviathan Charles, who will presently swim hitherward, cleaving the deep before him. I must, like a trembling sailor, throw a tub overboard to amuse him. But I may one day find the chance of driving a harpoon into his entrails!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE INTERVIEW.

Held fast thy truth, young soldier—Quentin Durward.
Keep you your promise plight—leave you its exhibition,
And give your policy its mass of Chastellain.
But be you guided as the morning day
On the high sea dark vapours up to stain it.—The French.

On the perilous and important morning which preceded the meeting of the two Princes in the castle of Peronne, Oliver le Dain did his master the service of an active and skilful agent, making interest for Louis in every quarter, both with prelates and princes; so that when the Duke's anger should blaze forth, all around should be interested to smother and not to increase the conflagration. He glided like night from tent to tent, from house to house, making himself friends, but not in the Apratie's camp, with the Mammon of unrighteousness. As was said of another active political agent, "his finger was in every man's palm, his mouth was in every man's ear," and for various reasons, some of which we have formerly hinted at, he secured the favour of many Burgundian nobles, who either had something to hope or fear from France, or who thought that, were the power of Louis too much reduced, their own Duke would be likely to pursue the road to despotic authority to which his heart naturally inclined him, with a daring and unopposed pace.

Where Oliver suspected his own presence or arguments might be less acceptable, he employed that of other servants of the King, and it was in this manner that he obtained, by the favour of the Count de Crevin, an interview between Lord Crawford, accompanied by Le Balafre, and Quentin Durward, who, since he had arrived at Peronne, had been detained in a sort of honourable confinement. Private affairs were assigned as the cause of requesting this meeting, but it is probable that Crevin, who was afraid that his master might be stirred up in passion to do something dishonourably violent towards Louis, was not sorry to afford an opportunity to Crawford to give some hint to the young archer, which might prove useful to his master.

The meeting between the countrymen was cordial, and even affecting.

"Thou art a singular youth," said Crawford, stroking the head of young Durward, as a grandfater might

* There is little doubt that during the interesting scene at Peronne, Philip des Armes first learned indirectly or knew the great power of mind of Louis XI. by which he was so much dazzled that it is impossible in reading his Memoirs not to be sensible that he was haunted by them to the most extreme degree of his character. He remembered from this time forward a peculiarity to France. The historian passed into France about 1478, and rose high as the great genius of Louis XI. He afterwards became the propounder of the French policy of aggression and defence, a title which was given him by the English as he had the advantage of this youth. He did not forget it. He was on the French service. After the death of Louis XI. he was the man who guided the operations of the English in France, and was the Lady of Burgundy, so far as regards a portion of the French House of Orleans. The historian's name was Christopher Columbus, and eight months or more of his life were spent in the service of the English. It was there that he met the young man, who had been his subject, and the words were spoken which he had been subjected to a trial and ended from the French government by the Parliament of Paris, being found guilty of treason and conspiracy with disaffected persons. He was not, however, executed, but was afterwards employed by the French government in various important missions where talents were required. Louis XI. placed his trust in his loyalty to the English, but did not rely on him. His end at his Castle of Argentan, in 1498, was regretted as one of the most profound statesmen and perhaps the best judge of his age. In a poem by Sir Matthew Gower, the poet has said, he removed the distinguished power that he was the first to show the limits which virtue and noble blood derived from being united with learning.

do that of his descendant; "Crest, you have had as much good fortune as if you had been born with a lucky hood on your head."

"All comes of his giving an archer's place to such early years," said Le Balafre; "I never was much liked of, fair nephew, because I was five-and-twenty years old before I was hors de page."

"And an ill-looking mountainous monster of a page thou wert, Ludovic," said the old countess, "with a beard like a baker's shool, and a back like old Wallace Wight."

"I fear," said Quentin, with downcast eyes, "I shall enjoy that title to distinction but a short time—when it is my purpose to resign the service of the Archer guard."

Le Balafre was struck almost mute with astonishment, and Crawford's ancient features glowed with displeasure. The former at length mustered words enough to say, "Rough!—have your place in the Scottish Archers!—such a thing was never done of. I would not give up my situation, to be made Constable of France."

"Hush! Ludovic," said Crawford; "this youngster knows better how to shape his course with the wind than we of the old world do. His journey hath given him some pretty tales to tell about King Louis, and he is turning Burgundian, that he may make his own little profit by telling them to Duke Charles."

"If I thought so," said Le Balafre, "I would cut his throat with my own hand, were he fifty times my master's son!"

"But you would first inquire, whether I deserved to be so treated, fair kinsman?" answered Quentin; "and you, my lord, know that I am no tale-bearer; nor shall either question or torture draw out of me a word to King Louis's prejudice, which may here come to my knowledge while I was in his service. So far my oath of duty keeps me silent. But I will not remain in that service, in which, beside the perils of fair battle with mine enemies, I am exposed to the dangers of ambushments on the part of my friends."

"Nay, if he objects to lying in ambushments," said the slow-witted Le Balafre, looking scornfully at the Lord Crawford, "I am afraid, my lord, that it is over with him! I myself have had thirty ambushments break upon me, and truly I think I have had as many as often myself, it being a general practice in our King's mode of making war."

"It is no indeed, Ludovic," answered Lord Crawford, "nevertheless, hold your peace, for I believe I understand this gear better than you do."

"I wish to our Lady you may, my lord," answered Ludovic; "but it wounds me to do my mistrust to think my master's son should be so bushment."

"Young man," said Crawford, "I partly guess your meaning. You have met foul play on the road where you travelled by the King's command, and you think you have reason to charge him with being the author of it?"

"I have been threatened with foul play as the action of the King's commission," answered Quentin; "but I have had the good fortune to shew whether his Majesty be innocent or guilty in the matter. I leave to God and his own conscience to tell me when I was a bungler—received me when I was a wandering stranger. I will never had his adversary with accusations which may stain his name, since I heard them only from the rival mouths."

"My dear boy—my own lad!" said Crawford, taking him in his arms—"Ye think like a Scot, my joint of you! Like one that will forget a quarrel quarrelled with a friend whose back is already a wall, and remember nothing of him but his bones."

"Nunc my Lord Crawford has spoken of nephew," said Ludovic Lady, "I will shew him also—though I would have you to know, that I understand the service of an ambushment as well as any to a soldier, as it is to a priest to be able to read his breviary."

"Be hushed, Ludovic," said Crawford; "ye are an my friend, and ken not the blessing Heaven has : you in this braw callant.—And now tell me, nтин, my man, hath the King any advice of this re, christian, and manly resolution of yours? for, man, he hath need, in his strait, to ken what he to reckon upon. Had he but brought the whole ade of Guards with him!—But God's will be done ens he of your purpose, think you?"

"I really can hardly tell," answered Quentin; "I assured his learned astrologer, Martius Galeotti, of my resolution to be silent on all that could re the King with the Duke of Burgundy. The iculars which I suspect, I will not (under your ur) communicate even to your lordship; and to philosopher I was, of course, far less willing to ld myself."

"Ha! ha!"—answered Lord Crawford—"Oliver ndeed tell me that Galeotti prophesied most stoat-ncerning the line of conduct you were to hold; I am truly glad to find he did so on better au-ity than the stars."

"He prophesy?" said Le Balafre, laughing; "the s never told him that honest Ludovic Lesly used elp yonder wench of his to spend the fair ducats lings into her lap."

"Hush! Ludovic," said his captain, "hush! thou st, man!—If thou dost not respect my gray hairs, use I have been e'en too much of a routier my- respect the boy's youth and innocence, and let ave no more of such unbecoming daffing."

"Your honour may say your pleasure," answered ovic Lesly; "but, by my faith, second-sighted nders Souplejaw, the town-souter of Glen-houla- was worth Galeotti, or Gallipotty, or whatever all him, twice told, for a prophet. He foretold t all my sister's children would die some day; and ore told it in the very hour that the youngest was n, and that is this lad Quentin—who, no doubt will day die, to make up the prophecy—the more is the —the whole curney of them is gone but himself. I Saunders foretold to myself one day, that I ould be made by marriage, which doubtless will o happen in due time, though it hath not yet ne to pass—though how or when, I can hardly ss, as I care not myself for the wedded state, and entin is but a lad. Also, Saunders predicted"—

"Nay," said Lord Crawford, "unless the prediction singularly to the purpose, I must cut you short, my od Ludovic; for both you and I must now leave ur nephew, with prayers to Our Lady to strengthen n in the good mind he is in; for this is a case in hich a light word might do more mischief than all e Parliament of Paris could mend.—My blessing ith you, my lad; and be in no hurry to think of aving our body, for there will be good blows going eadly in the eye of day, and no ambushade."

"And my blessing too, nephew," said Ludovic yly; "for, since you have satisfied our most noble plain, I also am satisfied, as in duty bound."

"Stay, my lord," said Quentin, and led Lord Crawford a little apart from his uncle. "I must not get to mention, that there is a person besides the world, who, having learned from me these unstances, which it is essential to King Louis's ty should at present remain concealed, may not ik that the same obligation of secrecy, which ches to me as the King's soldier, and as having a, relieved by his bounty, is at all binding on

On her!" replied Crawford; "nay, if there be oman in the secret, the Lord ha' mercy, for we all on the rocks again!"

"Do not suppose so, my lord," replied Durward, it use your interest with the Count of Crèveceur ermit me an interview with the Countess Isabelle roye, who is the party possessed of my secret, I doubt not that I can persuade her to be as si- as I shall unquestionably myself remain, con- g whatever may incense the Duke against King is."

The old soldier mused for a long time—looked up e ceiling, then down again upon the floor—then k his head,—and at length said, "There is something in all this, which, by my honour, I do not understand. The Countess Isabelle of Croye!—an interview with a lady of her birth, blood, and possessions!—and thou, a raw Scottish lad, so certain of carrying thy point with her? Thou art either strangely confident, my young friend, or else you have used your time well upon the journey. But, by the Cross of Saint Andrew! I will move Crèveceur in thy behalf; and, as he truly fears that Duke Charles may be provoked against the King to the extremity of falling foul, I think it likely he may grant thy request, though, by my honour, it is a comical one!"

So saying, and shrugging up his shoulders, the old Lord left the apartment, followed by Ludovic Lesly, who forming his looks on those of his principal, endeavoured, though knowing nothing of the cause of his wonder, to look as mysterious and important as Crawford himself.

In a few minutes Crawford returned, but without his attendant Le Balafre. The old man seemed in singular humour, laughing and chuckling to himself in a manner which strangely distorted his stern and rigid features, and at the same time shaking his head, as at something which he could not help condemning, while he found it irresistibly ludicrous. "My certes, countryman," said he, "but you are not blate—you will never lose fair lady for faint heart! Crèveceur swallowed your proposal as he would have done a cup of vinegar, and swore to me roundly, by all the saints in Burgundy, that were less than the honour of princes and the peace of kingdoms at stake, you should never see even so much as the print of the Countess Isabelle's foot on the clay. Were it not that he had a dame, and a fair one, I would have thought that he meant to break a lance for the prize himself. Perhaps he thinks of his nephew, the County Stephen. A Countess!—would no less serve you to be minting at?—But come along—your interview with her must be brief—But I fancy you know how to make the most of little time—ho! ho! ho!—By my faith, I can hardly chide thee for the presumption, I have such a good will to laugh at it!"

With a brow like scarlet, at once offended and disconcerted by the blunt inferences of the old soldier, and vexed at beholding in what an absurd light his passion was viewed by every person of experience, Durward followed Lord Crawford in silence to the Ursuline convent, in which the Countess was lodged, and in the parlour of which he found the Count de Crèveceur.

"So, young gallant," said the latter, sternly, "you must see the fair companion of your romantic expedition once more, it seems?"

"Yes, my Lord Count," answered Quentin, firmly; "and what is more, I must see her alone."

"That shall never be," said the Count de Crèveceur.—"Lord Crawford, I make you judge. This young lady, the daughter of my old friend and companion in arms, the richest heiress in Burgundy, has confessed a sort of a—what was I going to say?—in short, she is a fool, and your man-at-arms here a presumptuous coxcomb—In a word, they shall not meet alone."

"Then will I not speak a single word to the Countess in your presence," said Quentin, much delighted. "You have told me much that I did not dare, presumptuous as I may be, even to hope."

"Ay, truly said, my friend," said Crawford. "You have been imprudent in your communications; and, since you refer to me, and there is a good stout grating across the parlour, I would advise you to trust to it, and let them do the worst with their tongues. What, man! the life of a King, and many thousands besides, is not to be weighed with the chance of two young things whilly-whawing in ilk other's ears for a minute?"

So saying, he dragged off Crèveceur, who followed very reluctantly, and cast many angry glances at the young Archer as he left the room.

In a moment after, the Countess Isabelle entered on the other side of the grate, and no sooner saw Quentin alone in the parlour, than she stopped short, and cast her eyes on the ground for the space of half a minute. "Yet why should I be ungrateful," she said, "because others are unjustly suspicious?—My friend—my preserver, I may almost say, so much have I been beset by treachery—my only faithful and constant friend!"

As she spoke thus, she extended her hand to him through the grate, nay, suffered him to retain it, until he had covered it with kisses, not unmingled with tears. She only said, "Durward, were we ever to meet again, I would not permit this folly."

If it be considered that Quentin had guarded her through so many perils—that he had been, in truth, her only faithful and zealous protector, perhaps my fair readers, even if countesses and heiresses should be of the number, will pardon the derogation.

But the Countess extricated her hand at length, and stepping a pace back from the grate, asked Durward, in a very embarrassed tone, what boon he had to ask of her?—"For that you have a request to make, I have learned from the old Scottish Lord, who came here but now with my cousin of Crèvecœur. Let it be but reasonable," she said, "but such as poor Isabelle can grant with duty and honour unfringed, and you cannot tax my slender powers too highly. But, O! do not speak hastily,—do not say," she added, looking around with timidity, "aught that might, if overheard, do prejudice to us both!"

"Fear not, noble lady," said Quentin, sorrowfully; "it is not here that I can forget the distance which fate has placed between us, or expose you to the censure of your proud kindred, as the object of the most devoted love to one, poorer and less powerful—not perhaps less noble than themselves. Let that pass like a dream of the night to all but one bosom, where, dream as it is, it will fill up the room of all existing realities."

"Hush! hush!" said Isabelle; "for your own sake,—for mine,—be silent on such a theme. Tell me rather what it is you have to ask of me."

"Forgiveness to one," replied Quentin, "who, for his own selfish views, hath conducted himself as your enemy."

"I trust I forgive all my enemies," answered Isabelle; "but oh, Durward! through what scenes have your courage and presence of mind protected me!—Yonder bloody hall—the good Bishop—I knew not till yesterday half the horrors I had unconsciously witnessed!"

"Do not think on them," said Quentin, who saw the transient colour which had come to her cheek during their conference, fast fading into the most deadly paleness—"Do not look back, but look steadily forward, as they needs must who walk in a perilous road. Harken to me. King Louis deserves nothing better at your hand, of all others, than to be proclaimed the wily and insidious politician, which he really is. But to tax him as the encourager of your flight—still more as the author of a plan to throw you into the hands of De la Marck—will at this moment produce perhaps the King's death or dethronement; and, at all events, the most bloody war between France and Burgundy which the two countries have ever been engaged in."

"These evils shall not arrive for my sake, if they can be prevented," said the Countess Isabelle; "and indeed your slightest request were enough to make me forego my revenge, were that at any time a passion which I deeply cherish. Is it possible I would rather remember King Louis's injuries, than your invaluable services?—Yet how is this to be?—When I am called before my Sovereign, the Duke of Burgundy, I must either stand silent, or speak the truth. The former would be contumacy; and to a false tale you will not desire me to train my tongue."

"Surely not," said Durward; "but let your evidence concerning Louis be confined to what you yourself positively know to be truth; and when you mention what others have reported, no matter how credibly, let it be as reports only, and beware of pledging your own personal evidence to that, which, though you may fully believe, you cannot personally know to be true. The assembled Council of Burgundy cannot refuse to a Monarch the justice, which in my country is rendered to the meanest person under accusation. They must esteem him innocent until direct and sufficient proof shall demonstrate his guilt. Now, what does not consist with your own certain knowledge, should be proved by other evidence than your report from hearsay."

"I think I understand you," said the Countess Isabelle.

"I will make my meaning plainer," said Quentin and was illustrating it accordingly by more than one instance, when the convent-bell tolled.

"That," said the Countess, "is a signal that we must part—part for ever!—But do not forget me, Durward; I will never forget you—your faithful services"——

She could not speak more, but again extended her hand, which was again pressed to his lips; and I know not how it was, that, in endeavouring to withdraw her hand, the Countess came so close to the grating, that Quentin was encouraged to press the adieu on her lips. The young lady did not chide him—perhaps there was no time; for Crèvecœur and Crawford, who had been from some loop-hole witnesses, if not ear-witnesses also, of what was passing, rushed into the apartment, the first in a towering passion, the latter laughing, and holding the Count back.

"To your chamber, young mistress—to your chamber!" exclaimed the Count to Isabelle, who, flinging down her veil, retired in all haste,—which should be exchanged for a cell, and bread and water.—And you, gentle sir, who are so malapert, the time will come when the interests of kings and kingdoms may not be connected with such as you are; and you shall then learn the penalty of your audacity in raising your beggarly eyes"——

"Hush! hush!—enough said—rein up—rein up," said the old Lord;—"and you, Quentin, I command you, be silent, and begone to your quarters.—There is no such room for so much scorn neither, for Count of Crèvecœur, that I must say now be out of hearing—Quentin Durward is as much a gentleman as the King, only, as the Spaniard says, not so rich. He is as noble as myself, and I am chief of my name. Tush, tush! man, you must not speak us of penalties."

"My lord, my lord," said Crèvecœur, impatiently; "the insolence of these foreign mercenaries is proverbial, and should receive rather rebuke than encouragement from you, who are their leader."

"My Lord Count," answered Crawford, "I have ordered my command for these fifty years without advice either from Frenchman or Burgundian; and I intend to do so, under your favour, so long as I shall continue to hold it."

"Well, well, my lord," said Crèvecœur, "I mean you no disrespect; your nobleness, as well as your age, entitle you to be privileged in your impatience; and for these young people, I am satisfied to overlook the past, since I will take care that they shall meet again."

"Do not take that upon your salvation, Crèvecœur," said the old Lord, laughing; "mortality is said, may meet, and why not mortal creatures have legs, and life and love to put those legs in motion? Yon kiss, Crèvecœur, came tenderly off—it thinks it was ominous."

"You are striving again to disturb my patience," said Crèvecœur, "but I will not give you that advantage over me—Hark! they toll the summons to the Castle—an awful meeting, of which God only foretels the issue."

"This issue I can foretel," said the old Scottish Lord, "that if violence is to be offered to the person of the King, few as his friends are, and surrounded by his enemies, he shall neither fall alone nor be avenged; and grieved I am, that his own private orders have prevented my taking measures to prepare for such an issue."

"My Lord of Crawford," said the Burgundian, "to anticipate such evil is the sure way to give occasion to it. Obey the orders of your royal master, and find no pretext for violence by taking hasty offence, and you will find that the day will pass over more smoothly than you now conjecture."

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE INVESTIGATION.

Me rather had, my heart might feel your love,
Than my displeased eye see your courtesy.
Up, cousin, up—your heart is up, I know,
Toss high at least—although your knee—

King Richard II.

In the first toll of the bell, which was to summon great nobles of Burgundy together in council, with very few French peers who could be present on occasion, Duke Charles, followed by a part of his men, armed with partisans and battle-axes, entered the Hall of Herbert's Tower, in the Castle of Peene. King Louis, who had expected the visit, arose and made two steps towards the Duke, and then remained standing with an air of dignity, which, in spite of the meanness of his dress, and the familiarity of his many manners, he knew very well how to assume when he judged it necessary. Upon the present import-crisis, the composure of his demeanour had an important effect upon his rival, who changed the abrupt hasty step with which he entered the apartment, to one more becoming a great vassal entering the presence of his Lord Paramount. Apparently the Duke had formed the internal resolution to treat him, in the outset at least, with the formalities due to high station; but at the same time it was evident, that, in doing so, he put no small constraint on the fiery impatience of his own disposition, and was scarce able to control the feelings of resentment, the thirst of revenge, which boiled in his bosom. He, though he compelled himself to use the outward acts, and in some degree the language, of courtesy and reverence, his colour came and went rapidly, his voice was abrupt, hoarse, and broken—his limbs shook, as if impatient of the curb imposed on his motions—he frowned and bit his lip until the blood came—every look and movement showed that the most moderate prince who ever lived, was under the influence of one of his most violent paroxysms of passion.

The King marked this war of passion with a calm untroubled eye; for, though he gathered from the Duke's looks a foretaste of the bitterness of death, which he dreaded alike as a mortal and a sinful man, he was resolved, like a wary and skilful pilot, not to suffer himself to be disconcerted by his own passions, nor to abandon the helm, while there was a chance of saving the vessel by adroit pilotage. Thereupon, when the Duke, in a hoarse and broken tone, said something of the scarcity of his accommodations, and answered with a smile, that he could not complain, as he had as yet found Herbert's Tower a better place than it had proved to one of his ancestors. "They told you the tradition then?" said Charles. "Yes—here he was slain—but it was because he refused to take the cowl, and finish his days in a monastery."

"The more fool he," said Louis, affecting unconcern, "since he gained the torment of being a martyr, without the merit of being a saint."

"I come," said the Duke, "to pray your Majesty to send a high council, at which things of weight are to be deliberated upon concerning the welfare of France and Burgundy. You will presently meet them at Paris, if such be your pleasure."

"Nay, my fair cousin," said the King, "never strain me so far, as to entreat what you may so boldly command—To council, since such is your Grace's pleasure. We are somewhat shorn of our train," he said, looking upon the small suite that arranged themselves to attend him—"but you, cousin, must be out for us both."

Arranged by Toison d'Or, chief of the heralds of Burgundy, the Princes left the Earl Herbert's Tower, entered the castle yard, which Louis observed was filled with the Duke's body-guard and men-at-arms, and drawn up in martial array. Entering the court, they entered the Council-hall, which was in a much more modern part of the building than that of which Louis had been the tenant, though in disrepair, had been hastily arranged for the solemnity of a public council. Two chairs of state were erected under the same canopy, that for the King being raised two steps higher than the one which the Duke was to occupy; about twenty of the chief nobility sat, arranged in due order, on either hand of the chair of state; and thus, when both the Princes were seated, the person for whose trial, as it might be called, the council was summoned, held the highest place, and appeared to preside in it.

It was perhaps to get rid of this inconsistency, and the scruples which might have been inspired by it, that Duke Charles, having bowed slightly to the royal chair, bluntly opened the sitting with the following words:—

"My good vassals and counsellors, it is not unknown to you what disturbances have arisen in our territories, both in our father's time, and in our own, from the rebellion of vassals against superiors, and subjects against their princes. And lately, we have had the most dreadful proof of the height to which these evils have arrived in our case, by the scandalous flight of the Countess Isabelle of Croye, and her aunt the Lady Hameline, to take refuge with a foreign power, thereby renouncing their fealty to us, and incurring the forfeiture of their fiefs; and in another more dreadful and deplorable instance, by the sacrilegious and bloody murder of our beloved brother and ally the Bishop of Liege, and the rebellion of that treacherous city, which was but too mildly punished for the last insurrection. We have been informed that these sad events may be traced, not merely to the inconstancy and folly of women, and the presumption of pampered citizens, but to the agency of foreign power, and the interference of a mighty neighbour, from whom, if good deeds could merit any return in kind, Burgundy could have expected nothing but the most sincere and devoted friendship. If this should prove truth," said the Duke, setting his teeth, and pressing his heel against the ground, "what consideration shall withhold us—the means being in our power—from taking such measures, as shall effectually, and at the very source, close up the main spring, from which these evils have yearly flowed on us?"

The Duke had begun his speech with some calmness, but he elevated his voice at the conclusion; and the last sentence was spoken in a tone which made all the counsellors tremble, and brought a transient fit of paleness across the King's cheek. He instantly recalled his courage, however, and addressed the council in his turn, in a tone evincing so much ease and composure, that the Duke, though he seemed desirous to interrupt or stop him, found no decent opportunity to do so.

"Nobles of France and of Burgundy," he said, "Knights of the Holy Spirit and of the Golden Fleece! since a King must plead his cause as an accused person, he cannot desire more distinguished judges, than the flower of nobleness, and muster and pride of chivalry. Our fair cousin of Burgundy hath but darkened the dispute between us, in so far as his courtesy has declined to state it in precise terms. I, who have no cause for observing such delicacy, nay, whose condition permits me not to do so, crave leave to speak more precisely. It is to Us, my lords—to Us, his liege Lord, his kinsman, his ally,—that unhappy circumstances, perverting our cousin's clear judgment and better nature, have induced him to apply the hateful charges of seducing his vassals from their allegiance, stirring up the people of Liege to revolt, and stimulating the outlawed William de la Marck to commit a most cruel and sacrilegious murder. Nobles of France and Burgundy, I might truly appeal to the circumstances in which I now stand, as being in themselves a complete contradiction of such an accusation; for is it to be supposed, that, having the sense of a rational being left me, I should have thrown myself unreservedly into the power of the Duke of Burgundy, while I was practising treachery against him, such as could not fail to be discovered, and which, being discovered, must place me, as I now stand, in the power of a justly exasperated prince? The folly of one who should seat himself quietly down to repose on a mine, after he had lighted the match which was to cause instant explosion, would have been wisdom compared to were Kings by the ears,—were it not well a fitting match for her?"

She, though conscious what ungrateful probably to be made next, gave a calm and to what Charles said; but the Countess restored to courage by the very extremity of her. She quitted the arm of the Countess, on which she had hitherto leaned, came dily, yet with an air of dignity, and, kneeling Duke's throne, thus addressed him:—
"O Duke of Burgundy, and my liege Lord! I am my fault in having withdrawn myself from you without your gracious permission. I most humbly acquiesce in any penalty you see fit to impose. I place my lands and my rightful disposal, and pray you only of clemency, and for the sake of my father's allowance the last of the line of Croye, out of this, such a moderate maintenance as may maintain me into a convent for the remainder of my life, Sir, of the young person's petition," said the Duke, addressing Louis.

"I will do my duty," said the King, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

"I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld." "I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

"I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld." "I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

"I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld." "I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

"I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld." "I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

"I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

"I will do my duty," said the Duke, "and I will come from that grace which ought to be granted or withheld."

Duke of Orleans. "This youth discharged his commission manfully, and maintained his trust in a manner that I shall long remember. Come to my apartment, Archer, when this matter is over, and thou shalt find I have not forgot thy brave bearing, while I am glad to see it is equalled by thy modesty."

"And come to mine," said Dimes. "I have a helmet for thee, since I think I owe thee one." Quentin bowed low to both, and the examination was resumed. At the command of Duke Charles, he produced the written instructions which he had received for the direction of his journey.

"Did you follow these instructions literally, soldier?" said the Duke.

"No, if it please your Grace," replied Quentin. "They directed me, as you may be pleased to observe, to cross the Meuse near Namur; whereas I kept the left bank, as being both the nigher and the safer road to Liege."

"And wherefore that alteration?" said the Duke.

"Because I began to suspect the fidelity of my guide," answered Quentin.

"Now mark the questions I have next to ask thee," said the Duke. "Reply truly to them, and fear nothing from the resentment of any one. But if you palter or double in your answers, I will have thee hung alive in an iron chain from the steeple of the market-house, where thou shalt wish for death for many an hour ere he come to relieve you!"

There was a deep silence ensued. At length, having given the youth time, as he thought, to consider the circumstances in which he was placed, the Duke demanded to know of Durward, who his guide was, by whom supplied, and wherefore he had been led to entertain suspicion of him? To the first of these questions, Quentin Durward answered, by naming Hayraddin Maugrabien, the Bohemian; to the second, that the guide had been recommended by Tristan l'Hermite, and in reply to the third point, he mentioned what had happened in the Franciscan convent near Namur, how the Bohemian had been expelled from the holy house; and how, jealous of his behaviour, he had dogged him to a rendezvous with one of William de la Marck's lansknights, where he overheard them arrange a plan for surprising the ladies who were under his protection.

"Now, hark thee," said the Duke, "and once more remember thy life depends on thy veracity, did these villains mention their having this King's—I mean this very King Louis of France's authority, for their scheme of surprising the court, and carrying away the ladies?"

"If such infamous fellows had said so," replied Quentin, "I know not how I should have believed them, having the word of the King himself to place in opposition to theirs."

Louis, who had listened hitherto with most earnest attention, could not help drawing his breath deeply, when he heard Durward's answer in the manner of one from whose bosom a heavy weight has been at once removed. The Duke again looked disconcerted and moody; and, returning to the charge, questioned Quentin still more closely, whether he did not understand, from these men's private conversation, that the plots which they meditated had King Louis's sanction?

"I repeat, that I heard nothing which could authorize me to say so," answered the young man, who, though internally convinced of the King's accession to the treachery of Hayraddin, yet held it contrary to his allegiance to bring forward his own suspicions on the subject, "and if I had heard such men make such an assertion, I again say, that I would not have given their testimony weight against the instructions of the King himself."

"Thou art a faithful newswriter," said the Duke, with a sneer; "and I venture to say, that in obeying the King's instructions, thou hast disappointed his expectations in a manner that thou mightst have smarted for, but that subsequent events have made thy bull-headed fidelity seem like good service."

"I understand you not, my lord," said Quentin Durward; "all I know is, that my master King Louis sent me to protect these ladies, and that I did so accordingly, to the extent of my ability, both in the journey to Schonwaldt, and through the subsequent scenes which took place. I understood the instructions of the King to be honourable, and I executed them honourably; had they been of a different tenor, they would not have suited one of my name or nation."

"Fier comme un Ecossois," said Charles, who, however disappointed at the tenor of Durward's reply, was not unjust enough to blame him for his boldness. "But hark thee, Archer, what instructions were those which made thee, as some sad fugitives from Schonwaldt have informed us, parade the streets of Liege, at the head of these mutineers, who afterwards cruelly murdered their temporal Prince and spiritual Father? And what harangue was it which thou didst make after that murder was committed, in which you took upon you, as agent for Louis, to assume authority among the villains who had just perpetrated so great a crime?"

"My lord," said Quentin, "there are many who could testify, that I assumed not the character of an envoy of France in the town of Liege, but had it fixed upon me by the obstinate clamours of the people themselves, who refused to give credit to any disclamation which I could make. This I told to those in the service of the Bishop when I had made my escape from the city, and recommended their attention to the security of the Castle, which might have prevented the calamity and horror of the succeeding night. It is, no doubt, true, that I did, in the extremity of danger, avail myself of the influence which my imputed character gave me, to save the Countess Isabelle, to protect my own life, and, so far as I could, to rein in the humour for slaughter, which had already broke out in so dreadful an instance. I repeat, and will maintain it with my body, that I had no commission of any kind from the King of France, respecting the people of Liege, far less instructions to instigate them to mutiny; and that, finally, when I did avail myself of that imputed character, it was as if I had snatched up a shield to protect myself in a moment of emergency, and used it, as I should surely have done, for the defence of myself and others, without inquiring whether I had a right to the heraldic emblazonments which it displayed."

"And therein my young companion and prisoner," said Crèveœur, unable any longer to remain silent, "acted with equal spirit and good sense; and his doing so cannot justly be imputed as blame to King Louis."

There was a murmur of assent among the surrounding nobility which sounded joyfully in the ears of King Louis, whilst it gave no little offence to Charles. He rolled his eyes angrily around; and the sentiments, so generally expressed by so many of his highest vassals and wisest counsellors, would not perhaps have prevented his giving way to his violent and despotic temper, had not Des Comines, who foresaw the danger, prevented it, by suddenly announcing a herald from the city of Liege.

"A herald from weavers and nailers?" exclaimed the Duke—"but, admit him instantly. By Our Lady, I will learn from this same herald something further of his employers' hopes and projects, than this young French-Scottish man-at-arms seems desirous to tell me!"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE HERALD.

Arlet. — Hark! they roar.

Prospero. Let them be hunted soundly.

The Tempest.

THERE WAS room made in the assembly, and no small curiosity evinced by those present to see the herald whom the insurgent Liegeois had ventured to send to so haughty a Prince as the Duke of Burgundy, while in such high indignation against them. For it must be remembered, that at this period heralds were only dispatched from sovereign princes to each other upon solemn occasions; and that the inferior nobility employed pursuivants, a lower rank of officers-at-arms. It may be also noticed in passing, that Louis XI., an habitual derider of whatever did not promise real power or substantial advantage, was in especial a professed contemner of heralds and heraldry, "red, blue, and green, with all their trumpery,"* to which the pride of his rival Charles, which was of a very different kind, attached no small degree of ceremonious importance.

The herald, who was now introduced into the presence of the monarchs, was dressed in a tabard, or coat, embroidered with the arms of his master, in which the Boar's-head made a distinguished appearance, in blazonry, which, in the opinion of the skilful, was more showy than accurate. The rest of his dress—a dress always sufficiently tawdry—was overcharged with lace, embroidery, and ornament of every kind; and the plume of feathers which he wore was so high, as if intended to sweep the roof of the hall. In short, the usual gaudy splendour of the heraldic attire was caricatured and overdone. The Boar's-head was not only repeated on every part of his dress, but even his bonnet was formed into that shape, and it was represented with gory tongue and bloody tusks, or, in proper language, langed and dentated gules; and there was something in the man's appearance which seemed to imply a mixture of boldness and apprehension, like one who has undertaken a dangerous commission, and is sensible that audacity alone can carry him through it with safety. Something of the same mixture of fear and effrontery was visible in the manner in which he paid his respects, and he showed also a grotesque awkwardness, not usual amongst those who were accustomed to be received in the presence of princes.

"Who art thou, in the devil's name?" was the greeting with which Charles the Bold received this singular envoy.

"I am Rouge Sanglier," answered the herald. "the officer-at-arms of William de la Marck, by the grace of God, and the election of the Chapter, Prince Bishop of Liege."

"Ha!" exclaimed Charles; but, as if subduing his own passion, he made a sign to him to proceed.

"And, in right of his wife, the Honourable Countess Hameline of Croye, Count of Croye, and Lord of Bracquemont"

The utter astonishment of Duke Charles at the extremity of boldness with which these titles were announced in his presence, seemed to strike him dumb; and the herald, conceiving, doubtless, that he had made a suitable impression by the announcement of his character, proceeded to state his errand.

"Annuncio vobis gaudium magnum," he said; "I let you, Charles of Burgundy and Earl of Flanders, to know, in my master's name, that under favour of a dispensation of our Holy Father of Rome, presently expected, and appointing a fitting substitute ad sacra, he proposes to exercise at once the office of Prince Bishop, and maintain the rights of Count of Croye."

The Duke of Burgundy, at this and other pauses in the herald's speech, only ejaculated "Ha!" or some similar interjection, without making any answer; and the tone of exclamation was that of one who, though surprised and moved, is willing to hear all that is to be said ere he commits himself by making an answer. To the further astonishment of all who were present, he forebore from his usual abrupt and violent gesticulations, remaining with the nail of his thumb pressed against his teeth, which was his favourite attitude when giving attention, and keeping his eyes bent on the ground, as if unwilling to betray the passion which might gleam in them.

The envoy, therefore, proceeded boldly and unabashed in the delivery of his message. "In the name, therefore, of the Prince Bishop of Liege, and Count of Croye, I am to require of you, Duke Charles, to desist from those pretensions and encroachments which you have made on the free and imperial city again exclaimed the Duke.

* For a remarkable instance of this, see note, p. 121.

"To restore the banners of the community,

"you finished?" said the Duke.

"I replied the envoy: "I am further to "Nay, but if it please your Grace," said Crève-coeur and D'Huybercourt together, "he is a herald, and so far privileged."

"It is you, Messieurs," replied the Duke, "who are such owls, as to think that the tabard makes the herald. I see by that fellow's blazoning he is a mere impudor. Let Tison d'Or step forward, and question him in your presence."

In spite of his natural affront, the envoy of the Wild Boar of Ardenne now became pale, and that notwithstanding some touches of paint with which he had adorned his countenance. Tison d'Or, the chief herald, as we have elsewhere said, of the Duke, and King at arms within his dominions, stepped forward with the solemnity of one who knew what was due to his office, and asked his supposed brother, in what College he had studied the science which he professed.

"I was bred a pursuivant at the Heraldic College at Retzbon," answered Rouge Sanglier, "and received the diploma of Ehrenbold from that same learned fraternity."

"You could not derive it from a source more worthy," answered Tison d'Or, bowing still lower than he had done before, "and if I resume to confer with you on the mysteries of our sublime science, in obedience to the orders of the most gracious Duke, it is not in hopes of giving, but of receiving knowledge."

"Go to," said the Duke, impatiently. "Leave off ceremony, and ask him some question that may try his skill."

"It were injustice to ask a disciple of the worthy College of Arms at Retzbon, if he comprehendeth the common terms of blazonry," said Tison d'Or;
"but I may, without offence, crave of Rouge Sang-lier to say, if he is instructed in the more mysterious and secret terms of the science, by which the more learned do emblematically, and as it were parabol-ically, express to each other what is conveyed to others in the ordinary language, taught in the very academies as it were of Heraldry?"

"I understand one sort of blazonry as well as another," answered Rouge Sanglier, boldly, "but it may be we have not the same terms in Germany which you have here in Flanders."

"Alas, that you will say so!" replied Tison d'Or;
"our noble science, which is indeed the very banner of nobleness, and glory of generosity, being the same in all Christian countries, nay, known and acknowledged even by the Saracens and Moors. I would, therefore, pray of you to describe what coat you will after the celestial fashion, that is, by the planets."

"Blazon it yourself as you will," said Rouge Sang-lier; "I will do no such apish tricks upon commandment, as an ape is made to come aloft."

"Show him a coat, and let him blazon it his own way," said the Duke; "and if he fails, I promise him that his back shall be gules, azure, and sable."

"Here," said the herald of Burgundy, taking from his pouch a piece of parchment, "is a scroll, in which certain considerations led me to pick down, after my own poor fashion, an ancient coat. I will pray brother, if indeed he belong to the honourable College of Arms at Retzbon, to decipher it in fitting language."

Le Glorieux, who seemed to take great pleasure in this discussion, had by this time bustled himself close up to the two heralds. "I will help thee, good fellow," said he to Rouge Sanglier, as he looked hopelessly upon the scroll. "Thou, my lords and masters, represents the cat looking out at the dairy-window."

This silly occasioned a laugh, which was something to the advantage of Rouge Sanglier, as it led Tison d'Or, indignant at the misconstruction of his drawing, to explain it as the coat-of-arms assumed by Chudebert, King of France, after he had taken prisoner Gondekar, King of Burgundy; representing an ounce, or tiger-cat, the emblem of the captive prince, behind a grating, or, as Tison d'Or technically defined it, "Sable, a murreon passant Or, surmounted with a trulla gules, cloud of the second."

nian, Hayraddin Maugrabin—It were not well he should come to speech of the Duke."

"He must die," answered Louis, in the same tone—"dead men tell no tales."

One instant afterwards, Tristan l'Hermite, to whom Niver had given the hint, stepped forward before the King and the Duke, and said, in his blunt manner, "So please your Majesty and your Grace, this piece of game is mine, and I claim him—he is marked with my stamp—the fleur-de-lis is branded on his shoulder, as all men may see.—He is a known villain, and hath slain the King's subjects, robbed churches, dowered virgins, slain deer in the royal parks"—

"Enough, enough," said Duke Charles, "he is my royal cousin's property by many a good title. What will your Majesty do with him?"

"If he is left to my disposal," said the King, "I will at least give him one lesson in the science of heraldry, in which he is so ignorant—only explain to him practically, the meaning of a cross potence, with a noose dangling proper."

"Not as to be by him borne, but as to bear him.—Let him take the degrees under your gossip Tristan—he is a deep professor in such mysteries."

Thus answered the Duke, with a burst of discordant laughter at his own wit, which was so cordially scorned by Louis, that his rival could not help looking kindly at him, while he said—

"Ah, Louis, Louis! would to God thou wert as faithful a monarch as thou art a merry companion! I cannot but think often on the jovial time we used to spend together."

"You may bring it back when you will," said Louis; "I will grant you as fair terms as for very shame's sake you ought to ask in my present condition, without making yourself the fable of Christendom; and I will swear to observe them upon the holy relique which I have ever the grace to bear about my person, being a fragment of the true cross."

Here he took a small golden reliquary, which was suspended from his neck next to his shirt by a chain of the same metal, and having kissed it devoutly, continued—

"Never was false oath sworn on this most sacred relique, but it was avenged within the year."

"Yet," said the Duke, "it was the same on which you swore amity to me when you left Burgundy, and shortly after sent the Bastard of Rubempré to murder or kidnap me."

"Nay, gracious cousin, now you are ripping up ancient grievances," said the King; "I promise you, that you were deceived in that matter.—Moreover, it was not upon this relique which I then swore, but upon another fragment of the true cross which I got from the Grand Seigneur, weakened in virtue, doubtless, by sojourning with infidels. Besides, did not the war of the Public Good break out within the year; and was not a Burgundian army encamped at Saint Denis, backed by all the great feudatories of France; and was I not obliged to yield up Normandy to my brother?—O God, shield us from perjury on such a warrant as this!"

"Well, cousin," answered the Duke; "I do believe thou hadst a lesson to keep faith another time.—And now for once, without finess and doubling, will you make good your promise, and go with me to punish this murdering La Marck and the Liegeois?"

"I will march against them," said Louis, "with the Ban and Arrière-Ban of France, and the Oriflamme displayed."

"Nay, nay," said the Duke, "that is more than is needful, or may be advisable. The presence of your Scottish Guard, and two hundred choice lances, will serve to show that you are a free agent. A large army might"—

"Make me so in effect, you would say, my fair cousin?" said the King. "Well, you shall dictate the numbers of my attendants."

"And to put this fair cause of mischief out of the way, you will agree to the Countess Isabelle of Croye wedding with the Duke of Orleans?"

"Fair cousin," said the King, "you drive my courtesy to extremity. The Duke is the betrothed bridegroom of my daughter Joan. Be generous—yield up this matter, and let us speak rather of the towns on the Somme."

"My council will talk to your Majesty of these," said Charles; "I myself have less at heart the acquisition of territory, than the redress of injuries. You have tampered with my vassals, and your royal pleasure must needs dispose of the hand of a Ward of Burgundy. Your Majesty must bestow it within the pale of your own royal family, since you have meddled with it—otherwise, our conference breaks off."

"Were I to say I did this willingly," said the King, "no one would believe me; therefore do you, my fair cousin, judge of the extent of my wish to oblige you, when I say, most reluctantly, that the parties consenting, and a dispensation from the Pope being obtained, my own objections shall be no bar to this match which you propose."

"All besides can be easily settled by our Ministers," said the Duke, "and we are once more cousins and friends."

"May Heaven be praised!" said Louis, "who, holding in his hand the hearts of princes, doth mercifully incline them to peace and clemency, and prevent the effusion of human blood.—Oliver," he added apart to that favourite, who ever waited around him like the familiar beside a sorcerer, "Hark thee—tell Tristan to be speedy in dealing with yonder runagate Bohemian."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE EXECUTION.

I'll take thee to the good green wood,
And make thine own hand choose the tree.

Old Ballad.

"Now God be praised, that gave us the power of laughing, and making others laugh, and shame to the dull cur who scorns the office of a jester! Here is a joke, and that none of the brightest, (though it may pass, since it has amused two Princes,) which hath gone farther than a thousand reasons of state to prevent a war between France and Burgundy."

Such was the inference of Le Glorieux, when, in consequence of the reconciliation of which we gave the particulars in the last Chapter, the Burgundian guards were withdrawn from the Castle of Peronne, the abode of the King removed from the ominous Tower of Count Herbert, and, to the great joy both of French and Burgundians, an outward show at least of confidence and friendship seemed so established between Duke Charles and his liege lord. Yet still the latter, though treated with ceremonial observance, was sufficiently aware that he continued to be the object of suspicion, though he prudently affected to overlook it, and appeared to consider himself as entirely at his ease.

Meanwhile, as frequently happens in such cases, whilst the principal parties concerned had so far made up their differences, one of the subaltern agents concerned in their intrigues was bitterly experiencing the truth of the political maxim, that if the great have frequent need of base tools, they make amends to society by abandoning them to their fate, so soon as they find them no longer useful.

This was Hayraddin Maugrabin, who, surrendered by the Duke's officers to the King's Provost-Marshal, was by him placed in the hands of his two trusty aides-de-camp, Trois-Eschelles and Petit-André, to be despatched without loss of time. One on either side of him, and followed by a few guards and a multitude of rabble,—this playing the Allegro, that the Penseroso,—he was marched off (to use a modern comparison, like Garrick between Tragedy and Comedy) to the neighbouring forest; where, to save all farther trouble and ceremonial of a gibbet, and so forth, the disposers of his fate proposed to knit him up to the first sufficient tree.

They were not long in finding an oak, as Petit-André facetiously expressed it, fit to bear such an acorn; and placing the wretched criminal on a bank under a sufficient guard, they began their extemporaneous preparations for the final catastrophe. At that moment Hayraddin, raising on the crowd, attracted the eyes of Quentin Durward, who, thinking he perceived the countenance of his father, was struck by the resemblance of his features to that of the celebrated impostor had followed him to the crowd to witness the execution and escape himself of the criminal.

When the executioners informed him that all was ready Hayraddin, with much calmness, asked a single boon of them.

"Any thing, my son, consistent with our office," said Trois-Eschelles.

"That a," said Hayraddin, "any thing but my life."

"Even so," said Trois-Eschelles, "and something more; for as you seem resolved to do credit to our mystery, and do like a man, without making wry mouths—why, though our orders are to be prompt, I care not if I indulge you ten minutes longer."

"You are even too generous," said Hayraddin.

"Truly we may be blamed for it," said Petit-André; "but what of that?—I could consent almost to give my life for such a jerry-come-tumble, such a smart, tight, firm lad, who proposes to come from aloft with a grace as an honest fellow should do."

"So that if you want a confessor," said Trois-Eschelles—

"Or a lire of wine," said his facetious companion—

"Or a psalm," said Tragedy—

"Or a song," said Comedy—

"Neither, my good, kind, and most expeditious friends," said the Bohemian—"I only pray to speak a few minutes with yonder Archer of the Scottish Guard."

The executioners hesitated a moment; but Trois-Eschelles recollecting that Quentin Durward was believed, from various circumstances, to stand high in the favour of their master, King Louis, they resolved to permit the interview.

When Quentin, at their summons, approached the condemned criminal, he could not but be shocked at his appearance, however justly his doom might have been deserved. The remnants of his heraldic finery, rent to tatters by the fangs of the dogs, and the clutches of the bipeds who had rescued him from their fury to lead him to the gallows, gave him at once a ludicrous and a wretched appearance. His face was discoloured with paint, and with some remnants of a fictitious beard, assumed for the purpose of disguise, and there was the paleness of death upon his cheek and upon his lip; yet, strong in passive courage, like most of his tribe, his eye, while it glistened and wandered, as well as the contorted smile of his mouth, seemed to bid defiance to the death he was about to die.

Quentin was struck partly with horror, partly with compassion, as he approached the miserable man, and these feelings probably betrayed themselves in his manner, for Petit-André, called out, "Trip it more smartly, jolly Archer—This gentleman's leisure cannot wait for you, if you walk as if the pebbles were eggs, and you afraid of breaking them."

"I must speak with him in privacy," said the criminal, despair seeming to croak in his accent as he uttered the words.

"That may hardly consist with our office, my merry Leap-the-ladder," said Petit-André; "we know you for a slippery eel of old."

"I am tied with your horse-girths, hand and foot," said the criminal—"You may keep guard around me, though out of ear-shot—the Archer is your own King's servant—And if I give you ten gilders"—

"Laid out in masses, the sum may profit his poor soul," said Trois-Eschelles.

"Laid out in wine or brantwein, it will comfort my poor body," responded Petit-André. "So let them be forthcoming, my little crack-rope."

"Pay the blood-hounds their fee," said Hayraddin to Durward; "I was plundered of every siver when they took me—it shall avail thee much."

Quentin paid the executioners their guerdon, and, like men of promise, they retreated out of hearing—keeping, however, a careful eye on the criminal's motions. After waiting an instant till the unhappy man would speak as he still remained silent, Quentin addressed him, "And to this conclusion have I come, my son."

"At," answered Hayraddin, "it required neither astronomer, nor physiognomist, nor chiromantist, to see that I should follow the destiny of a family."

"Bravely to this early end by thy long course of crime and treason," said the Scot.

"No, by the Virgin, Alceboran and all his broth'ers!" answered the Bohemian. "I am brought hither by my duty, in believing that the bloodthirsty cruelty of a Frank could be restrained even by what they themselves profess to hold most sacred, priest's vestment would have been no safer garb for me than a devil's tabard, however sanctimonious are your professions of devotion and chivalry."

"A detected impostor has no right to claim the immunities of the disguise he had usurped," said Durward.

"Detected!" said the Bohemian. "My jump was as good as yonder old fool of a herald's;—let it pass. As well now as hereafter."

"You abuse time," said Quentin. "If you have aught to tell me, say it quickly, and then take some care of your soul."

"Of my soul!" said the Bohemian, with a hidden laugh. "Think ye a leprosy of twenty years can be cured in an instant?—If I have a soul, it hath been in such a course since I was ten years old and more that it would take me one month to recall all my crimes, and another to tell them to the priest;—as were such space granted me, it is five to one I would employ it otherwise."

"Hardened wretch, blaspheme not! Tell me what thou hast to say, and I leave thee to thy fate," said Durward, with mingled pity and horror.

"I have a boon to ask," said Hayraddin,—"but first I will buy it of you; for your tribe, with all their professions of charity, give nought for nought."

"I could well nigh say thy gifts perish with thee," answered Quentin, "but that thou art on the verge of eternity.—Ask thy boon—reserve thy boon—it can do me no good—I remember enough of your good offices of old."

"Why, I loved you," said Hayraddin, "for it matter that chanced on the banks of the Cher; as I would have helped you to a wealthy dame. Ye wore her scarf, which partly misled me; and when I thought that Hameline with her portable wealth was more for your market-penny than the other little sparrow, with her old roost at Bracquemont, which Charles has clutched, and is likely to keep his claw upon."

"Talk not so idly, unhappy man," said Quentin, "yonder officers become impatient."

"Give them ten gilders for ten minutes more," said the culprit,—who, like most in his situation, mingled with his hardihood a desire of procrastinating his fate—"I tell thee it shall avail thee much."

"Use then well the minutes so purchased," said Durward, and easily made a new bargain with the Marshal's men.

This done, Hayraddin continued.—"Yea, I assure you I meant you well; and Hameline would have proved an easy and convenient spouse. Why, she has reconciled herself even with the Boar of Arden, though his mode of wooing was somewhat of the roughest, and lords it yonder in his sty, as if she had fed on mast-husks and acorns all her life."

"Cease this brutal and untimely jesting," said Quentin, "or, once more I tell you, I will leave you to your fate."

"You are right," said Hayraddin, after a moment's pause; "what cannot be postponed must be faced!—Well, know then, I came hither in this accursed disguise, moved by a great reward from De la Marck, and hoping a yet mightier one from King Louis, not merely to bear the message of defiance which you may have heard of, but to tell the King an important secret."

"It was a fearful risk," said Durward.

"It was paid for as such, and such it hath proved," answered the Bohemian. "De la Marck attempted as to communicate with Louis by means of March; but she could not, it seems, approach nearer than the astrologer, to whom she told all the signs of the journey, and of Schonwaldt, but it is since of her tidings ever reach Louis, except in the form of a prophecy. But hear my secret, which is so important that aught she could tell. William March has assembled a numerous and strong army within the city of Lange, and augments it daily with the spoils of the old priest's treasure. But he proposes not to hazard a battle with the chivalry of Burgundy, and still leave to stand a siege in the dismantled city. Thus he will do—he will suffer the hot brained knights to sit down before the place without opposition; and in the night, make an outfall or rally upon Langemarck with his whole force. Many he will have in French armour, who will cry France, Saint Louis, Dennis Montjoye, as if there were a strong body of French auxiliaries in the city. Thus cannot choose strike utter confusion among the Burgundians, if King Louis, with his guards, attendants, and goldsmiths as he may have with him, shall second efforts, the Bear of Ardenne nothing doubts the omens of the whole Burgundian army. There is my secret, and I bequeath it to you. Forward, or wait the enterprise—will the intelligence to King Louis, or to Duke Charles, I care not—save or destroy in that will; for my part, I only grieve that I cannot spring it like a mine, to the destruction of a whole army."

"It is indeed an important secret," said Quentin, partly comprehending how easily the national jealousy might be awakened in a camp consisting partly French, partly of Burgundians.

"Ay, so it is," answered Hayraddin; "and, now have it, you would fain be gone, and leave me without granting the boon for which I have paid so dearly."

"Tell me thy request," said Quentin—"I will grant it to be in my power."

"Nay, it is no mighty demand—it is only in behalf of my Klepper, my palfrey, the only living thing that I prize me. A few miles south, you will find him lying by a deserted collier's hut; whistle to him, and he whistles a peculiar note," and call him by his name, Klepper, he will come to you; here is a bundle under my guberdine—it is lucky the hounds did not find it, for he obeys no other. Take him, and be sure of him—I do not say for his master's sake, but because I have placed at your disposal the gift of a mighty war. He will never fail you at night and day, rough and smooth, fair and foul, in stables and the winter sky, are the same to you; had I cleared the gates of Peronne, and got to where I left him, I had not been in this case. Will you be kind to Klepper?"

"I swear to you that I will," answered Quentin, affected by what seemed a trait of tenderness in a character so hardened.

"Then fare thee well!" said the criminal—"Yet stay—I would not willingly die in discourtesy, giving a lady's commission. This billet is from a very gracious and extremely silly Lady of the Bear of Ardenne, to her black-eyed niece—I see your look I have chosen a willing messenger and one word more—I forgot to say, that in the lining of my saddle you will find a rich purse of gold coins, for the sake of which I put my life on the venture which has cost me so dear. Take them, and lose a hundred-fold the goldens you have bestowed these bloody slaves—I make you mine here."

"I will bestow them in good works, and masses for the benefit of thy soul," said Quentin.

"Name not that word again," said Hayraddin, his countenance assuming a dreadful expression; "there can be—there shall be—no such thing!—it is a dream of priests!"

"Unhappy—most unhappy being! Think better!—do you send for a priest—these men will delay yet a moment—I will bribe them to it," said Quentin. "What canst thou expect, dying in such opinions, of moment?"

"To be resolved into the elements," said the hardened sinner, pressing his fettered arms against his bosom; "my hope, trust, and expectation is, that the mysterious frame of humanity shall melt into the general mass of nature, to be recomposed in the other forms with which she daily supplies those which daily disappear, and return under different forms—the watery particles to streams and showers, the earthly parts to enrich their mother earth, the airy portions to waft on the breeze, and those of fire to supply the blaze of Aldeboran and his brethren—in this faith have I lived, and I will die in it!—Hemmel begone! disturb me no farther!—I have spoken the last word that mortal ears shall listen to!"

Deeply impressed with the horrors of his condition, Quentin Durward yet saw that it was vain to hope to awaken him to a sense of his fearful state. He bid him, therefore, farewell; to which the criminal only replied by a short and sullen nod, as one who, plunged in reverie, bids adieu to company which distracts his thoughts. He bent his course towards the forest, and easily found where Klepper was feeding. The creature came at his call, but was for some time unwilling to be caught, snuffing and starting when the stranger approached him. At length, however, Quentin's general acquaintance with the habits of the animal, and perhaps some particular knowledge of those of Klepper, which he had often admired while Hayraddin and he travelled together, enabled him to take possession of the Bohemian's dying bequest. Long ere he returned to Peronne, the Bohemian had gone where the vanity of his dreadful creed was to be put to the final issue—a fearful experience for one who had never expressed remorse for the past, nor apprehension for the future!

CHAPTER XXXV.

A PRIZE FOR MARCH.

"The brave for Slavery when the best birds win her.
The Court Politician."

When Quentin Durward reached Peronne, a council was sitting, in the issue of which he was interested more deeply than he could have apprehended, and which, though held by persons of a rank with whom one of his could scarce be supposed to have community of interest, had nevertheless the most extraordinary influence on his fortunes.

King Louis, who, after the interlude of De la March's envoy, had omitted no opportunity to cultivate the returning interest which that circumstance had given him in the Duke's opinion, had been engaged in consulting him, or, it might be almost said, receiving his opinion, upon the number and quality of the troops, by whom, as auxiliary to the Duke of Burgundy, he was to be attended in their joint expedition against Lange. He plainly saw the wish of Charles was to call into his camp such Frenchmen as, from their small number and high quality, might be considered rather as hostages than as auxiliaries; but, observant of Crèvecoeur's advice, he assented as readily to whatever the Duke proposed, as if it had arisen from the free impulse of his own mind.

The King failed not, however, to indemnify himself for his complaisance, by the indulgence of his vindictive temper against Baloe, whose counsels had led him to repose such exuberant trust in the Duke of Burgundy. Tristen, who bore the summons for moving up his auxiliary forces, had the farther commission to carry the Cardinal to the Castle of Loches, and there shut him up in one of those iron cages, which he himself is said to have invented.

"Let him make proof of his own devices," said the King; "he is a man of holy church—we may not shed his blood; but, Papue-dieu! his bishopric, for ten years to come, shall have an impregnable frontier to make up for its small extent!—And are the troops are brought up instantly?"

Perhaps, by this prompt acquiescence, Louis hoped to evade the more unpleasant condition with which the Duke had clogged their reconciliation. But if he so hoped, he greatly mistook the temper of his court; for never man lived more tenacious of his purpose than Charles of Burgundy, and least of all was he gent friend,” said Louis; “when a woman is in the case, the greatest deal is over the first in favour.”

While the princes and their nobles thus jostled over her fate, the Abbess and the Countess of Crèvecoeur endeavoured in vain to console Isabelle, who had withdrawn with them from the council-presence. The former assured her, that the Holy Virgin would frown on every attempt to withdraw a true votary from the shrine of Saint Ursula, while the Countess of Crèvecoeur whispered more temporal consolation, that no true knight, who might succeed in the surprise proposed, would avail himself against her inclinations, of the Duke’s sword; and that perhaps the successful competitor might prove one who should find such favour in her eyes as to reconcile her to obedience. Love, like despair, catches at straws; and, faint and vague as was the hope which this insinuation conveyed, the tears of the Countess Isabelle flowed more placidly while she dwelt upon it.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE GALLY.

The wretch condemn’d with life to part,
Still, still on hope relies,
And every pang that rends the heart
Bids expectation rise.

Hope, like the glimmering taper’s light,
Advances and clears the way;
And still the darker grows the night,
Ere a brighter ray—O’erleaves.

Few days had passed ere Louis had received, with a smile of gratified vengeance, the intelligence, that his favourite and his counsellor, the Cardinal Beaufort, was groaning within a cage of iron, no disposed as scarce to permit him to enjoy repose in any posture except when recumbent; and of which, he it said in passing, he remained the unpaid tenant for nearly twelve years. The auxiliary forces which the Duke had required Louis to bring up had also appeared; and he comforted himself that their numbers were sufficient to protect his person against violence, although too limited to cope, had such been his purpose, with the large army of Burgundy. He saw himself also at liberty, when time should suit, to resume his project of marriage between his daughter and the Duke of Orleans; and, although he was sensible to the indignity of serving with his noblest peers under the banners of his own vassal, and against the people whom cause he had abetted, he did not allow these circumstances to embarrass him in the meantime, trusting that a future day would bring him amends.

For chance,” said he to his trusty Oliver, “may indeed gain one hit, but it is patience and wisdom which win the game at last.”

With such sentiments, upon a beautiful day in the latter end of harvest, the King mounted his horse; and, indifferent that he was looked upon rather as a part of the payment of a victor, than in the light of an independent Sovereign surrounded by his guards and his chivalry, King Louis called from under the Gothic gateway of Peronne, to join the Burgundian army, which commenced at the same time its march against Lange.

Most of the ladies of distinction who were in the place, attended, devoted in that best array, upon the battlements and defences of the gate, to see the gallant show of the warriors setting forth on the expedition. Thither had the Countess Crèvecoeur brought the Countess Isabelle. The latter attended very reluctantly; but the peremptory order of Charles had been, that she who was to bestow the palm in the tourney, should be visible to the knights who were about to enter the lists.

As they thronged out from under the arch, many a pennon and shield was to be seen, graced with fresh devices, expressive of the bearer’s devoted resolution to become a competitor for a prize so fair. Here a charger was painted starting for the goal,—there an arrow aimed at a mark,—one knight bore a bleeding

“The periling the head of an hero on the event of a battle, was not so likely to take place in the fourteenth century, as when the love of chivalry was in more general observance. Yet it was not unlikely to occur in as obvious a person as Duke Charles, in circumstances like those supposed.

heart, indicative of his passion,—another a skull, and a coronet of laurels, showing his determination to win or die. Many others there were; and some so cunningly intricate and obscure, that they might have defied the most ingenious interpreter. Each knight, too, it may be presumed, put his courteser to his needs, and assumed his most gallant mien in the saddle, as he passed for a moment under the view of the fair bery of dames and damozels, who encouraged their valour by their smiles, and the waving of her cheeks and of veils. The Archer-guard started almost at will from the flower of the Scottish nation, drew general applause from the gallantry and splendour of their apparatus.

And there was one among those strangers, who ventured on a demonstration of acquaintance with the lady Isabelle, which had not been attempted even by the most noble of the French nobility. It was Quentin Durward, who, as he passed the ladies in his rank, presented to the Countess of Crèvecoeur, on the point of his lance, the letter of her aunt.

"Now, by my honour," said the Count of Crèvecoeur, "that is ever manifest in an unworthy adventure!"

"Do not call him so, Crèvecoeur," said Duncow. "I have good reason to bear testimony to his gallantry—and in behalf of that lady, too."

"You make words of nothing," said Isabelle, blushing with shame, and partly with resentment. "It is a letter from my unfortunate aunt. She writes cheerfully, though her situation must be dreadful."

"Let us hear, let us hear what says the Boar's bride," said Crèvecoeur.

The Countess Isabelle read the letter in which her aunt seemed determined to make the best of a bad bargain, and to console herself for the haste and indignity of her nuptials, by the happiness of being wedded to one of the bravest men of the age, who had just acquired a princedom by his valour. She implored her niece not to judge of her William (as she called him) by the report of others, but to wait till she knew him personally. He had his faults, perhaps, but they were such as belonged to characters whom she had ever venerated. William was rather addicted to wine, but so was the gallant Sir Godfrey, her granduncle;—he was something haughty and sanguinary in his temper, such had been her brother, Reinold of blessed memory;—he was blunt in speech, few Germans were otherwise, and a little wilful and peremptory, but she believed all men loved to rule. More there was to the same purpose, and the whole concluded with the hope and request, that Isabelle would, by means of the bearer, endeavour her escape from the tyrant of Burgundy, and come to her loving kinswoman at Court of Lagny, where any little differences concerning their mutual rights of succession to the Earldom might be adjusted by Isabelle's marrying Earl Eberon—a bridegroom younger indeed than his bride, but that, as she (the Lady Hameline) might perhaps say from experience, was an uncertainty more easy to be endured than Isabelle could be aware of.

Here the Countess Isabelle stopped, the Abbess observing, with a prim aspect, that she had read quite enough concerning such worldly vanities, and the Count of Crèvecoeur breaking out, "Arrest thee, deceitful wench!—Why, this device smells rank as the tainted cheese in a rat-trap—Now sit, and double sit, upon the old decoy-duck!"

The Countess of Crèvecoeur gravely rebuked her husband for his violence—"The Lady Hameline," she said, "must have been deceived by De la March with a show of courtesy."

"He show courtesy!" said the Count—"I acquit him of all such dissimulation. You may as well expect courtesy from a literal wild boar—you may as well try to lay leaf-gold on old rusty gibbet irons. No—shot as she is, she is not quite good enough to fall in love with the fox who has snared her, and that in his very den. But you women are all alike—our words carry it—and, I dare say, here is my pretty cousin impatient to join her aunt in this paradise, and marry the Boar-Pig."

"So far from being capable of such folly," Isabelle, "I am doubly desirous of vengeance on murderers of my excellent Bishop, because at the same time, free my aunt from the villain's power."

"Ah! there indeed spoke the voice of Crèvecoeur," claimed the Count; and no more was said among the letters.

But while Isabelle read her aunt's epistle to friends, it must be observed that she did not it necessary to write a certain postscript, in which the Countess Hameline, lady-like, gave an account of her occupations, and informed her niece, that she had last week for the present a surcoat which was working for her husband, bearing the arms of Crève and La March in conjugal fashion, parted pale, because her William had determined, by means of policy, in the first action to have a dress in his coat-armour, and himself to be the arms of Orleans, with a bar sinister—in words, those of Duncow. There was also a paper in another hand, the contents of which Countess did not think it necessary to mention, simply these words—"If you hear not of me, and that by the trumpet of Fame, conclude me to be not unworthy."

A thought, hitherto repelled as wildly from her, now glanced with double keenness through Isabelle's soul. As female wit seldom fails in the countenance, she so ordered it, that ere the troops fully on march, Quentin Durward received from unknown hand the billet of Lady Hameline, and with three crosses opposite to the postscript, and with these words subjoined—"He who found the arms of Orleans when on the breast of their last owner, cannot dread them when displayed that of a tyrant and murderer." A thousand and times was this intimation heard and read, the bosom of the young Scot! for it marshalled on the path where both Honour and Love held the reward, and possessed him with a secret shame to others, by which to distinguish him when he could alone give life to his hopes, and which he resolutely resolved to lock up in his own breast.

But Durward saw the necessity of acting discreetly respecting the information communicated by the riddin, since the proposed rally of De la March's less headfully guarded against, might prove the destruction of the harassing army, so difficult was in the tumultuous warfare of those days, a step from a nocturnal surprise. After pondering the matter, he formed the additional resolution, that he would not communicate the intelligence personally, and to both the Princes while separated, perhaps, because he felt that to mention so well-contrived and hopeful a scheme to Louis whilst a prisoner might be too strong a temptation to the vanity and probity of that Monarch, and lead him to more than repel the intended rally. He determined, therefore, to watch for an opportunity of revealing the whole whilst Louis and Charles were met, which, as they were not particularly fond of the constraint imposed by each other's society, was not likely soon to occur.

Meanwhile the march continued, and the vanguard had entered the territories of Lagny. The Burgundian soldiers, at least a part of the composed of those bands who had acquired the title of Armourers of France, showed by the usage they gave the inhabitants, under pretext of saving the Bishop's death, that they well deserved that honorable title, while their conduct greatly justified the cause of Charles. The aggressive intention might otherwise have been perceived in the guard of burning arms in self-defence, harassing he and by cutting off small parties, and falling back on the main body upon the city itself, thus increasing the numbers and desperation of those who had arrived to defend it. The French, few in number as those the chosen soldiers of the country, kept coming to the King's orders, close by their respective standards, and observed the strictest discipline, contrast which increased the astonishment of Charles who could not help remarking that the troops

Rejecting this offer ould have put himself at the head of his s, to extricate those engaged in the incau-ce; but D'Hymbercourt and Crèveœur im to leave the service to them, and, to the scene of action at two points, with and proper arrangement for mutual sup-two celebrated captains succeeded in re-Liegeois, and in extricating the vanguard, besides prisoners, no fewer than eight n, of whom about a hundred were men-the prisoners, however, were not nume-of them having been rescued by D'Hym-ho now proceeded to occupy the contested l to place guards opposite to the town, i it was divided by an open space, or of five or six hundred yards, left free of r the purpose of defence. There was no t the suburb and town, the ground being at place. A gate fronted the suburb, from s might be easily made, and the wall was wo or three of those breaches which Duke d caused to be made after the battle of , and which had been hastily repaired barricades of timber. he main body and rear of the numerous e Duke had continued to advance, while and repulsed vanguard was in the act of and they had come into collision with to the great confusion of both. The ne-sence of D'Hymbercourt, who discharged s of Maréchal du Camp, or, as we should : Quarter-master-general, augmented the nd to complete, the whole, the night sunk as a wolf's mouth: there fell a thick and the ground, on which the beleaguer-nust needs take up their position, was d intersected with many canals. It is ible to form an idea of the confusion which the Burgundian army, where leaders were rom their soldiers, and soldiers from their nd officers. Every one, from the highest st, was seeking shelter and accommodation where he could individually find it; while the wearied and wounded, who had been engaged in the battle, were calling in vain for shelter and refreshment; and while those who knew nothing of the disaster, were pressing on to have their share in the sack of the place, which they had no doubt was proceeding merrily.

When D'Hymbercourt returned, he had a task to perform of incredible difficulty, and embittered by the reproaches of his master, who made no allowance for the still more necessary duty in which he had been engaged, until the temper of the gallant soldier began to give way under the Duke's unreasonable reproaches.—"I went hence to restore some order in the van," he said, "and left the main body under your Grace's own guidance; and now, on my return, I can neither find that we have front, flank, nor rear, so utter is the confusion."

"We are the more like a barrel of herrings," answered Le Glorieux, "which is the most natural resemblance for a Flemish army."

The jester's speech made the Duke laugh, and perhaps prevented a farther prosecution of the altercation betwixt him and his general.

By dint of great exertion, a small lust-haus, or country villa of some wealthy citizen of Liege, was secured and cleared of other occupants, for the accommodation of the Duke and his immediate attendants; and the authority of D'Hymbercourt and Crèveœur at length established a guard in the vicinity, of about forty men-at-arms, who lighted a very large fire, made with the timber of the outhouses, which they pulled down for the purpose.

A little to the left of this villa, and betwixt it and the suburb, which, as we have said, was opposite to the city-gate, and occupied by the Burgundian vanguard, lay another pleasure-house, surrounded by a garden and court-yard, and having two or three small enclosures or fields in the rear of it. In this the King of France established his own head-quarters. He did not himself pretend to be a soldier, farther than a natural indifference to danger and much sagacity qualified him to be called such; but he was always careful to employ the most skilful in that profession, and reposed in them the confidence they merited. Louis and his immediate attendants occupied this second villa, a part of his Scottish Guard were placed in the court, where there were outhouses and sheds to shelter them from the weather; the rest were stationed in the garden. The remainder of the French men-at-arms were quartered closely together and in good order, with alarm-posts stationed, in case of their having to sustain an attack.

Dunois and Crawford, assisted by several old officers and soldiers, amongst whom Le Balafre was conspicuous for his diligence, contrived, by breaking down walls, making openings through hedges, filling up ditches, and the like, to facilitate the communication of the troops with each other, and the orderly combination of the whole in case of necessity.

Meanwhile, the King judged it proper to go without farther ceremony to the quarters of the Duke of Burgundy, to ascertain what was to be the order of proceeding, and what co-operation was expected from him. His presence occasioned a sort of council of war to be held, of which Charles might not otherwise have dreamed.

It was then that Quentin Durward prayed earnestly to be admitted, as having something of importance to deliver to the two Princes. This was obtained without much difficulty, and great was the astonishment of Louis, when he heard him calmly and distinctly relate the purpose of William de la Marck, to make a sally upon the camp of the besiegers, under the dress and banners of the French. Louis would probably have been much better pleased to have had such important news communicated in private; but as the whole story had been publicly told in presence of the Duke of Burgundy, he only observed, "that, whether true or false, such a report concerned them most materially."

"Not a whit!—not a whit!" said the Duke, carelessly. "Had there been such a purpose as this young man announces, it had not been communi-the same time louder, and aimed four or five times towards his own post, and to-morrow, he devoted it his duty to fall back as possible, and call his uncle, who came with a small body of Archers destined to be on the spot in a moment, and to fight as possible. In less than a second, and was at their head, and, despatching alarm the King and his household, drew the party to some distance behind them, but they might not be seen by the light guard, which had approached them more and suddenly to have command; but they exactly the same distant heavy tread of Burgundians are asleep on their post."

"Now, make for the suburb, Count," said the King, "and awaken the stupid ones." "I will do to the rear as you go," said Durward, and the tread of mortal men, there is a confusion between us and the suburb." "Quentin, my dear, callant," said Cressid, "art a soldier beyond thy years. They all the others come forward.—I would know where they go?" "On forward, my lord," said Quentin, "and bring you information."

"By heavy child, thou hast shown more of good will than I could have expected two and a black."

With his burgundians ready prepared, sought ground which he had reconnoitred the night of the preceding evening, and not only certain that he was in the aid of a very large body of men, who were at the King's quarters and the also that there was a detached party of them in advance, and very close to him.

At last the steps of two or three Ka-fus came from that smaller party, approached as twice a pike's length. Hearing it imminent, understood, Quentin called out "Vive le Roi!" and was answered by "Vive le Roi!" (added he who spoke, himself.) "Vive le Roi!" Quentin in his burgundians, a man groined and fell off, under the instant but vague discharge of pikes, the first of which ran in a dense column, and showed it to crown, hastened back to the main guard. "By done, my brave boy," said Cressid, "drew in within the court-yard—many as well with in the open field." "Within the court yard and garden, where they found all in great order, and the of to mount his horse."

"Away, sire," said Cressid; "you are with your own people."

and Louis, "I must instantly to the post be convenient of our good faith of interest, or we shall have both Lugros lines upon us at once." And springing he back, Durward commanded the French at the house, and Cressid the Archers household troops to defend the last enclosure. He commanded them to move, and as many intencos, (pikes of the field,) which had been left about the rear, and, in the meantime, to make up, but by no means to advance, what they might obtain, and having given his order, with a small escort, to the which permitted them arrangements to make effort, was owing to Quentin's ready about the proprietor of the house, guide to the column which was designed and whose attack, had it been made, would have had a chance of being successful.

ing the duties of a general, which were more necessary; for, besides the case of a close and furious combat which had now taken place in the suburb upon the left of the whole army, besides the attack upon the King's quarters, which was fiercely maintained in the centre, a third column of Lugros, of even superior numbers, had filed out from a more distant breach, and, marching by lanes, vineyards, and passages, known to themselves, had fallen upon the right flank of the Burgundian army who, started at that war-cry of Vive le Roi! and Dieu Monseigneur! which mingled with those of Lugros and Rouge Sanglier, and at the same time inspired, of treachery on the part of the French confederates, made a very desultory and imperfect resistance, while the Duke, leaning, and covering, and cursing his huge Lord and all that belonged to him called out to shoot with bow and gun on all that was French, whether black or white,—alluding to the device with which Louis's soldiers had designated themselves.

The arrival of the King, attended only by Le Balafre and Quentin, and half a score of Archers, created confidence between France and Burgundy. D'Hymbarcourt, Cressid, and others of the Burgundian leaders, whose names were then the praise and dread of war, rushed devotedly into the conflict, and, while some commanders hastened to bring up more distant troops, to whom the panic had not extended, others, those themselves into the tumult, re-asserted the instinct of discipline, and while the Duke toiled in the front, shouting, heaving, and howling, like an ordinary man-at-arms, brought their men by degrees into array, and dismayed the assailants by the use of their artillery. The conduct of Louis on the other hand, was that of a calm, collected, sagacious leader, who neither sought nor avoided danger, but showed so much self-possession and sagacity, that the Burgundian leaders readily obeyed the orders which he issued.

The scene was now become in the utmost degree animated and horrible. On the left the suburb, after a fierce contest, had been set on fire, and a wide and dreadful conflagration did not prevent the burning ruins from being well disputed. On the centre, the French troops, though pressed by immense odds, kept up as close and constant a fire, that the little pleasure-houses shone bright with the glancing flashes, as if surrounded with a martyr's crown of flames. On the left, the battle swayed backwards and forwards with varied success, as fresh reinforcements poured out of the town, or were brought forward from the rear of the Burgundian host; and the strife continued with unremitting fury for three mortal hours, which at length brought the dawn, so much desired by the belligerents. The enemy, at this period, seemed to be slackening their efforts upon the right and in the centre, and several discharges of cannon were heard from the last-hill.

"Go," said the King, to Le Balafre and Quentin, the instant his ear had caught the sound; "they have got up the anchors and flagons—the pleasure-houses are on fire, blessed be the Holy Virgin!—Tell Durward to move this way, but rather nearer the walls of Lugros, with all our men-at-arms, excepting what he may leave for the defence of the house, and cut in between them thick-headed Lugros on the right and the city, from which they are supplied with arrows."

The uncle and nephew galloped off to Durward and Cressid, who, used of their defiance was joyfully obeyed the summons, and, fling out at the head of a gallant body of about two hundred French gentle men, hundred arrows, and the greatest part of the chore and their followers, they had come the field, re-appearing down the enclosed the ground the flank of the large body of Lugros, by which the right of the Burgundians had been so firmly maintained. The increasing daylight discovered that the enemies were continuing to pour out from the town for the purpose of cutting off the host in the middle, or of bringing safety off the forces who were already engaged.

By Heaven! said old Cressid to Durward, "were I not certain it is then that art riding by my side, I would say I saw thee among powder barrels and baggage, marshalling and ordering them with thy

"It is Ludovic Lesly, Sire, whom we call Le Balafre," replied the old soldier.

"But is he noble?" said the Duke; "is he of gentle blood?—otherwise our promise is void."

"He is a cross ungainly piece of wood enough," said Crawford, looking at the tall, awkward, embarrassed figure of the Archer; "but I will warrant him a branch of the tree of Rothes for all that—and they have been as noble as any house in France or Burgundy, ever since it is told of their founder, that,

'Between the less-lee* and the mair,
He slew the Knight, and left him there.'"

"There is then no help for it," said the Duke, "and the fairest and richest heiress in Burgundy must be the wife of a rude mercenary soldier like this, or die secluded in a convent—and she the only child of our faithful Reginald de Croye!—I have been too rash."

And a cloud settled on his brow, to the surprise of his peers, who seldom saw him evince the slightest token of regret for the necessary consequences of an adopted resolution.

"Hold, but an instant," said the Lord Crawford, "it may be better than your Grace conjectures. Hear but what this cavalier has to say.—Speak out, man, and a murrain to thee," he added, apart to Le Balafre.

But that blunt soldier, though he could make a shift to express himself intelligibly enough to King Louis, to whose familiarity he was habituated, yet found himself incapable of enunciating his resolution before so splendid an assembly as that in presence of which he then stood; and after having turned his shoulder to the Princes, and preluded with a hoarse chuckling laugh, and two or three tremendous contortions of countenance, he was only able to pronounce the words, "Saunders Souplejaw"—and then stuck fast.

"May it please your Majesty, and your Grace," said Crawford, "I must speak for my countryman and old comrade. You shall understand, that he has had it prophesied to him by a Seer in his own land, that the fortune of his house is to be made by marriage; but as he is, like myself, something the worse for the wear,—loves the wine-house better than a lady's summer-parlour, and, in short, having some barrack tastes and likings, which would make greatness in his own person rather an encumbrance to him, he hath acted by my advice, and resigns the pretensions acquired by the fate of slaying William de la Marck, to him by whom the Wild Boar was actually brought to bay, who is his maternal nephew."

"I will vouch for that youth's services and prudence," said King Louis, overjoyed to see that fate had thrown so gallant a prize to one over whom he had some influence. "Without his prudence and vigilance, we had been ruined—It was he who made us aware of the night-sally."

"I then," said Charles, "owe him some reparation for doubting his veracity."

"And I can attest his gallantry as a man-at-arms," said Dunois.

"But," interrupted Crèveœur, "though the uncle be a Scottish gentillâtre, that makes not the nephew necessarily so."

"He is of the house of Durward," said Crawford; "descended from that Allen Durward, who was High Steward of Scotland."

"Nay, if it be young Durward," said Crèveœur, "I say no more. Fortune has declared herself on his side too plainly, for me to struggle farther with her humorous ladyship;—but it is strange, from lord to horseboy, how wonderfully these Scots stick by each other."

"Highlanders, shoulder to shoulder!" answered

* An old rhyme, by which the Leslies vindicate their descent from an ancient knight, who is said to have slain a gigantic Hungarian champion, and to have formed a proper name for himself by a play of words upon the place where he fought his adversary.

Lord Crawford, laughing at the mortification of the proud Burgundian.

"We have yet to inquire," said Charles, thoughtfully, "what the fair lady's sentiments may be towards this fortunate adventurer."

"By the mass!" said Crèveœur, "I have but too much reason to believe your Grace will find her more amenable to authority than on former occasions.—But why should I grudge this youth his preferment? since, after all, it is sense, firmness, and gallantry, which have put him in possession of WEALTH, RANK, and BEAUTY!"

I HAD already sent these sheets to the press, concluding, as I thought, with a moral of excellent tendency for the encouragement of all fair-haired, blue-eyed, long-legged, stout-hearted emigrants from my native country, who might be willing in stirring times to take up the gallant profession of Cavalier of Fortune. But a friendly monitor, one of those who like the lump of sugar which is found at the bottom of a teacup, as well as the flavour of the souchong itself, has entered a bitter remonstrance, and insists that I should give a precise and particular account of the espousals of the young heir of Glen-houlakin and the lovely Flemish Countess, and tell what tournaments were held, and how many lances were broken, upon so interesting an occasion; nor withhold from the curious reader the number of sturdy boys, who inherited the valour of Quentin Durward, and of bright damsels, in whom were renewed the charms of Isabelle de Croye. I replied in course of post, that times were changed, and public weddings were entirely out of fashion. In days, traces of which I myself can remember, not only were the "fifteen friends" of the happy pair invited to witness their union, but the bridal minstrelsy still continued, as in the "Ancient Mariner," to "nod their heads" till morning shone on them. The sack-posset was eaten in the nuptial chamber—the stocking was thrown—and the bride's garter was struggled for in presence of the happy couple whom Hymen had made one flesh. The authors of the period were laudably accurate in following its fashions. They spared you not a blush of the bride, not a rapturous glance of the bridegroom, not a diamond in her hair, not a button on his embroidered waistcoat; until at length, with Astræa, "they fairly put their characters to bed." But how little does this agree with the modest privacy which induces our modern brides—sweet bashful darlings!—to steal from pomp and plate, and admiration and flattery, and, like honest Shenstone,

"Seek for freedom at an inn!"

To these, unquestionably, an exposure of the circumstances of publicity with which a bridal in the fifteenth century was always celebrated, must appear to the highest degree disgusting. Isabelle de Croye would be ranked in their estimation far below the maid who milks, and does the meanest chores; for even she, were it in the church-porch, would reject the hand of her journeymen shoe maker, should he propose "faire des noces," as it is called on Parisian signs, instead of going down on the top of the long coach to spend the Honeymoon incognito at Deptford or Greenwich. I will not, therefore tell more of this matter, but will steal away from the wedding as Arios to from that of Angelica, leaving it to whom it may please to add farther particulars, after the fashion of their own imagination.

"Some better bard shall sing, in feudal state
How Braquemont's Castle op'd its Gothic gate,
When on the wand'ring Scot, its lovely heir Bestow'd her beauty and an earldom fair."

runous flow, if any, of the countries of Europe, improved so rapidly in wealth and cultivation as and during the last half century. Sultan Mah-Pa's owls might nevertheless have found in Calais at any town within that flourishing period, dowry of ruined villages. Accidents or local stages have, in many instances, transferred the sites of ancient hamlets, from the situations to their predecessors chose with more respect to its than convenience, to those in which their industry and commerce could more easily be carried on, and hence places which stand detached in Scottish history and which figure in of M. Phaulcon's excellent historical map, can now be discovered from the wild moor by the verdure of clover, or at best, by a few scattered, resembling patches, which mark the spot of former existence.

A little village of St. Ronan's, though it had got fallen into the state of entire disrepair we described, was, about twenty years since, fast as towards it. The situation had something in common, that it provided the pencil of every thing natural, and we will endeavour therefore, to do it in language which can scarcely be less agreeable than some of those sketches, avoiding, for reasons which seem to us of weight, to give more exact indication of the site, than that in the southern side of the Forth, and not above a mile distant from the English frontier.

A river of considerable magnitude pours its way through a narrow vale, varying in breadth two miles to a fourth of that distance, and which, composed of rich alluvial soil, is, and has long been, a fertile and well inhabited, and cultivated with all the skill of Scottish agriculture. On each side of this valley is bounded by a chain of hills, on the right in particular may be almost all mountains. Little brooks arising in these hills, and finding their way to the river, each on its little vale to the industry of the cultivator, and of them bear the large towns, which have as engaged the soil, and upon the sides of most these scattered patches and fringes of natural copse, above and around which the banks of the river, somewhat desolate in the colder time, but in summer glowing with dark purple, or with the golden lustre of the broom and heather. This is a sort of scenery peculiar to these times, which abound, like Scotland, in hills and in moor, and where the traveller is ever and anon striking in some incidents and unexpected scenes, and a more beautiful beauty, which pleases him the more that it seems to be particularly his own property.

One of these scenes, and so near its opening command the prospect of the river, the broader vale, and the opposite chain of hills, stood, and in aspect and situation have completed their still stands, the ancient and decayed village of St. Ronan's. The site was singularly picturesque, as the straggling street of the village ran up a very steep on the side of which were clustered, as it were, the cottages, the cottages which composed the place, ascending, as up the Swiss towns up the Alps, to rise above each other towards the ruins of an old castle, which continued to occupy the crest of the eminence, and the strength of which had doubtless led the neighbourhood to assemble under its walls for protection. It must, indeed, have been a place of formidable defence, for, on the side opposite to the town, its walls rose straight up from the verge of a tremendous and rocky precipice, whose base was washed by Saint Ronan's burn, as the brook was called. On the southern side, where the difficulty was less precipitous, the ground had been carefully levelled into successive terraces, which ascended to the summit of the hill, and were, or rather had been, connected by staircases of stone, rudely ornamented. In peaceful periods these terraces had been occupied by the gardens of the castle, and in times of war they added to its security, for each commanded the one immediately below it, so that they could be separately and successively defended, and all were exposed to the fire from the place itself. A massive square tower of the largest size, surrounded, as usual, by lower buildings, and a high embattled wall. On the northern side arose a considerable mountain, of which the descent that lay between the eminence on which the castle was situated formed a detached part, and which had been improved and deepened by three successive huge trenches. Another very deep trench was drawn in front of the main entrance from the east, where the principal gateway formed the termination of the street, which, as we have noticed, ascended from the village, and this last defence completed the fortifications of the tower.

In the ancient gardens of the Castle, and upon all sides of it excepting the western, which was precipitous, large old trees had found root, mantling the rock and the ancient and ruinous walls with their dark verdure, and increasing the effect of the shattered pile which towered up from the centre.

Scarcely on the threshold of this ancient pile, where the present scene had in former days, and a hundred years ago, had a complete and commanding view of the surrounding village, the houses of which, and a few scattered cottages, might seem as if they had been suddenly created in hurrying down the precipitous hill, and as if by magic in the whimsical arrangement which they now presented. It was as if a hundred years in one of Amphion's country-dances, where the notes which were to form the future Tunes were jiggling it to his lute. But, with such an observer, the melancholy excited by the desolate appearance of the village soon overcame all the lighter frolics of the imagination. Originally constructed on the humble plan used in the building of Scotch cottages about a century ago, the greater part of them had been long dismantled, and their fallen roofs, blackened gables, and ruinous walls, showed Desolation's triumph over Poverty. On some huts the rafters, varnished with soot, were still standing, in whole or in part, like skeletons, and a few, wholly or partially covered with thatch, seemed still inhabited, though scarce habitable, for the smoke of the peat-fire, which prepared the humble meal of the indwellers, stole upwards, not only from the chimneys, its regular vent, but from various other crevices in the roofs. Nature, in the mean while, always changing, but renewing as she changes, was supplying, by the power of vegetation, the fallen and decaying marks of human labour. Small pollards, which had been formerly planted around the little gardens, had now waxed into huge and high forest trees; the fruit-trees had extended their branches over the verges of the little yards, and the hedges had shot up into huge and irregular bushes; while quantities of dock, and nettles, and hemlock, hiding the ruined walls, were busily converting the whole scene of desolation into a picturesque forest-bank.

Two houses in St. Ronan's were still in something like decent repair; places essential—the one to the spiritual weal of the inhabitants, the other to the accommodation of travellers. These were the clergyman's manse, and the village inn. Of the former we need only say, that it formed no exception to the general rule by which the landed proprietors of Scotland seem to proceed in lodging their clergy, not only in the cheapest, but in the ugliest and most inconvenient house which the genius of masonry can contrive. It had the usual number of chimneys—two, namely—rising like asses' ears at either end, which answered the purpose for which they were designed as ill as usual. It had all the ordinary leaks and inlets to the fury of the elements, which usually form the subject of the complaints of a Scottish incumbent to his brethren of the presbytery; and, to complete the picture, the clergyman being a bachelor, the pigs had unimpeded admission to the garden and court-yard, broken windows were repaired with brown paper, and the disordered and equalid appearance of a low farmhouse, occupied by a bankrupt tenant, dishonoured the dwelling of one, who, besides his clerical character, was a scholar and a gentleman, though a little of a humourist.

Beside the manse stood the kirk of St. Ronan's, a little old mansion with a clay floor, and an assemblage of wretched pews, originally of carved oak, but heedfully clouted with white fir-deal. But the external form of the church was elegant in the outline, having been built in Catholic times, when we cannot deny to the forms of ecclesiastical architecture that grace, which, as good Protestants, we refuse to their doctrine. The fabric hardly raised its gray and vaulted roof among the crumbling hills of mortality by which it was surrounded, and was indeed so small in size, and so much lowered in height by the graves on the outside, which ascended half way up the low Saxon windows, that it might itself have appeared only a funeral vault, or mausoleum of larger size. Its little square tower, with the ancient belfry, alone distinguished it from such a monument. But when the gray-headed beadle turned the keys with his shaking hand, the antiquary was admitted into an ancient building, which, from the style of its architecture, and some monuments of the Mowbrays of St. Ronan's, which the old man was accustomed to point out, was generally conjectured to be as early as the thirteenth century.

These Mowbrays of St. Ronan's seem to have been at one time a very powerful family. They were allied to, and friends of the house of Douglas, at the time when the overgrown power of that heroic race made the Stewarts tremble on the Scottish throne. It followed that, when, as our old naïf historian expresses it, "no one dared to strive with a Douglas, nor yet with a Douglas's man, for if he did, he was sure to come by the waur," the family of St. Ronan's shared their prosperity, and became lords of almost the whole of the rich valley of which their mansion commanded the prospect. But upon the turning of the tide, in the reign of James II., they became despoiled of the greater part of those fair acquisitions, and succeeding events reduced their importance still farther. Nevertheless, they were, in the middle of the seventeenth century, still a family of considerable note; and Sir Reginald Mowbray, after the unhappy battle of Dunbar, distinguished himself by the obstinate defence of the Castle against the arms of Cromwell, who, incensed at the opposition which he had unexpectedly encountered in an obscure corner, caused the fortress to be dismantled and blown up with gunpowder.

After this catastrophe the old Castle was abandoned to ruin; but Sir Reginald, when, like Allan Ramsay's Sir William Worthy, he returned after the Revolution, built himself a house in the fashion of that later age, which he prudently suited in size to the diminished fortunes of his family. It was situated about the middle of the village, whose vicinity was not in those days judged any inconvenience, upon a spot of ground more level than was presented by the rest of the acclivity, where, as we said before, the houses were notched as it were into the side of the steep bank, with little more level ground about them than the spot occupied by their site. But the Laird's house had a court in front and a small garden behind, connected with another garden, which, occupying three terraces, descended, in emulation of the orchards of the old Castle, almost to the banks of the stream.

The family continued to inhabit this new message until about fifty years before the commencement of our history, when it was much damaged by a casual fire; and the Laird of the day, having just succeeded to a more pleasant and commodious dwelling at the distance of about three miles from the village, determined to abandon the habitation of his ancestors. As he cut down at the same time an ancient rookery, (perhaps to defray the expenses of the migration,) it became a common remark among the country folk, that the decay of St. Ronan's began when Laird Lawrence and the crows flew off.

The deserted mansion, however, was not consigned to owls and birds of the desert; on the contrary, for many years it witnessed more fun and festivity than when it had been the sombre abode of a grave Scottish Baron of "auld lang syne." In short, it was converted into an inn, and marked by a huge sign, representing on the one side St. Ronan catching hold of the devil's game leg with his Episcopal crook, as the story may be read in his veracious legend, and on the other the Mowbray arms. It was by far the best frequented public house in that vicinity; and a thousand stories were told of the revels which had been held within its walls, and the gambols achieved under the influence of its liquors. All this, however, had long since passed away, according to the lines in my frontispiece,

"A merry place, 'twas said, in days of yore;
But something ail'd it now,—the place was cursed."

The worthy couple (servants and favourites of the Mowbray family) who first kept the inn, had died reasonably wealthy, after long carrying on a flourishing trade, leaving behind them an only daughter. They had acquired by degrees not only the property of the inn itself, of which they were originally tenants, but of some remarkably good meadow-land by the side of the brook, which, when touched by a little pecuniary necessity, the Laids of St. Ronan's had disposed of piece-meal, as the readiest way to portion off a daughter, procure a commission for the younger son, and the like emergencies. So that Meg Dods, when she succeeded to her parents, was a considerable heiress, and, as such, had the honour of refusing three topping farmers, two bonnet-lairds, and a horse-couper, who successively made proposals to her.

Many bets were laid on the horse-couper's success, but the knowing ones were taken in. Determined to ride the fore-horse herself, Meg would admit no helpmate who might soon assert the rights of a master; and so, in single blessedness, and with the despotism of Queen Bess herself, she ruled all matters with a high hand, not only over her men-servants and maid-servants, but over the stranger within her gates, who, if he ventured to oppose Meg's sovereign will and pleasure, or desire to have either fare or accommodation different from that which she chose to provide for him, was instantly ejected with that answer which Erasmus tells us silenced all complaints in the German inns of his time, Quære aliud hospitium;* or, as Meg expressed it, "Troop aff wi' ye to another public." As this amounted to a banishment in extent equal to sixteen miles from Meg's residence, the unhappy party on whom it was passed, had no other refuge save by deprecating the wrath of his landlady, and resigning himself to her will. It is but justice to Meg Dods to state, that though hers was a severe and almost despotic government, it could not be termed a tyranny, since it was exercised, upon the whole, for the good of the subject.

The vaults of the old Laird's cellar had not, even in his own day, been replenished with more excellent wines; the only difficulty was to prevail on Meg to look for the precise liquor you chose;—to which it may be added, that she often became restiff when she thought a company had had "as much as did them good," and refused to furnish any more supplies. Then her kitchen was her pride and glory; she looked to the dressing of every dish herself, and there were some with which she suffered no one to interfere. Such were the cock-a-leeky, and the savoury minced collops, which rivalled in their way even the veal cutlets of our old friend Mrs. Hall, at Ferrybridge. Meg's table-linen, bed-linen, and so forth, were always home-made, of the best quality, and in the best order; and a weary day was that to the chambermaid in which her lynx eye discovered any neglect of the strict cleanliness which she constantly enforced. Indeed, considering Meg's country and calling, we were never able to account for her extreme and scrupulous nicety, unless by supposing that it afforded her the most apt and frequent pretext for scolding her maids; an exercise in which she displayed so much eloquence and energy, that we must needs believe it to have been a favourite one.*

We have only further to commemorate, the moderation of Meg's reckonings, which, when they closed he banquet, often relieved the apprehensions, instead of saddening the heart, of the rising guest. A shilling or breakfast, three shillings for dinner, including a pint of old port, eighteen pence for a snug supper—such were the charges of the inn of St. Ronan's, under this landlady of the olden world, even after the nineteenth century had commenced; and they were ever tendered with the pious recollection, that her good father never charged half so much, but these weary times rendered it impossible for her to make her lawing less.†

Notwithstanding all these excellent and rare properties, the inn at Saint Ronan's shared the decay of the village to which it belonged. This was owing to various circumstances. The high-road had been turned aside from the place, the steepness of the street being murder (so the postilions declared) to their ost-horses. It was thought that Meg's stern refusal to treat them with liquor, or to connive at their exchanging for porter and whisky the corn which should feed their cattle, had no small influence on the opinion of those respectable gentlemen, and that a little sitting and levelling would have made the ascent easy enough; but let that pass. This alteration of the highway was an injury which Meg did not easily forgive to the country gentlemen, most of whom she had recollected when children. "Their fathers," she said, "had not have done the like of it to a lone woman." Then the decay of the village itself, which had formerly contained a set of feuars and bonnet-urds, who, under the name of the Chirruping Club, contrived to drink twopenny, qualified with brandy or whisky, at least twice or thrice a week, was some small loss.

The temper and manners of the landlady scared away all customers of that numerous class, who will

* This circumstance shows of itself, that the Meg Dods of the tale cannot be identified with her namesake Jenny Dods, who kept the inn at Howgate, on the Peebles road; for Jenny, so different from our heroine, was unmatched as a slattern.

† This was universally the case in Scotland forty or fifty years ago; and so little was charged for a domestic's living when the author became first acquainted with the road, that a shilling or eighteen pence was sufficient board wages for a man-servant, when a crown would not now answer the purpose. It was the cause of these reasonable charges rested upon a principle equally unjust to the landlord, and inconvenient to the guest. The landlord did not expect to make any thing upon a charge for eating which his bill contained; in consideration of which, the guest was expected to drink more wine than might be convenient or agreeable to him, "for the good," as it was called, "of the house." The landlord indeed was willing to assist, in this duty, every stranger who came within his gates. Other things were in proportion. A charge for lodging, fire, and candle, was long a thing unheard of in Scotland. Shilling to the housemaid settled all such considerations. I have, from memorandums of 1790, that a young man, with two priories and a serving-lad, might travel from the house of one leg Dods to another, through most part of Scotland, for about five or six shillings a-day.

not allow originality to be an excuse for the breach of decorum, and who, little accustomed perhaps to attendance at home, love to play the great man at an inn, and to have a certain number of bows, deferential speeches, and apologies, in answer to the Good-n ye's which they bestow on the house, attendance, and entertainment. Unto those who commenced this sort of harter in the Clachan of Saint Ronan's, well could Meg Dods pay it back, in their own coin; and glad they were to escape from the house with eyes not quite scratched out, and ears not more deafened than if they had been within hearing of a pitched battle.

Nature had formed honest Meg for such encounters; and as her noble soul delighted in them, so her outward properties were in what Tony Lumpkin calls a concatenation accordingly. She had hair of a brindled colour, betwixt black and gray, which was apt to escape in elf-locks from under her mutch when she was thrown into violent agitation—long skinny hands, terminated by stout talons—gray eyes, thin lips, a robust person, a broad, though flat chest, capital wind, and a voice that could match a choir of fish-women. She was accustomed to say of herself in her more gentle moods, that her bark was worse than her bite; but what teeth could have matched a tongue, which, when in full career, is vouched to have been heard from the Kirk to the Castle of Saint Ronan's?

These notable gifts, however, had no charms for the travellers of these light and giddy-paced times, and Meg's inn became less and less frequented. What carried the evil to the uttermost was, that a fanciful lady of rank in the neighbourhood chanced to recover of some imaginary complaint by the use of a mineral well about a mile and a half from the village; a fashionable doctor was found to write an analysis of the healing waters, with a list of sundry cures; a speculative builder took land in feu, and erected lodging-houses, shops, and even streets. At length a ton-tine subscription was obtained to erect an inn, which, for the more grace, was called a hotel; and so the desertion of Meg Dods became general.*

She had still, however, her friends and well-wishers, many of whom thought, that as she was a lone woman, and known to be well to pass in the world, she would act wisely to retire from public life, and take down a sign which had no longer fascination for guests. But Meg's spirit scorned submission, direct or implied. "Her father's door," she said, "should be open to the road, till her father's bairn should be streekit and carried out at it with her feet foremost. It was not for the profit—there was little profit at it;—profit?—there was a dead loss; but she was not be-dung by any of them. They maun hae a hottle,† maun they?—and an honest public canna serve them! They may hottle that likes; but they shall see that Lucky Dods can hottle on as lang as the best of them

* In Scotland a village is erected upon a species of landright, very different from the copyhold so frequent in England. Every alienation or sale of landed property must be made in the shape of a feudal conveyance, and the party who acquires it holds thereby an absolute and perfect right of property in the fief, while he discharges the stipulations of the vassal, and, above all, pays the feu-duties. The vassal or tenant of the site of the smallest cottage holds his possession as absolutely as the proprietor, of whose large estate it is perhaps scarce a perceptible portion. By dint of excellent laws, the sasines, or deeds or delivery of such fiefs, are placed on record in such order, that every burden affecting the property can be seen for payment of a very moderate fee; so that a person proposing to lend money upon it, knows exactly the nature and extent of his security.

From the nature of these landrights being so explicit and secure, the Scottish people have been led to entertain a jealousy of building leases, of however long duration. Not long ago, a great landed proprietor took the latter mode of disposing of some ground near a thriving town in the west country. The number of years in the lease was settled at nine hundred and ninety-nine. All was agreed to, and the deeds were ordered to be drawn. But the tenant, as he walked down the avenue, began to reflect that the lease, though so very long as to be almost perpetual, nevertheless had a termination; and that after the lapse of a thousand years, lacking one, the connexion of his family and representatives with the estate would cease. He took a qualm at the thought of the loss to be sustained by his posterity a thousand years hence; and going back to the house of the gentleman who feued the ground, he demanded, and readily obtained, the additional term of fifty years to be added to the lease.

† This Gallic word (hotel) was first introduced in Scotland during the author's childhood, and was so pronounced by the lower class.

—ay, though they had made a Tamteen of it, and linkit aw their breaths of lives, whilk are in their nostrils, on end of ilk other like a string of wild-geese, and the langest liver bruick a', (whilk was sinful presumption,) she would match ilk ane of them as lang as her ain wind held out." Fortunate it was for Meg, since she had formed this doughty resolution, that although her inn had decayed in custom, her land had risen in value in a degree which more than compensated the balance on the wrong side of her books, and, joined to her usual providence and economy, enabled her to act up to her lofty purpose.

She prosecuted her trade too with every attention to its diminished income; shut up the windows of one half of her house, to baffle the tax-gatherer; retrenched her furniture; discharged her pair of post-horses, and pensioned off the old humpbacked postilion who drove them, retaining his services, however, as an assistant to a still more aged hostler. To console herself for restrictions by which her pride was secretly wounded, she agreed with the celebrated Dick Tinto to re-paint her father's sign, which had become rather undecipherable; and Dick accordingly gilded the Bishop's crook, and augmented the horrors of the Devil's aspect, until it became a terror to all the younger fry of the school-house, and a sort of visible illustration of the terrors of the arch-enemy, with which the minister endeavoured to impress their infant minds.

Under this renewed symbol of her profession, Meg Dods, or Meg Dorts, as she was popularly termed, on account of her refractory humours, was still patronised by some steady customers. Such were the members of the Killnakelty Hunt, once famous on the turf and in the field, but now a set of venerable gray-headed sportsmen, who had sunk from fox-hounds to basket-beagles and coursing, and who made an easy canter on their quiet nags a gentle induction to a dinner at Meg's. "A set of honest decent men they were," Meg said; "had their sang and their joke—and what for no? Their bind was just a Scots pint over-head, and a tappithen to the bill, and no man ever saw them the waur o't. It was thae cockle-brained callants of the present day that would be mair owerta'en with a pur quart than douce folk were with a magnum."

Then there was a set of ancient brethren of the angle from Edinburgh, who visited Saint Ronan's frequently in the spring and summer, a class of guests peculiarly acceptable to Meg, who permitted them more latitude in her premises than she was known to allow to any other body. "They were," she said, "pawky auld carles, that kend whilk side their bread was buttered upon. Ye never kend of ony o' them ganging to the spring, as they behoved to ca' the stinking well yonder.—Na, na—they were up in the morning—had their parritch, wi' maybe a thimblefull of brandy, and then awa up into the hills, eat their bit cauld meat on the heather, and came hame at e'en with the creel full of caller trouts, and had them to their dinner, and their quiet cogue of ale, and their drap punch, and were set singing their catches and glees, as they ca'd them, till ten o'clock, and then to bed, wi' God bless ye—and what for no?"

Thirdly, we may commemorate some ranting blades, who also came from the metropolis to visit Saint Ronan's, attracted by the humours of Meg, and still more by the excellence of her liquor, and the cheapness of her reckonings. These were members of the Helter Skelter Club, of the Wildfire Club, and other associations formed for the express purpose of getting rid of care and sobriety. Such dashers occasioned many a racket in Meg's house, and many a bourasque in Meg's temper. Various were the arts of flattery and violence by which they endeavoured to get supplies of liquor, when Meg's conscience told her they had had too much already. Sometimes they failed, as when the croupier of the Helter Skelter got himself scalded with the mulled wine, in an unsuccessful attempt to coax this formidable virago by a salute; and the excellent president of the Wildfire received a broken head from the keys of the cellar, as he endeavoured to possess himself of these emblems of authority. But little did these dauntless officials care for the exuberant frolics of Meg's temper, which were to them only "pretty Fanny's way"—the dulces Amarillidis iræ. And Meg, on her part, though she often called them "drunken ne'er-do-weels, and thoroughbred High-street blackguards," allowed no other person to speak ill of them in her hearing. "They were daft callants," she said, "and that was all—when the drink was in, the wit was out—ye could not put an auld head upon young shouthers—a young cowt will canter, be it up-hill or down—and what for no?" was her uniform conclusion.

Nor must we omit, among Meg's steady customers, "faithful amongst the unfaithful found," the copper-nosed sheriff-clerk of the county, who, when summoned by official duty to that district of the shire, warned by recollections of her double-brewed ale, and her generous Antigua, always advertised that his "Prieves," or "Comptis," or whatever other business was in hand, were to proceed on such a day and hour, "within the house of Margaret Dods, vintner in Saint Ronan's."

We have only farther to notice Meg's mode of conducting herself towards chance travellers, who, knowing nothing of nearer or more fashionable accommodations, or perhaps consulting rather the state of their purse than of their taste, stumbled upon her house of entertainment. Her reception of these was as precarious as the hospitality of a savage nation to sailors shipwrecked on their coast. If the guests seemed to have made her mansion their free choice—or if she liked their appearance (and her taste was very capricious)—above all, if they seemed pleased with what they got, and little disposed to criticise or give trouble, it was all very well. But if they had come to Saint Ronan's because the house at the Well was full—or if she disliked what the sailor calls the cut of their jib—or if, above all, they were critical about their accommodations, none so likely as Meg to give them what in her country is called a sloan. In fact, she reckoned such persons a part of that ungenerous and ungrateful public, for whose sake she was keeping her house open at a dead loss, and who had left her, as it were, a victim to her patriotic zeal.

Hence arose the different reports concerning the little inn of Saint Ronan's, which some favoured travellers praised as the neatest and most comfortable old-fashioned house in Scotland, where you had good attendance, and good cheer, at moderate rates; while others, less fortunate, could only talk of the darkness of the rooms, the homeliness of the old furniture, and the detestable bad humour of Meg Dods, the landlady.

Reader, if you come from the more sunny side of the Tweed—or even if, being a Scot, you have had the advantage to be born within the last twenty-five years, you may be induced to think this portrait of Queen Elizabeth, in Dame Quickly's piqued hat and green apron, somewhat overcharged in the features. But I appeal to my own contemporaries, who have known wheel-road, bridle-way, and foot path, for thirty years, whether they do not, every one of them, remember Meg Dods—or somebody very like her. Indeed, so much is this the case, that, about the period I mention, I should have been afraid to have rambled from the Scottish metropolis, in almost any direction, lest I had lighted upon some one of the sisterhood of Dame Quickly, who might suspect me of having showed her up to the public in the character of Meg Dods. At present, though it is possible that some one or two of this peculiar class of wild-cats may still exist, their talons must be much impaired by age; and I think they can do little more than sit, like the Giant Pope, in the Pilgrim's Progress, at the door of their unfrequented caverns, and grin at the pilgrims over whom they used formerly to execute their despotism.

CHAPTER II.

THE GUEST.

Quis novus hic hospis?—Dido apud Virgilium.

Cl'am-maid! The Gemman in the front parlour!

Boots's free Translation of the Bent.

It was on a fine summer's day that a solitary traveller rode under the old-fashioned archway, and alighted in the court-yard of Meg Dods's inn, and delivered the bridle of his horse to the humpbacked postilion. "Bring my saddle-bags," he said, "into the house—or stay—I am abler, I think, to carry them than you." He then assisted the poor meager groom to unbuckle the straps which secured the humble and now despised convenience, and mean time gave strict charges that his horse should be unbridled, and put into a clean and comfortable stall, the girths slacked, and a cloth cast over his loins; but that the saddle should not be removed until he himself came to see him dressed.

The companion of his travels seemed in the hostler's eye deserving of his care, being a strong active horse, fit either for the road or field, but rather high in bone from a long journey, though from the state of his skin it appeared the utmost care had been bestowed to keep him in condition. While the groom obeyed the stranger's directions, the latter, with the saddle-bags laid over his arm, entered the kitchen of the inn.

Here he found the landlady herself in none of her most blessed humours. The cook-maid was abroad on some errand, and Meg, in a close review of the kitchen apparatus, was making the unpleasant discovery, that trenchers had been broken or cracked, pots and saucepans not so accurately scoured as her precise notions of cleanliness required, which, joined to other detections of a more petty description, stirred her bile in no small degree; so that while she disarranged and arranged the bink, she maundered, in an under tone, complaints and menaces against the absent delinquent.

The entrance of a guest did not induce her to suspend this agreeable amusement—she just glanced at him as he entered, then turned her back short on him, and continued her labour and her soliloquy of lamentation. Truth is, she thought she recognised in the person of the stranger, one of those useful envoys of the commercial community, called, by themselves and the waiters, Travellers, par excellence—by others, Riders and Ragmen. Now against this class of customers Meg had peculiar prejudices; because, there being no shops in the old village of Saint Ronan's, the said commercial emissaries, for the convenience of their traffic, always took up their abode at the New Inn, or Hotel, in the rising and rival village called Saint Ronan's Well, unless when some straggler, by chance or dire necessity, was compelled to lodge himself at the Auld Town, as the place of Meg's residence began to be generally termed. She had, therefore, no sooner formed the hasty conclusion, that the individual in question belonged to this obnoxious class, than she resumed her former occupation, and continued to soliloquize and apostrophize her absent handmaidens, without even appearing sensible of his presence.

"The huzzy Beenie—the jaud Eppie—the deil's buckie of a callant!—Another plate gane—they'll break me out of house and ha'!"

The traveller, who, with his saddle-bags rested on the back of a chair, had waited in silence for some note of welcome, now saw that, ghost or no ghost, he must speak first, if he intended to have any notice from his landlady.

"You are my old acquaintance, Mrs. Margaret Dods?" said the stranger.

"What for no?—and wha are ye that speers?" said Meg, in the same breath, and began to rub a brass candlestick with more vehemence than before—the dry tone in which she spoke, indicating plainly how little concern she took in the conversation.

"A traveller, good Mistress Dods, who comes to take up his lodgings here for a day or two."

"I am thinking ye will be mista'en," said Meg; "there's nae room for bags or jaugs here—ye've mista'en your road neighbour—ye maun e'en bundle yoursell a bit farther down hill."

"I see you have not got the letter I sent you, Mistress Dods?" said the guest.

"How should I, man?" answered the hostess; "they have ta'en awa the post-office from us—moved it down till the Spa-well yonder, as they ca'd."

"Why, that is but a step off," observed the guest.

"Ye will get there the sooner," answered the hostess.

"Nay, but," said the guest, "if you had sent there for my letter, you would have learned"——

"I'm no wanting to learn ony thing at my years," said Meg. "If folk have ony thing to write to me about, they may gie the letter to John Hislop, the carrier, that has used the road these forty years. As for the letters at the post-mistress's, as they ca' her, down by yonder, they may bide in her shop-window, wi' the snaps and bawbee rows, till Beltane or I loose them. I'll never file my fingers with them. Post-mistress, indeed!—Upsetting cutty! I mind her fu' weel when she dree'd penance for ante-nup"——

Laughing, but interrupting Meg in good time for the character of the post-mistress, the stranger assured her he had sent his fishing-rod and trunk to her confidential friend the carrier, and that he sincerely hoped she would not turn an old acquaintance out of her premises, especially as he believed he could not sleep in a bed within five miles of Saint Ronan's, if he knew that her Blue room was unengaged.

"Fishing-rod!—Auld acquaintance!—Blue room!" echoed Meg, in some surprise; and, facing round upon the stranger, and examining him with some interest and curiosity,—“Ye'll be nae bag-man, then, after a'?"

"No," said the traveller; "not since I have laid the saddle-bags out of my hand."

"Weel, I canna say but I am glad of that—I canna abide their yanking way of knapping English at every word.—I have kent decent lads amang them too—What for no?—But that was when they stopped up here whiles, like other dounce folk; but since they gaed down, the hail flight of them, like a string of wild-geese, to the new-fashioned hottle yonder, I am told there are as many hellicate tricks played in the travellers' room, as they behove to call it, as if it were fu' of drunken young lairds."

"That is because they have not you to keep good order amang them, Mistress Margaret."

"Ay, lad?" replied Meg, "ye are a fine blaw-in-my-lug, to think to cuittle me off sae cleverly!" And, facing about upon her guest, she honoured him with a more close and curious investigation than she had at first designed to bestow upon him.

All that she remarked was in her opinion rather favourable to the stranger. He was a well-made man, rather above than under the middle size, and apparently betwixt five-and-twenty and thirty years of age—for, although he might, at first glance, have passed for one who had attained the latter period, yet, on a nearer examination, it seemed as if the burning sun of a warmer climate than Scotland, and perhaps some fatigue, both of body and mind, had imprinted the marks of care and of manhood upon his countenance, without abiding the course of years. His eyes and teeth were excellent, and his other features, though they could scarce be termed handsome, expressed sense and acuteness; he bore, in his aspect, that ease and composure of manner, equally void of awkwardness and affectation, which is said emphatically to mark the gentleman; and, although neither the plainness of his dress, nor the total want of the usual attendants, allowed Meg to suppose him a wealthy man, she had little doubt that he was above the rank of her lodgers in general. Amidst these observations, and while she was in the course of making them, the good landlady was embarrassed with various obscure recollections of having seen the object of them formerly; but when, or on what occasions she was quite unable to call to remembrance. She was particularly puzzled by the cold and sarcastic expression of a countenance, which she could not by any means reconcile with the recollections which it awakened. At length she said, with as much courtesy as she was capable of assuming,—“Either I have seen you before, sir, or some ane very like ye?—Ye ken the Blue room, too, and you a stranger in these parts?"

"Not so much a stranger as you may suppose, Meg," said the guest, assuming a more intimate tone, "when I call myself Frank Tyrrel."

"Tirl!" exclaimed Meg, with a tone of wonder—

It's impossible! You cannot be Francie Tirl, the wild callant that was fishing and bird-nesting here seven or eight years syne—it canna be—Francie was but a callant!"

"But add seven or eight years to that boy's life, Meg," said the stranger gravely, "and you will find you have the man who is now before you."

"Even sae!" said Meg, with a glance at the reflection of her own countenance in the copper coffee-pot, which she had scoured so brightly that it did the office of a mirror—"Just e'n sae—but folk maun grow auld or die.—But, Maister Tirl, for I mauna ca' ye Francie now, I am thinking"——

"Call me what you please, good dame," said the stranger; "it has been so long since I heard any one call me by a name that sounded like former kindness, that such a one is more agreeable to me than a lord's title would be."

"Weel, then, Maister Francie—if it be no offence to you—I hope ye are no a Nabob?"

"Not I, I can safely assure you, my old friend;—but what an I were?"

"Naething—only maybe I might bid ye gang farther, and be waur served.—Nabobs, indeed! the country's plagued wi' them. They have raised the price of eggs and pootry for twenty miles round—But what is my business?—They use amais a' of them the Well down by—they need it, ye ken, for the clearing of their copper complexions, that need scouring as much as my saucepans, that naeboddy can clean but mysell."

"Well, my good friend," said Tyrrel, "the upshot of all this is, I hope, that I am to stay and have dinner here?"

"What for no?" replied Mrs. Dods.

"And that I am to have the Blue room for a night or two—perhaps longer?"

"I dinna ken that," said the dame.—"The Blue room is the best—and they that get neist best, are no ill off in this world."

"Arrange it as you will," said the stranger, "I leave the whole matter to you, mistress.—Mean time, I will go see after my horse."

"The merciful man," said Meg, when her guests had left the kitchen, "is merciful to his beast.—He had aye something about him by ordinar, that callant—But eh, sirs! there is a sair change on his cheek-haffit since I saw him last!—He sail no want a good dinner for auld lang syne, that I've engage for."

Meg set about the necessary preparations with all the natural energy of her disposition, which was so much exerted upon her culinary cares, that her two maids, on their return to the house, escaped the bitter reprimand which she had been previously conning over, in reward for their alleged slatternly negligence. Nay, so far, did she carry her complaisance, that when Tyrrel crossed the kitchen to recover his saddle-bags, she formally rebuked Eppie for an idle taupie, for not carrying the gentleman's things to his room.

"I thank you, mistress," said Tyrrel; "but I have some drawings and colours in these saddle-bags, and I always like to carry them myself."

"Ay, and are you at the painting trade yet?" said Meg; "an unco slaister ye used to make with it lang syne."

"I cannot live without it," said Tyrrel; and taking the saddle-bags, was formally inducted by the maid into a snug apartment, where he soon had the satisfaction to behold a capital dish of minced collops, with vegetables, and a jug of excellent ale, placed on the table by the careful hand of Meg herself. He could do no less, in acknowledgment of the honour, than ask Meg for a bottle of the yellow-seal, "if there was any of that excellent claret still left."

"Left?—ay is there, walth of it," said Meg; "I dinna gie it to every body—Ah! Maister Tirl, ye have not got ower your auld tricks!—I am sure, if ye are painting for your leeving, as you say, a little rum and water would come cheaper, and do ye as much good. But ye maun hae your ain way the day, nae doubt, if ye should never have it again."

Away trudged Meg, her keys clattering as she went, and, after much rummaging, returned with such a bottle of claret as no fashionable tavern could have produced, were it called for by a duke, or at a duke's price; and she seemed not a little gratified when her guest assured her that he had not yet forgotten its excellent flavour. She retired after these acts of hospitality, and left the stranger to enjoy in quiet the excellent matters which she had placed before him.

But there was that on Tyrrel's mind which defied the enlivening power of good cheer and of wine, which only maketh man's heart glad when that heart has no secret oppression to counteract its influence. Tyrrel found himself on a spot which he had loved in that delightful season, when youth and high spirits awaken all those flattering promises which are so ill kept to manhood. He drew his chair into the embrasure of the old-fashioned window, and throwing up the sash to enjoy the fresh air, suffered his thoughts to return to former days, while his eyes wandered over objects which they had not looked upon for several eventful years. He could behold beneath his eye, the lower part of the decayed village, as its ruins peeped from the umbrageous shelter with which they were shrouded. Still lower down, upon the little holm which formed its church-yard, was seen the Kirk of Saint Ronan's; and looking yet farther, towards the junction of Saint Ronan's burn with the river which traversed the larger dale or valley, he could see whitened, by the western sun, the rising houses, which were either newly finished, or in the act of being built, about the medicinal spring.

"Time changes all around us," such was the course of natural though trite reflection, which flowed upon Tyrrel's mind; "wherefore should loves and friendships have a longer date than our dwellings and our monuments?" As he indulged these sombre recollections, his officious landlady disturbed their tenour by her entrance.

"I was thinking to offer you a dish of tea, Maister Francie, just for the sake of auld lang syne, and I'll gar the quean Beenie bring it here, and make it mysell.—But ye arena done with your wine yet?"

"I am indeed, Mrs. Dods," answered Tyrrel; "and I beg you will remove the bottle."

"Remove the bottle, and the wine no half drank out!" said Meg, displeasure lowering on her brow; "I hope there is nae fault to be found wi' the wine, Maister Tirl?"

To this answer, which was put in a tone resembling defiance, Tyrrel submissively replied, by declaring "the claret not only unexceptionable, but excellent."

"And what for dinna ye drink it, then?" said Meg sharply; "folk should never ask for mair liquor than they can make a gude use of. Maybe ye think we have the fashion of the table-dot, as they ca' them newfangled ordinary down-by yonder, where a' the bits of vinegar cructs are put awa into an awmry, as they tell me, and ilk ane wi' the bit dribbles of syneings in it, and a paper about the neck o't, to show which of the custoiners is aught it—there they stand like doctor's dros—and no an honest Scottish mitch-kin will ane o' their viols haud, granting it were at the fouest."

"Perhaps," said Tyrrel, willing to indulge the spleen and prejudice of his old acquaintance, "perhaps the wine is not so good as to make full measure desirable."

"Ye may say that, lad—and yet them that sell it might afford a gude penniworth, for they hae it for the making—maist feck of it ne'er saw France or Portugal. But as I was saying—this is no ane of their newfangled places, where wine is put by for them that canna drink it—when the cork's drawn the bottle maun be drank out—and what for no?—unless it be corkit."

"I agree entirely, Meg," said her guest; "but my ride to-day has somewhat heated me—and I think the dish of tea you promise me, will do me more good than to finish my bottle."

"Na, then, the best I can do for you is to put it by, to be sauce for the wild-duck the morn; for I think ye said ye were to bide here for a day or twa."

"It is my very purpose, Meg, unquestionably," replied Tyrrel.

"Sae be it then," said Mrs. Dods; "and then the liquor's no lost—it has been seldom sic claret as that has simmered in a saucepan, let me tell you that, neighbour;—and I mind the day, when, headach or nae headach, ye wad hae been at the hinder-end of that bottle, and may be anither, if ye could have gotten it wiled out of me. But then ye had your cousin to help you—Ah! he was a blithe bairn that Valentine Bulmer!—Ye were a canty callant too, Maister Francie, and muckle ado I had to keep ye baith in order when ye were on the ramble. But ye were a thought doucer than Valentine—But O! he was a bonny laddie!—wi' e'en like diamonds, cheeks like roses, a head like a heather-tap—he was the first I ever saw wear a crap, as they ca' it, but a' body cheats the barber now—and he had a laugh that wad hae raised the dead!—What wi' flyting on him, and what wi' laughing at him, there was nae minding ony other body when that Valentine was in the house. —And how is your cousin Valentine Bulmer, Maister Francie?"

Tyrrel looked down, and only answered with a sigh.

"Ay—and is it even sae?" said Meg; "and has the puir bairn been sae soon removed frae this fashious warld?—Ay—ay—we maun a' gang ae gate—crackit quart-stoups and geisen'd barrels—leaky quaighs are we a', and canna keep in the liquor of life—Ohon, sirs!—Was the puir lad Bulmer frae Bu'mer bay, where they land the Hollands, think ye, Maister Francie?—They whiles rin in a pickle tea there too—I hope that is good that I have made you, Maister Francie?"

"Excellent, my good dame," said Tyrrel; but it was in a tone of voice which intimated that she had pressed upon a subject that awakened some unpleasant reflections.

"And when did this puir lad die?" continued Meg, who was not without her share of Eve's qualities, and wished to know something concerning what seemed to affect her guest so particularly; but he disappointed her purpose, and at the same time awakened another train of sentiment in her mind, by turning again to the window, and looking upon the distant buildings of Saint Ronan's Well. As if he had observed for the first time these new objects, he said to Mistress Dods in an indifferent tone, "You have got some gay new neighbours yonder, mistress."

"Neighbours!" said Meg, her wrath beginning to arise, as it always did upon any allusion to this sore subject—"Ye may ca' them neighbours, if ye like—but the deil flee awa wi' the neighbourhood for Meg Dods!"

"I suppose," said Tyrrel, as if he did not observe her displeasure, "that yonder is the Fox Hotel they told me of?"

"The Fox!" said Meg: "I am sure it is the fox that has carried off a' my geese.—I might shut up house, Maister Francie, if it was the thing I lived by—me, that has seen a' our gentlefolk bairns, and gien them snaps and sugar-biscuit maist of them wi' my ain hand! They wad hae seen my father's roof-tree fa' down and smoor me before they wad hae gien a boddle a-piece to have propped it up—but they could a' link out their fifty pounds ower head to bigg a hottle at the Well yonder. And muckle they hae made o't—the bankrupt body, Sandie Lawson, hasna paid them a bawbee of four terms' rent."

"Surely, mistress, I think if the Well became so famous for its cures, the least the gentlemen could have done was to make you the priestess."

"Me priestess! I am nae Quaker, I wot, Maister Francie; and I never heard of a wif that turned preacher, except Luckie Buchan in the west.* And if I were to preach, I think I have mair the spirit of a Scottishwoman, than to preach in the very room they hae been dancing in ilka night in the week, Saturday itself not excepted, and that till twal o'clock at night. Na, na, Maister Francie; I leave the like o' that to Mr. Simon Chatterly, as they ca' the bit prelatical sprig of divinity from the town yonder, that plays at cards and dances six days in the week, and on the seventh reads the Common Prayer-book in the ball-room, with Tam Simson, the drunken barber, for his clerk."

"I think I have heard of Mr. Chatterly," said Tyrrel.

"Ye'll be thinking o' the sermon he has printed," said the angry dame, "where he compares their nasty puddle of a Well yonder to the pool of Bethesda, like a foul-mouthed, fleeching, feather-headed fule as he is! He should hae kend that the place got a' its fame in the times of black Popery; and though they pat it in St. Ronan's name, I'll never believe for one that the honest man had ony hand in it; for I hae been tell'd by ane that suld ken, that he was nae Roman, but only a Cuddie, or Culdee, or such like.—But will ye not take anither dish of tea, Maister Francie? and a wee bit of the diet-loaf, raised wi' my ain fresh butter, Maister Francie? and no wi' greasy kitchen-foe, like the seedcake down at the confectioner's yonder, that has as mony dead flees as carvy in it. Set him up for a confectioner!—Wi' a penniworth of rye-meal, and anither of tryacle, and twa or three carvy-seeds, I will make better confections than ever cam out of his oven."

"I have no doubt of that, Mrs. Dods," said the guest; "and I only wish to know how these new comers were able to establish themselves against a house of such good reputation and old standing as yours?—It was the virtues of the mineral, I dare say; but how came the waters to recover a character all at once, mistress?"

"I dinna ken, sir—they used to be thought good for naething, but here and there for a puir body's bairn, that had gotten the cruella,* and could not afford a penniworth of salts. But my leddy Penelope Penfeather had fa'an ill, it's like, as nae other body ever fell ill, and sae she was to be cured some gate naebody was ever cured, which was naething mair than was reasonable—and my leddy, ye ken, has wit at wull, and has a' the wise folk out from Edinburgh at her house at Windywa's yonder, which it is her leddyship's wull and pleasure to call Air-castle—and they have a' their different turns, and some can clunk verses, wi' their tale, as weel as Rob Burns or Allan Ramsay—and some rin up hill and down dale, knapping the chucky stanes to pieces wi' hammers, like sae mony road-makers run daft—they say it is to see how the warld was made!—and some that play on all manner of ten-stringed instruments—and a wheen sketching souls, that ye may see perched like crows on every craig in the country, e'en working at your ain trade, Maister Francie; forby men that had been in foreign parts, or said they had been there, whilk is a' ane, ye ken; and maybe twa or three draggletailed misses, that wear my Leddy Penelope's follies when she has dune wi' them, as her queans of maids wear her second-hand claithes. So, after her leddyship's happy recovery, as they ca'd it, down cam the hail tribe of wild-geese, and settled by the Well, to dine thereout on the bare grund, like a wheen tinklers; and they had sangs, and tunes, and healths, nae doubt, in praise of the fountain, as they ca'd the Well, and of Leddy Penelope Penfeather; and, lastly, they behoved a' to take a solemn bumper of the spring, which, as I'm tauld, made unco havoc amang them or they wan hame; and this they ca'd picknick, and a plague to them! And sae the jig was begun after her leddyship's pipe, and mony a mad measure has been danced sin' syne; for down cam masons and murgeon-makers, and preachers and player-folk, and Episcopalians and Methodists, and fools and fiddlers, and Papists and pie-bakers, and doctors and drugsters; by the shop folk, that sell trash and trumpery at three prices—and so up got the bonny new Well, and down fell the honest auld town of Saint Ronan's, where blithe decent folk had been heartsome eneugh for mony a day before ony o' them were born, or ony sic vapouring fancies kitted in their cracked brains."

"What said your landlord, the Laird of Saint Ronan's, to all this?" said Tyrrel.

"Is't my landlord ye are asking after, Maister Francie?—the Laird of Saint Ronan's is nae landlord of mine, and I think ye might hae minded that.—Na, na, thanks be to Praise! Meg Dods is baith landlord and landlady. Ill enough to keep the doors open as it is, let be facing Whitsunday and Martinmas—an auld leather pock there is, Maister Francie, in aye of worthy Maister Bindloose the sheriff-clerk's pigeon-holes, in his dowcot of a closet in the burgh; and therein is baith charter and sasine, and special service to boot; and that will be chapter and verse, speer when ye list."

* The foundress of a sect called Buchanites; a species of Joanna Southcote, who long after death was expected to return and head her disciples on the road to Jerusalem.

"I had quite forgotten," said Tyrrel, "that the inn was your own; though I remember you were a considerable landed proprietor."

"Maybe I ain," replied Meg, "maybe I am not; and if I be, what for no?—But as to what the Laird, whose grandfather was my father's landlord, said to the new doings yonder—he just jumped at the ready penny, like a cock at a grosert, and feu'd the bonny holm beside the Well, that they ca'd the Saint-Well-holm, that was like the best land in his aught, to be carved, and biggit, and howkit up, just at the pleasure of Jock Ashler the stane-mason, that ca's himself an arkiteck—there's nae living for new words in this new warld neither, and that is another vex to auld folk such as me.—It's a shame o' the young Laird, to let his auld patrimony gang the gate it's like to gang, and my heart is sair to see't, though it has but little cause to care what comes of him or his."

"Is it the same Mr. Mowbray," said Mr. Tyrrel, "who still holds the estate?—the old gentleman, you know, whom I had some dispute with?"

"About hunting moorfowl upon the Spring-well-head inuirs?" said Meg. "Ah, lad! honest Mr. Bindloose brought you neatly off there—No, it's no that honest man, but his son John Mowbray—the t'other has slept down-by in Saint Ronan's Kirk for these six or seven years."

"Did he leave," asked Tyrrel, with something of a faltering voice, "no other child than the present Laird?"

"No other son," said Meg; "and there's e'en enough, unless he could have left a better aye."

"He died then," said Tyrrel, "excepting this son, without children?"

"By your leave, no," said Meg; "there is the lassie Miss Clara, that keeps house for the Laird, if it can be ca'd keeping house, for he is almost aye down at the Well yonder—so a sma' kitchen serves them at the Shaws."

"Miss Clara will have but a dull time of it there during her brother's absence?" said the stranger.

"Out no!—he has her aften jinketing about, and back and forward, wi' a' the fine flichtering fools that come yonder; and clapping palms wi' them, and linking at their dances and daffings. I wuss nae ill come o't, but it's a shame her father's daughter should keep company wi' a' that scauff and raff of phisic-students, and writers' prentices, and bagmen, and siclike trash as are down at the Well yonder."

"You are severe, Mrs. Dods," replied the guest. "No doubt Miss Clara's conduct deserves all sort of freedom."

"I am saying naething against her conduct," said the dame; "and there's nae ground to say ony thing that I ken of—But I wad hae like draw to like, Maister Francie. I never quarrelled the ball that the gentry used to hae at my bit house a gude wheen years bygane—when they came, the auld folk in their coaches, wi' lang-tailed black horses, and a wheen galliard gallants on their hunting horses, and mony a decent ledly behind her ain goodman, and mony a bonny smirking lassie on her pownie, and wha sae happy as they—And what for no? And then there was the farmers' ball, wi' the tight lads of yeomen with the bran new blues and the buckskins—These were decent meetings—but then they were a' ae man's bairns that were at them, ilk aye kend ilk other—they danced farmers wi' farmers' daughters, at the tane, and gentles wi' gentles blood, at the t'other, unless maybe when some of the gentlemen of the Killnakelty Club would gie me a round of the floor myself, in the way of daffing and fun, and me no able to flyte on them for laughing—I am sure I never grudged these innocent pleasures, although it has cost me maybe a week's redding up, before I got the better of the confusion."

"But, dame," said Tyrrel, "this ceremonial would be a little hard upon strangers like myself, for how were we to find partners in these family parties of yours?"

"Never you fash your thumb about that, Maister Francie," returned the landlady, with a knowing wink.—"Every Jack will find a Jill, gang the world as it may—and, at the warst o't, better hae some fashery in finding a partner for the night, than get yoked with aye that you may not be able to shake off the morn."

"And does that sometimes happen?" asked the stranger.

"Happen!—and is't among the Well folk that ye mean?" exclaimed the hostess. "Was it not the last season, as they ca't, no further gane, that young Sir Bingo Binks, the English lad wi' the red coat, that keeps a mail-coach, and drives it himsell, gat cleekit with Miss Rachel Bonnyrigg, the auld Leddy Loup-engirth's lang-legged daughter—and they danced sa' lang thegither, that there was mair said than fald hae been said about it—and the lad would fain hae louped back, but the auld ledly held him to his tackle, and the Commissary Court and somebody else made her Leddy Binks in spite of Sir Bingo's heart—and he has never daured take her to his friends in England, but they have just wintered and summered it at the Well ever since—and that is what the Well is good for!"

"And does Clara,—I mean does Miss Mowbray, keep company with such women as these?" said Tyrrel, with a tone of interest which he checked as he proceeded with the question.

"What can she do, puir thing?" said the dame.

"She maun keep the company that her brother keeps, for she is clearly dependent.—But, speaking of that, I ken what I have to do, and that is no little, before it darkens. I have sat clavering with you ower lang, Maister Francie."

And away she marched with a resolved step, and soon the clear octaves of her voice were heard in shrill admonition to her handmaidens.

Tyrrel paused a moment in deep thought, then took his hat, paid a visit to the stable, where his horse saluted him with feathering ears, and that low amicable neigh, with which that animal acknowledges the approach of a loving and beloved friend. Having seen that the faithful creature was in every respect attended to, Tyrrel availed himself of the continued and lingering twilight, to visit the old Castle, which, upon former occasions, had been his favourite evening walk. He remained while the light permitted, admiring the prospect we attempted to describe in the first chapter, and comparing, as in his former reverie, the faded hues of the glimmering landscape to those of human life, when early youth and hope have ceased to gild them.

A brisk walk to the inn, and a light supper on a Welsh rabbit and the dame's home-brewed, were stimulants of livelier, at least more resigned thoughts—and the Blue bedroom, to the honours of which he had been promoted, received him a contented if not a cheerful tenant.

CHAPTER III.

ADMINISTRATION.

There must be government in all society—
Bees have their Queen, and stag-herds have their leader;
Rome had her Consuls, Athens had her Archons,
And we, sir, have our Managing Committee.

The Album of St. Ronan's

FRANCIS TYRREL was, in the course of the next day, formally settled in his old quarters, where he announced his purpose of remaining for several days. The old-established carrier of the place brought his fishing-rod and travelling-trunk, with a letter to Meg, dated a week previously, desiring her to prepare to receive an old acquaintance. This annunciation, though something of the latest, Meg received with great complacency, observing it was a civil attention in Maister Tirl; and that John Hialop, though he was not just sae fast, was far surer than any post of them a', or express either. She also observed with satisfaction, that there was no gun-case along with her guest's baggage; "for that weary gunning had brought him and her into trouble—the lards had cried out upon't, as if she made her house a howff for common fowlers and poachers; and yet how could she hinder twa daft hempie callants from taking a start and an over-loup?*" They had been ower the neighbour's ground they had leave on up to the march, and they weren't just to ken meiths when the moortowl got up."

In a day or two, her guest fell into such quiet and solitary habits, that Meg, herself the most restless and bustling of human creatures, began to be vexed, for want of the trouble which she expected to have had with him, experiencing, perhaps, the same sort of feeling from his extreme and passive indifference on all points, that a good horseman has for the over-patient steed, which he can scarce feel under him. His walks were devoted to the most solitary recesses among the neighbouring woods and hills—his fishing-rod was often left behind him, or carried merely as an apology for sauntering slowly by the banks of some little brooklet—and his success so indifferent, that Meg said the piper of Perblest would have caught a creelfu' before Maister Francie made out the half-dozen; so that he was obliged, for peace's sake, to vindicate his character, by killing a handsome salmon.

Tyrrel's painting, as Meg called it, went on equally slowly: He often, indeed, showed her the sketches which he brought from his walks, and used to finish at home; but Meg held them very cheap. What signified, she said, a wheen bits of paper, wi' black and white scarts upon them, that he ca'd bushes, and trees, and craigs?—Couldna he paint them wi' green, and blue, and yellow, like the other folk? "Ye will never mak your bread that way, Maister Francie. Ye suld munt up a muckle square of canvass, like Dick Tinto, and paint folks ainsells, that they like muckle better to see than any craig in the hail water; and I wadna muckle object even to some of the Wallers coming up and sitting to ye. They waste their time waur, I wis—and, I warrant, ye might make a guinea a-head of them. Dick made twa, but he was an auld used hand, and folk mann creep before they gang."

In answer to these remonstrances, Tyrrel assured her, that the sketches with which he busied himself were held of such considerable value, that very often an artist in that line received much higher remuneration for these, than for portraits or coloured drawings. He added, that they were often taken for the purpose of illustrating popular poems, and hinted as if he himself were engaged in some labour of that nature.

Eagerly did Meg long to pour forth to Nelly Trotter, the fishwoman,—whose cart formed the only neutral channel of communication between the Auld Town and the Well, and who was in favour with Meg, because, as Nelly passed her door in her way to the Well, she always had the first choice of her fish,—the merits of her lodger as an artist. Luckie Dods had, in truth, been so much annoyed and bullied, as it were, with the report of clever persons, accomplished in all sorts of excellence, arriving day after day at the Hotel, that she was overjoyed in this fortunate opportunity to triumph over them in their own way; and it may be believed, that the excellences of her lodger lost nothing by being trumpeted through her mouth.

"I maun hae the best of the cart, Nelly—if you and me can gee—for it is for aye of the best of painters. Your fine folk down yonder would gie their lugs to look at what he has been doing—he gets gowd in goupins, for three downright skarts and three cross anes—And he is no an ungrateful loon, like Dick Tinto, that had nae sooner my good five-and-twenty shillings in his pocket than he gaed down to birl it awa at their bonny hottle yonder, but a decent quiet lad, that kens when he is weel aff, and bides still at the auld howff—And what for no?—Tell them all this, and h'ar what they will say till't."

"Indeed, mistress, I can tell ye that already, without stirring my shanks for the matter," answered Nelly Trotter; "they will e'en say that ye are ae auld fule, and me anither, that may hae some judgment in cock-bree or in scate-ripples, but mauna fash our beads about ony thing else."

"Wad they say sae, the frontless villains! and me been a housekeeper this thirty year!" exclaimed Meg; "I wadna hae them say it to my face! But I am no speaking without warrant—for what an I had spoken to the minister, lass, and shown him aye of the loose skarts of paper that Maister Tirl leaves flieing about his room?—and what an he had said he had kend Lord Bidmore gie five guineas for the waur on't? and a' the world kens he was lang tutor in the Bidmore family."

"Troth," answered her gossip, "I doubt if I was to tell a' this they would hardly believe me, mistress; for there are sae mony judges among them, and they think sae muckle of themsells, and sae little of other folk, that unless ye were to send down the bit picture, I am no thinking they will believe a word that I can tell them."

"No believe what an honest woman says—let abee to say twa o' them!" exclaimed Meg; "O the unbelieving generation!—Weel, Nelly, since my back is up, ye sall tak down the picture, or sketching, or whatever it is, (though I thought sketchers* were aye made of air,) and shame wi' it the conceited crew that they are.—But see and bring't back wi' ye again, Nelly, for it's a thing of value; and trustna it out o' your hand, that I charge you, for I lippen no muckle to their honesty. And Nelly, ye may tell them he has an illustrated poem—illustrated—nund the word, Nelly—that is to be stuck as fou o' the like o' that, as ever turkey was larded wi' dabs o' bacon."

Thus furnished with her credentials, and acting the part of a herald betwixt two hostile countries, honest Nelly switched her little fish-cart downwards to St. Ronan's Well.

In watering-places, as in other congregated assemblies of the human species, various kinds of government have been dictated, by chance, caprice, or convenience; but in almost all of them, some sort of direction has been adopted, to prevent the consequences of anarchy. Sometimes the sole power has been vested in a Master of Ceremonies; but this, like other despotisms, has been of late unfashionable, and the powers of this great officer have been much limited even at Bath, where Nash once ruled with undisputed supremacy. Committees of management, chosen from among the most steady guests, have been in general resorted to, as a more liberal mode of sway, and to such was confided the administration of the infant republic of St. Ronan's Well. This little senate, it must be observed, had the more difficult task in discharging their high duties, that, like those of other republics, their subjects were divided into two jarring and contending factions, who every day cat, drank, danced, and made merry together, hating each other all the while with all the animosity of political party, endeavouring by every art to secure the adherence of each guest who arrived, and ridiculing the absurdities and follies of each other, with all the wit and bitterness of which they were masters.

At the head of one of these parties was no less a personage than Lady Penelope Penfeather, to whom the establishment owed its fame, nay, its existence; and whose influence could only have been balanced by that of the Lord of the Manor, Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's, or, as he was called usually by the company who affected what Meg called knapping English, The Squire, who was leader of the opposite faction.

The rank and fortune of the lady, her pretensions to beauty as well as talent, (though the former was something faded,) and the consequence which she arrogated to herself as a woman of fashion, drew round her painters and poets, and philosophers, and men of science, and lecturers, and foreign adventurers, et hoc genus omne.

On the contrary, the Squire's influence, as a man of family and property in the immediate neighbourhood, who actually kept greyhounds and pointers, and at lynes talked of hunting and of roams, encouraged him the support of the whole class of bucks, half and whole bred, from the three best countries, and if more inducements were wanting, he could grant his favourite the privilege of shooting over his moors, which is enough to turn the head of a young Scotchman at any time. Mr. Moschey was of late especially supported in his pre-eminence by a close alliance with Sir Hugo Burke, a sagacious English Baronet, who, although as many thought to return to his own country had not been down at the Well of St. Roman & to enjoy the blessing which the Calistonian Hymn had so kindly bestowed on him in the person of Miss Martha Ramsden. As this gentleman actually drove a regular bait me, much not in any respect differing from that of his Majesty only that it was more frequently overruled by influence with a certain set was irresistible, and the issue of St. Roman's, having the better sense of the two, contrived to reap the full benefit of the consequence attached to his friendship.

These two contending parties were so equally balanced, that the predominance of the influence of either was often determined by the course of the sun. Thus, in the morning and forenoon, when Lady Penelope led forth her herd to lawn and shady tower, whether to visit some retired monument of ancient times, or out there for the luncheon, to spoil good paper with bad drawings, and good voices with repetition—in a word, her ladyship's empire over the language seemed uncontested and absolute, and all things were engaged in the servitude, of which she formed the pivot and centre. Even the hunters and shooters, and hard drinkers, were sometimes fain reluctantly to follow in her train, seeking and quizzing, and flouting at her solemn lectures, besides encouraging the younger nymphs to guide when they should have looked on. But after dinner the scene was changed and her ladyship's sweetest smiles, and softer looks, were often manifested to draw the natural part of the company to the tea room, so that her society was reduced to those whose constitution or finances rendered early retirement from the dining parlour a matter of convenience, together with the more devoted and ardent of her own immediate dependents and adherents. Even the faith of the latter was apt to be debauched. Her ladyship's parlour was, in whose behalf she was lending each new combat for subscription, got sufficiently independent to sing in her ladyship's presence at supper a song of rather equivocal meaning, and her chief painter, who was employed upon an illustrious copy of the Loves of the Plants, was, at another time induced into such a state of fervour, that, upon her ladyship's administering her usual dose of criticism upon his works, he not only bluntly disputed her judgment, but talked something of his right to be treated like a gentleman.

"To rave, roasts, and wander round the land,"

These frays were taken up by the Managing Committee, who attended for the present affairs on the following morning and obtained their respective triumphs in Lady Penelope's good graces, upon moderate terms. Many other acts of moderating authority they performed, much to the assuaging of faction, and the want of the Wellers, and so essential was their government to the prosperity of the place, that, without them, St. Roman's spring would probably have been speedily deserted. We must, therefore, give a brief sketch of that potent Committee, which both forges, acting as if on a self-drawing ordnance, had combined to invent with the reins of government.

Each of its members appeared to be selected, as Purson, in the fury tale chose his followers, for his peculiar gifts. First on the list stood the Man of Medicine, Dr. Quoniam Quackleton, who claimed right to regulate medical matters at the spring, upon the principle which, of old, assigned the property of a newly discovered country to the barbarian who committed the earliest piracy on its shores. The acknowledgment of the Doctor's merit, as having been first to proclaim and vindicate the merits of these healing waters, had occasioned his being universally installed First Physician and Man of Science, which last qualification he could apply to all purposes, from the healing of an eye to the giving a lecture. He was indeed, qualified, like many of his profession, to spread both the bane and antidote before a dyspeptic patient, being as knowing a gastronome as Dr. Keppel himself, or any other worthy physician who has written for the benefit of the cuisine, from Dr. Mead of Tipperary to the late Dr. Hunter of York, and the present Dr. Eschsch of London. His pleasures are always medicinal, and therefore the Doctor patiently relinquished the office of caterer and head-carver to the Man of Taste, who occupied regularly and as of office, the head of the table, reserving to himself the occasional privilege of entertaining, and a principal share in conducting the good things which the common entertainment afforded. We have only to add up this brief account of the learned Dames, by informing the reader that he was a tall, beetle-browed man, with an ill-made black scratch-wig, that stood out on either side from his temples, as large as Sir John Falstaff's. In his heyday he had a small estate, which he had spent like a gentleman, by mixing with the gay world. He was, in short, one of those respectable bobs that contrast the customs of the present day with those of the last age, and could compare in his own experience the follies of both. In latter days, he had sense enough to extricate himself from his course of dissipation, though with impaired health and impoverished fortune.

First in place, though perhaps second to the Doctor in real authority, was Mr. Waterbushum, a tall and out of person, who was rarely precise in his address, wore his hair curl, and dressed with powder, but whose buckles set with flannel stockings, and a waist as large as Sir John Falstaff's. In his heyday he had a small estate, which he had spent like a gentleman, by mixing with the gay world. He was, in short, one of those respectable bobs that contrast the customs of the present day with those of the last age, and could compare in his own experience the follies of both. In latter days, he had sense enough to extricate himself from his course of dissipation, though with impaired health and impoverished fortune.

Mr. Waterbushum now lived upon a moderate annuity, and had discovered a way of swamping his economy with much company and made dinner by acting as perpetual president of the table of the Well. Here he used to amuse the society by telling stories about Garrick, Foote, Hamlet Thwaite, and Lord Kelly, and delivering his opinions on matters of taste and virtue. An excellent carrier he knew how to help each guest to what was proximately his due, and never failed to reserve a proper share to the reward of his own labours. To entertain, he was possessed of some taste in the fine arts, at least in painting and music, although it was rather of the technical kind, than that which warms the heart and elevates the feelings. There was, indeed, about Waterbushum, nothing that was either warm or elevated. He was shrewd, selfish, and ardent; the last two of which qualities he derived from observation, whilst a various variety of exterior accomplishments. Therefore, in his person and apparent anxiety to do the honours of the table to the most particular point of good breeding, he never permitted the attention upon the public taste to supply the wants of others, word of his own private comforts had been fully arranged and provided for.

Mr. Waterbushum was also distinguished for possessing a few curious engravings, and other specimens of art with the exhibition of which he occasionally beguiled a wet morning at the public room. They were collected, "one at a time," and the Man of Law another distinguished member of the Committee, with a knowing wink of his eye to his own neighbour.

Of this person little need be said. He was a large-boned, loud-voiced, red-faced man, named Mole-wham, a country writer or attorney who managed the matters of the Square much to the profit of one or other,—if not of both. His nose projected from the front of his broad vulgar face, like the side of an old man's head, twisted all of one side. He was as great a bully in his profession, as if it had been authority or conduct of evil. He conducted the whole architecture concerning the cutting up the Saint's-Well-bath, as much lamented by Dame Doda, into building-stones, and was an excellent terms with Doctor Quackleton.

who always recommended him to make the wills of his patients.

After the Man of Law comes Captain Mungo MacTurk, a Highland lieutenant on half-pay, and that of ancient standing; one who preferred toddy of the strongest to wine, and in that fashion and cold drams finished about a bottle of whisky per diem, whenever he could come by it. He was called the Man of Peace, on the same principle which assigns to constables, Bow-street runners, and such like, who carry bludgeons to break folk's heads, and are perpetually and officially employed in scenes of riot, the title of peace-officers—that is, because by his valour he compelled others to act with discretion. The Captain was the general referee in all those abortive quarrels, which, at a place of this kind, are so apt to occur at night, and to be quietly settled in the morning; and occasionally adopted a quarrel himself, by way of taking down any guest who is unusually pugnacious. This occupation procured Captain MacTurk a good deal of respect at the Well; for he was precisely that sort of person, who is ready to fight with any one,—whom no one can find an apology for declining to fight with,—in fighting with whom considerable danger was incurred, for he was ever and anon showing that he could snuff a candle with a pistol ball,—and lastly, through fighting with whom no eclat or credit could redound to the antagonist. He always wore a blue coat and red collar, had a supercilious taciturnity of manner, ate sliced leeks with his cheese, and resembled in complexion a Dutch red-herring.

Still remains to be mentioned the Man of Religion—the gentle Mr. Simon Chatterly, who had strayed to St. Ronan's Well from the banks of Cam or Isis, and who piqued himself, first on his Greek, and secondly, on his politeness to the ladies. During all the week days, as Dame Dods has already hinted, this reverend gentleman was the partner at the whist-table, or in the ball-room, to what maid or matron soever lacked a partner at either; and on the Sundays, he read prayers in the public room to all who chose to attend. He was also a deviser of charades, and an unriddler of riddles; he played a little on the flute, and was Mr. Winterblossom's principal assistant in contriving those ingenious and romantic paths, by which, as by the zig-zags which connect military parallels, you were enabled to ascend to the top of the hill behind the hotel, which commands so beautiful a prospect, at exactly that precise angle of ascent, which entitles a gentleman to offer his arm, and a lady to accept it, with perfect propriety.

There was yet another member of this Select Committee, Mr. Michael Meredith, who might be termed the Man of Mirth, or, if you please, the Jack Pudding to the company, whose business it was to crack the best joke, and sing the best song,—he could. Unluckily, however, this functionary was for the present obliged to absent himself from St. Ronan's; for, not recollecting that he did not actually wear the privileged motley of his profession, he had passed some rest upon Captain MacTurk, which cut so much to he quick, that Mr. Meredith was fain to go to goat-vhey quarters, at some ten miles' distance, and remain there in a sort of concealment, until the affair should be made up through the mediation of his rethren of the Committee.

Such were the honest gentlemen who managed the affairs of this rising settlement, with as much impartiality as could be expected. They were not indeed without their own secret predilections; for the lawyer and the soldier privately inclined to the party of the Squire, while the parson, Mr. Meredith, and Mr. Winterblossom, were more devoted to the interests of Lady Penelope; so that Doctor Quackleben alone, who probably recollected that the gentlemen were as able to stomach complaints, as the ladies to nervous disorders, seemed the only person who preserved in word and deed the most rigid neutrality. Nevertheless, the interests of the establishment being very much at the heart of this honourable council, and each seeing his own profit, pleasure, or comfort, in some degree involved, they suffered not their private affections to interfere with their public duties, but acted, every one in his own sphere, for the public benefit of the whole community.

CHAPTER IV.

THE INVITATION.

Thus painters write their names at Co.—PRIOR.

THE clamour which attends the removal of dinner from a public room had subsided; the clatter of plates, and knives and forks—the bustling tread of awkward boobies of country servants, kicking each other's shins, and wrangling, as they endeavour to rush out of the door three abreast—the clash of glasses and tumblers, borne to earth in the tumult—the shrieks of the landlady—the curses, not loud, but deep, of the landlord—had all passed away; and those of the company who had servants, had been accommodated by their respective Ganymedes with such remnants of their respective bottles of wine, spirits, &c., as the said Ganymedes had not previously consumed, while the rest, broken into such observance by Mr. Winterblossom, waited patiently until the worthy president's own special and multifarious commissions had been executed by a tidy young woman and a lumpish lad, the regular attendants belonging to the house, but whom he permitted to wait on no one, till, as the hymn says,

"All his wants were well supplied."

"And Dinah—my bottle of pale sherry, Dinah—place it on this side—there's a good girl;—and, Toby—get my jug with the hot water—and let it be boiling—and don't spill it on Lady Penelope, if you can help it, Toby."

"No—for her ladyship has been in hot water to-day already," said the Squire; a sarcasm to which Lady Penelope only replied with a look of contempt.

"And, Dinah, bring the sugar—the soft East India sugar, Dinah—and a lemon, Dinah, one of those which came fresh to-day—Go fetch it from the bar, Toby—and don't tumble down stairs, if you can help it.—And, Dinah—stay, Dinah—the nutmeg, Dinah, and the ginger, my good girl—And, Dinah—put the cushion up behind my back—and the footstool to my foot, for my toe is something the worse of my walk with your ladyship this morning to the top of Belvidere."

"Her ladyship may call it what she pleases in common parlance," said the writer; "but it must stand Munt-grunzie in the stamped paper, being so nominated in the ancient writs and evidents thereof."

"And, Dinah," continued the president, "lift up my handkerchief—and—a bit of biscuit, Dinah—and—and I do not think I want any thing else—Look to the company, my good girl.—I have the honour to drink the company's very good health—Will your ladyship honour me by accepting a glass of negus?—I learned to make negus from old Dartineuf's son.—He always used East India sugar and added a tamarind—it improves the flavour infinitely.—Dinah, see your father sends for some tamarinds—Dartineuf knew a good thing almost as well as his father—I met him at Bath in the year—let me see—Garrick was just taking leave, and that was in," &c. &c. &c. "And what is this now, Dinah?" he said, as she put into his hand a roll of paper.

"Something that Nelly Trotter" (Trotting Nelly, as the company called her) "brought from a sketching gentleman that lives at the woman's" (thus bluntly did the upstart minx describe the reverend Mrs. Margaret Dods) "at the Cleikum of Aultoun yonder"—A name, by the way, which the inn had acquired from the use which the saint upon the sign-post was making of his pastoral crook.

"Indeed, Dinah?" said Mr. Winterblossom, gravely taking out his spectacles, and wiping them before he opened the roll of paper; "some boy's daubing, I suppose, whose pa and ma wish to get him into the Trustees' School, and so are beating about for a little interest.—But I am drained dry—I put three lads in last season; and if it had not been my particular interest with the secretary, who asks my opinion now and then, I could not have managed it. But giff-gaff, say I.—Eh! What, in the devil's name, is this?—Here about force and keeping—Who can this be, my lady?—Do but see the sky-line—why, this is really a little bit—an exquisite little bit. Who the devil can it be? and how can he have stumbled upon the dog hole in the Old Town, and the evening b—— I beg your ladyship ten thousand pardons—that kennel there?”

“I dare say, my lady,” said a little man of fourteen, his eyes growing rounder and rounder, and her cheeks tinker and redder as she found herself speaking, and so many folks listening. “O be! I dare say it is the same gentleman we met one day in the Low-wood walk, that looked like a gentleman, and yet was none of the company, and that you said was a handsome man.”

“I did not say handsome, Maria,” replied her ladyship. “I dare never say men are handsome—I only said he looked graceful and interesting.”

“And that, my lady,” said the young parson, bowing and smiling, “as I will be judged by the company, the more flattering compliment of the two—We shall be jealous of this unknown person.”

“Nay, but,” continued the sweetly communicative Maria, with more real and some assumed simplicity, “your ladyship forgets for you said previously after you were sure he was no gentleman, for he did not run after you with your glove which you had dropped—and so I went back myself to find your ladyship’s glove, and he never offered to help me and I saw him closer than your ladyship did, and I am sure he is handsome, though he is not very civil.”

“You speak a little too much and too loud, Maria,” said Lady Penelope, a natural blush reinforcing the suavity of rouge by which it was usually superseded.

“What say you to that, Squire Mowbray?” said the elegant Sir Bingso Binks.

“A fair challenge to the field, Sir Bingso,” answered the squire; “when a lady throws down the gauntlet, a gentleman may throw the handkerchief.”

“I have always the benefit of your best construction, Mr. Mowbray,” said the lady with dignity. “I suppose Miss Maria has contrived this pretty story for your amusement. I can hardly answer to Mr. Bingso for bringing her into company where she receives encouragement to behave so.”

“Nay, nay, my lady,” said the president, “you must let the jest pass by, and since this is really such an admirable sketch, you must honour us with your opinion, whether the company can consistently with propriety make any advances to this man.”

“In my opinion,” said her ladyship, the angry spot still glowing on her brow, “there are enough of men among us already—I wish I could say gentlemen—As matters stand, I see little business ladies can have at St. Ronan’s.”

This was an intimation which always brought the Squire back to good-breeding, which he could make up of when he pleased. He deprecated her ladyship’s displeasure, until she told him, in returning good humour that she really would not trust him unless he brought his sister to be security for his future politeness.

“Clara, my lady,” said Mowbray, “is a little wilful; and I believe your ladyship must take the task of unharbouring her into your own hands. What say you to a great party up to my old shop?—It is a bachelor’s house—you must not expect things in much order, but Clara would be honoured—”

The Lady Penelope readily accepted the proposal of something like a party, and, quite reconciled with Mowbray, began to inquire whether she might bring the stranger artist with her; “that is,” said her ladyship, looking to Dinah, “if he be a gentleman.”

Here Dinah interposed her assurance “that the gentleman at Meg Fidda’s was quite as clean a gentleman, and an illustrated poet besides.”

“An illustrated poet, Dinah?” said Lady Penelope; “you must go on an illustrated poet.”

“I dare to say your ladyship is right,” said Dinah, dropping a curtsey.

A joyous flutter of impatient anxiety was instantly excited through all the blue-stocking faction of the company, not were the news totally indifferent to the rest of the community. The former belonged to that class, who, like the young Aesculus, are ever beating about in quest of a tawny lion, though they are much more successful in now and then securing a great hare,* and the others, having left all their own ordinary affairs and subjects of interest at home, were glad to make a matter of importance of the most trivial occurrence. A mighty poet, said the former class—who could it possibly be? All names were recited—all Britain scrutinized, from Highland hills to the Lakes of Cumberland, from Hydenham Common to St. James’s Place—even the Banks of the Bosphorus were explored for some name which might rank under this distinguished epithet. And then, besides his illustrious poetry, to sketch so minutely—who could it be? And all the gapers, who had nothing of their own to suggest, answered with the antistrophe, Who could it be?

The Claret Club, which comprised the choicest and firmest adherents of Squire Mowbray and the Baronet, were who wished that the reversion of one bottle of wine should furnish forth the feast of tomorrow, though caring naught about either of the fine arts in question, found out an interest of their own, which centred in the same individual.

“I say, little Sir Bingso,” said the Squire, “this is the very fellow that we saw down at the Wilton-stick on Saturday—he was top’d gnatically enough, and cast twelve yards of line with one hand—the fellow fell like a thutadown on the water.”

“Tich!” answered the party he addressed, in the accents of a dog choking in the collar.

“We saw him pull out the salmon yonder,” said Mowbray; “you remember—clean fish—the ticks on his gills—weighed, I dare say, a matter of eighteen pounds.”

“Barron!” replied Sir Bingso, in the same tone of strangulation.

“None of your ticks, Bings!” said his companion, “nearer eighteen than sixteen!”

“Nearer sixteen, by —?”

“Will you go a dozen of blue on it to the company?” said the Squire.

“No, d—n me!” croaked the Baronet—“to our own set I will.”

“Then, I say, done!” quoth the Squire.

And “Done!” responded the Knight, and as came their red pocketbooks.

“But who shall decide the bet?” said the Squire. “The genius himself, I suppose; they talk of asking him here, but I suppose he will scarce mind quizzing like them.”

“Write myself—John Mowbray,” said the Baronet.

“You, Baronet!—you write?” answered the Squire.

“d—n me, that cock won’t fight—you won’t.”

“I will,” growled Sir Bingso, more articulately than usual.

“Why, you can’t!” said Mowbray. “You too wrote a line in your life, save those you were whiped for at school.”

“I can write—I will write,” said Sir Bingso. “Too to one I will.”

And thus the affair rested, for the council of the company were in high consultation concerning the most proper manner of opening a communication with the mysterious stranger; and the voice of Mr. Winterblomson, whose tones, originally fine, age had reduced to falsetto, was calling upon the whole party for “Order order!” so that the backs were changed to lounge in silence, with both arms reclined on the table, and testifying, by coughs and yawns, that indifference to the matters in question, while the rest of the company debated upon them, as if they were matters of life and death.

A hint from one of the gentlemen—Mr. Winterblomson, if he would take the trouble—in name of the company at large—would, Lady Penelope Penfolder presumed to think, be a necessary preliminary to an invitation.

Mr. Winterblomson was “quite of her ladyship’s opinion, and would gladly have been the personal representative of the company at St. Ronan’s Well.”

“The one or the other was equally as good to Aesculus.”

“Optat eorum, est felix dominus domus domus.”

out it was up hill—her ladyship knew his tyrant, the rout, was hovering upon the frontiers—there were other gentlemen, younger and more worthy to fly at the lady's command than an ancient Vulcan like him—there was the valiant Mars and the eloquent Mercury."

Thus speaking, he bowed to Captain MacTurk and the Rev. Mr. Simon Chatterly, and reclined on his chair, sipping his negus with the self-satisfied smile of one, who, by a pretty speech, has rid himself of a troublesome commission. At the same time, by an act probably of mental absence, he put in his pocket the drawing, which, after circulating around the table, had returned back to the chair of the president, being the point from which it had set out.

"By Cot, madam," said Captain MacTurk, "I should be proud to obey your ladyship's commands—but, by Cot, I never call first on any man that ever called upon me at all, unless it were to carry him a friend's message, or such like."

"Twig the old connoisseur," said the Squire to the knight—"He is coniddling the drawing."

"Go it, Johnnie Mowbray—pour it into him," whispered Sir Bingo.

"Thank ye for nothing, Sir Bingo," said the Squire, in the same tone. "Winterblossom is one of us—he is one of us at least—and won't stand the ironing. He is as his Wogdens still, that were right things in his day, and can hit the hay-stack with the best of us—but stay, they are halloozing on the parson."

They were indeed busied on all hands, to obtain Mr. Chatterly's consent to wait on the Genius unknown; but though he smiled and simpered, and was absolutely incapable of saying No, he begged leave, in all humility, to decline that commission. "The truth was," he pleaded in his excuse, "that having one day walked to visit the old Castle of St. Ronan's, and returning through the Auld Town, as it was popularly called, he had stopped at the door of the Cleikum, pronounced Anglicé, with the open diphthong," in hopes to get a glass of syrup of capillaire, or a draught of something cooling; and had in fact expressed his wishes, and was knocking pretty loudly, when a sash-window was thrown suddenly up, and ere he was aware what was about to happen, he was soused with a deluge of water," (as he said,) "while the voice of an old hag from within assured him, that if that did not cool him there was another biding him,—an intimation which induced him to retreat in all haste from the repetition of the shower-bath."

All laughed at the account of the chaplain's misfortune, the history of which seemed to be wrung from him reluctantly, by the necessity of assigning some weighty cause for declining to execute the ladies' commands. But the Squire and Baronet continued their mirth far longer than decorum allowed, lunging themselves back in their chairs, with their hands thrust into their side-pockets, and their mouths expanded with unrestrained enjoyment, until the sufferer, angry, disconcerted, and endeavouring to look scornful, incurred another general burst of laughter on all hands.

When Mr. Winterblossom had succeeded in restoring some degree of order, he found the mishaps of the young divine proved as intimidating as ludicrous. For one of the company chose to go Envoy Extraordinary to the dominions of Queen Meg, who might be suspected of paying little respect to the sanctity of an ambassador's person. And what was worse, when he was resolved that a civil card from Mr. Winterblossom, in the name of the company, should be sent to the stranger, instead of a personal visit, Dinah informed them that she was sure no one about the house could be bribed to carry up a letter of the kind; or, when such an event had taken place two summers since, Meg, who construed it into an attempt to reduce from her tenement the invited guest, had so riddled a ploughboy who carried the letter, that he led the country-side altogether, and never thought himself safe till he was at a village ten miles off, where it was afterwards learned he enlisted with a recruiting party, choosing rather to face the French than to return within the sphere of Meg's displeasure.

Just while they were agitating this new difficulty, a prodigious clamour was heard without, which, to the first apprehensions of the company, seemed to be Meg, in all her terrors, come to anticipate the proposed invasion. Upon inquiry, however, it proved to be her gossip, Trotting Nelly, or Nelly Trotter, in the act of forcing her way up stairs, against the united strength of the whole household of the hotel, to reclaim Luckie Dod's picture, as she called it. This made the connoisseur's treasure tremble in his pocket, who, thrusting a half-crown into Toby's hand, exhorted him to give it her, and try his influence in keeping her back. Toby, who knew Nelly's nature, put the half-crown into his own pocket, and snatched up a gill-stoup of whisky from the side-board. Thus armed, he boldly confronted the virago, and interposing a remora, which was able to check poor Nelly's course in her most determined moods, not only succeeded in averting the immediate storm which approached the company in general, and Mr. Winterblossom in particular, but brought the guests the satisfactory information, that Trotting Nelly had agreed, after she had slept out her nap in the barn, to convey their commands to the Unknown of Cleikum of Aultoun.

Mr. Winterblossom, therefore, having authenticated his proceedings, by inserting in the Minutes of the Committee, the authority which he had received, wrote his card in the best style of diplomacy, and sealed it with the seal of the Spa, which bore something like a nymph, seated beside what was designed to represent an urn.

The rival factions, however did not trust entirely to this official invitation. Lady Penelope was of opinion that they should find some way of letting the stranger—a man of talent unquestionably—understand that there were in the society to which he was invited, spirits of a more select sort, who felt worthy to intrude themselves on his solitude.

Accordingly, her ladyship imposed upon the elegant Mr. Chatterly the task of expressing the desire of the company to see the unknown artist, in a neat occasional copy of verses. The poor gentleman's muse, however, proved unpropitious; for he was able to proceed no farther than two lines in half an hour, which, coupled with its variations, we insert from the blotted manuscript, as Dr. Johnson has printed the alterations in Pope's version of the Iliad:

1. Maids. 2. Dances unity joining.
The [nymphs] of St. Ronan's (in purpose combining

The eloquence of a prose billet was necessarily resorted to in the absence of the heavenly muse, and the said billet was secretly intrusted to the care of Trotting Nelly. The same trusty emissary, when refreshed by her nap among the pease-straw, and about to harness her cart for her return to the sea-coast, (in the course of which she was to pass the Aultoun,) received another card, written, as he had threatened, by Sir Bingo Banks himself, who had given himself this trouble to secure the settlement of the bet; conjecturing that a man with a fashionable exterior, who could throw twelve yards of line at a cast with such precision, might consider the invitation of Winterblossom as that of an old twaddler, and care as little for the good graces of an affected blue stocking and her coterie, whose conversation, in Sir Bingo's mind, relished of nothing but of weak tea and bread and butter. Thus the happy Mr. Francis Tyrrel received, considerably to his surprise, no less than three invitations at once from the Well of St. Ronan's.

CHAPTER V.

EPISTOLARY ELOQUENCE.

But how can I answer, since first I must read thee?—PRIOR.

DESIROUS of authenticating our more important facts, by as many original documents as possible, we have, after much research, enabled ourselves to present the reader with the following accurate trancopies of the notes intrusted to the care of Trotting Nelly. The first ran thus:

"Mr Winterblissom (of Silverbad) has the commands of Lady Penelope Penfeather, Sir Rungo and Lady Suka, Mr and Miss Mowbray (of St. Ronan's), and the rest of the company at the Hood and Tentative Inn of St. Ronan's Well, to express their hope that the gentlemen lodged at the Clerkum Inn, Old Town of St. Ronan's, will favour them with his company at the Ordinary, as early and as often as may suit his convenience. The Company think it necessary to send this intimation, because, according to the Rules of the place, the Ordinary can only be attended by such gentlemen and ladies as lodge at St. Ronan's Well, but they are happy to make a distinction in favour of a gentleman so distinguished for success in the fine arts as Mr ———, residing at Clerkum. If Mr ——— should be inclined, upon becoming further acquainted with the Company and Rules of the Place, to remove his residence to the Well, Mr Winterblissom, though he would not be understood to commit himself by a positive assurance to that effect, is inclined to hope that an arrangement might be made, notwithstanding the extreme crowd of his season, to accommodate Mr ——— at the lodging-house, called Laluput-Hall. It will much conduce to facilitate this negotiation, if Mr ——— would have the goodness to send an exact note of his stature, as Captain Rannietree seems disposed to resign the sliding bed at Laluput Hall, on account of his finding it rather deficient in length. Mr Winterblissom begs further to assure Mr. ——— of the esteem in which he holds his genius, and of his high personal consideration.

The above card was written (we love to be precise in matters concerning orthography) in a neat, round, clerk-like hand, which, like Mr Winterblissom's character, in many particulars was most accurate and commonplace, though betraying an affectation both of flourish and of facility.

The next billet was a contrast to the diplomatic gravity and accuracy of Mr Winterblissom's official communication, and ran thus, the young divine's sententious jests and classical flowers of eloquence being mingled with some wild flowers from the winning fancy of Lady Penelope.

"A choir of Dryads and Naiads, assembled at the healing spring of St. Ronan's, have learned with surprise that a youth, gifted by Apollo, when the Dæty was prodigal, with two of his most esteemed endowments, wanders at will among their domains, frequenting grove and river, without once dreaming of paying homage to its tutelary deities. He is, therefore, summoned to their presence, and prompt obedience will insure him forgiveness; but in case of contumacy, let him beware how he agitates either the lyre or the pallet.

"Postscript. The adorable Penelope, long enrolled among the Goddesses for her beauty and virtues, gives Hector and Amphion, which mortals call ice and cake at the Public Rooms, near the Sacred Spring, on Thursday evening, at eight o'clock, when the Muses never fail to attend. The stranger's presence is requested to participate in the delights of the evening.

"Second Postscript. A shepherd, ambitiously aiming at more accommodation than his narrow cot affords, leaves it in a day or two.

"Assuredly the thing is to be heard.—do You Like It

"Postscript third. Our Inn, whom mortals know as Trotting Nelly in her tartan cloak, will bring us the stranger's answer to our celestial summons."

This letter was written in a delicate Italian hand, garmented with fine hair-strokes and dashes, which were sometimes so dexterously thrown off as to represent lyres, pallets, veils, and other appropriate decorations, suited to the tenor of the contents.

The third epistle was a complete contrast to the other two. It was written in a coarse, irregular, scholastic half-text, which, however, seemed to have cost the writer as much pains as if it had been a specimen of the most exquisite calligraphy. And these were the contents:—

"Sir—Jack Mowbray has betted with me that the annum you killed on Saturday last weyd to to dirc pounds.—I say nyr sixteen.—So you being a sportsman, 'tis refer d.—So hope you will come or not me't; do not doubt you will be on honour. The bet is a dozen of claret, to be drank at the hotel by our own set, on Monday next; and we beg you will make one; and Mowbray hopes you will come down. Bring, sir, your most humble servant,—Sergeant Barker, and of Black hall.

"Postscript. Have sent some loops of floss goat, also some black hankies of my groom's dressing, hope they will prove killing, as aunting several seasons.

No answer was received to any of these intimations for more than three days; which, while it smarted, rather added to than diminished the curiosity of the Wellers concerning the Unknown, occasional guest railing in public against him, as ill-mannered and rude.

Mean time, Francis Tyrrel, to his great surprise, began to find, like the philosophers, that he was not less alone than when alone. In the most silent and unperceived walks, to which the private state of his mind induced him to betake himself, he was sure to find some strollers from the Well, to whom he had become the object of so much solicitous watch. Quite innocent of the knowledge that he himself possessed the attraction which occasioned his meeting them so frequently, he began to doubt whether the Lady Penelope and her maidens—Mr Winterblissom and his gray pony—the parson and his short black coat and raven gray pantaloons—were not either actually polygraphic copies of the same individual or possessed of a celerity of motion resembling omnipotence and ubiquity, for no where could he go without meeting them, and that oftener than one a-day, in the course of his walks. Sometimes the presence of the sweet Lyrons was intimated by the sweet whistle in an adjacent shade; sometimes, when Tyrrel thought himself most solitary, the parson's hat was heard smacking forth Gramscaree Malley; and if he betook himself to the river, he was pretty sure to find his sport watched by Sir Rungo or some of his friends.

The efforts which Tyrrel made to escape from the persecution, and the impatience of it which his measures increased, procured him, among the Wellers, a name of the Misanthrope, and, once distinguished as an object of curiosity, he was the person attended to, who could at the ordinary of the day give the most accurate account of where the Misanthrope had been, and how occupied in the course of the morning. And so far was Tyrrel's shyness from diminishing the desire of the Wellers for his society, that the latter feeling increased with the difficulty of gratification,—as the angler feels the most peculiar interest when throwing his fly for the most cunning and considerate trout in the pool.

In short, such was the interest which the exact imaginations of the company took in the Misanthrope, that, notwithstanding the unnamable qualms which the word expressed, there was only one of the society who did not desire to see the specimen of their rooms, for the purpose of examining him close and at leisure; and the ladies were particularly desirous to inquire whether he was actually a Misanthrope? Whether he had been always a Misanthrope? What had induced him to become a Misanthrope? And whether there were no means of inducing him to cease to be a Misanthrope?

One individual only, as we have said, with

And to see how far more of the supposed Tison of Chalkum, and that was Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's. Through the medium of that venerable character John Pater, professor of weaving and practical cloth-making in the Antiquary of St. Ronan's, who usually attended Tyrrel, to show him the costs of the free, carry his bag, and so forth the Square had ascertained that the judgment of Sir Hugo regarding the disputed weight of the fish was more correct than his own. This inferred an immediate loss of honour among the members of the Well. And the consequence might have been more serious, nothing short of the loss of the Well, who had hitherto been Mowbray's constant adherent, and adherent of Mowbray's constant adherent, in his superiority of character and reputation. It might either cut down a Mowbray or a Tyrrel in future, the Square, who had a great deal of their art, should certainly be well attended to. Sir Hugo, in the capacity of a Mowbray.

The Mowbray, however, hoped that Tyrrel's presence at the Well might be used, to prevent the possibility of the fact, which at the same time, he considered a very important degree of dislike to that stranger, who had been the indirect occasion of the unpleasant predicament in which he found himself, of not catching a salmon weighing a pound heavier, or, therefore, equally increased the measures of their own personal taking further notice of Tyrrel, and referred to the unanswered letter, as a piece of importance which announced him to be no gentleman.

But though appearances were against him, and though he was in truth naturally inclined to submit and even to the objection and bustle of such a society, that part of Tyrrel's behaviour which indicated ill-breeding was easily accounted for by his never having received the letter which required an answer. Treating Nelly, whether one thing to fair or game, Mrs. Dods, without bringing back the drawing, or whether she came through the influence of the double dream with which she had been indulged at the Well, jumbled off with her cart to her beloved village of Beate-row from which she transmitted the letters by the first bare-legged gillie who travelled towards Antiquary of St. Ronan's, so that at last, but after a long delay, they reached the Chalkum Inn and the hands of Mr. Tyrrel.

The arrival of these documents explained some part of the oddity of behaviour which had surprised him in his neighbours of the Well, and as he saw they had not somehow an idea of his being a man extraordinary, and was sensible that such is a character equally ridiculous and difficult to support, he began to write to Mr. Winterblow in a card in the style of ordinary mortals. In this he stated the delay occasioned by miscarriage of the letter and his regret on that account, expressed his intention of dining with the company at the Well on the succeeding day while he regretted that other circumstances, as well as the state of his health and spirits, would permit him this honour very infrequently during his stay in the country and begged no trouble might be taken about his accommodation at the Well, as he was perfectly satisfied with his present residence. A separate note to Sir Hugo said he was happy he could verify the weight of the fish, which he had noted in his diary. ("D-n the fellow does he keep a diary?" said the Baronet,) and though the result could only be particularly agreeable to one party, he should wish both winners and losers might share alike the pleasure of participating in either. An enclosed was a signed note of the weight of the fish arrived with this, Sir Hugo claimed his win—in accord in his judgment—score louder and more decidedly than ever he was known to utter any previous words, that this Tyrrel was a devilish honest fellow, and he trusted to be better acquainted with him; while the crusty old Square, privately cursing the stranger by all his gods, had no mode of silencing his companion but by allowing his loss, and fixing a day for discussing the bet.

In the public room the company examined even microscopically the response of the stranger to Mr. Winterblow, straining their ingenuity to discover, in the most ordinary expressions, a deeper and more meaning, expressive of something mysterious, and not meant to meet the eye. Mr. Methletham, he wrote, dwelt on the word circumstances, which he read with peculiar emphasis.

"Ah, poor lad!" he concluded, "I doubt he might happen at Meg Dods's chimney-corner than he could do with the present company."

Doctor Quackleton, in the manner of a clergyman selecting a word from his text, as that which is to be ardently meditated upon, repeated in an under tone, the words, State of health—comph—state of health.

Nothing acute—no one has been sent for—must be honest—tending to gout, perhaps. Or his chrysalis a sort of light wild eye—irregular sleep—starting when met suddenly by a stranger and turning abruptly and angrily away. Pray Mr. Winterblow, as we have an order to look over the file of newspapers—if a very troublesome that restricts about consulting them."

"I am sure it is a necessary one, Doctor," said the resident, "because so few of the good company and any thing else that the old newspapers would have been worn to pieces long since."

"Well, well, let me have the order," said the Doctor, "I remember something of a gentleman run away from his friends—I must look at the description. I believe I have a strict jacket somewhere about the Docks near."

While this suggestion appalled the male part of the company who did not much relish the approaching visit in company with a gentleman whose mission seemed so precarious, none of the younger Mowbrays listened to each other. "Ah, poor fellow"—and if it be so the Doctor supposes, my lady who knows what the cause of his illness may have been?—His private complaints of—ah, poor man!"

And thus, by the ingenious commencement of the company at the Well, on no plain a note as ever covered the eighth part of a sheet of foolscap, the writer was deprived of his property, his reason, and his heart, "all or either, or one or other of them," as a briefly and distinctly expressed in the last phrase.

In short, so much was said pro and con, so many ideas started and theories maintained concerning the disposition and character of the Mowbrays, that, when the company assembled at the usual time, before proceeding to dinner, they debated, as it were, whether the expected addition to their society was to enter the room on his hands or his feet; and when Mr. Tyrrel was announced by Toby, at the top of his voice, the gentleman who entered the room had so very little to distinguish him from others, that there was a momentary disappointment. The ladies, in particular began to doubt whether the resemblance of short, manthropy, modern, and mental amenability, which they had pictured to themselves, actually was he same with the gentle and even fashionable looking man whom they saw before them, who, though in a morning dress, which the distance of his residence, and the freedom of the place, made excusable, had, even in the minute points of his exterior, none of the intelligence, or valour, which might be supposed to attach to the treatment of a manthropic recluse, whether sane or insane.

As he paid his compliments round the circle, the scales seemed to fall from the eyes of those he spoke to; and they saw with surprise, that the expectations had existed entirely in their own preconceptions, and that whatever the impression or rank in life of Mr. Tyrrel might be, his manners without being showy were gentlemanlike and pleasing. He returned his thanks to Mr. Winterblow in a manner which made the stranger's address his best breeding to answer the stranger's address in kind. He then escaped from the awkwardness of remaining the sole object of attention, by gliding gradually among the company, not like an owl, which seeks to hole itself in a thicket or an owl, and round men, shrinking from the society into which he is compelled, but with the air of one who could maintain with ease his part in a higher circle. His address to Lady Penelope was adapted to the romantic tone of Mr. Chatterly's epistle, to which it was necessary to allude. He was afraid, he said, he must complain to Juno of the neglect of Iris, for her irregularity in delivery of a certain ethereal command, which he had not dared to answer otherwise than by mute obedience—unless, indeed, as the import of the letter seemed to infer, the invitation was designed for some more gifted individual than he to whom chance had assigned it.

Lady Penelope by her lips, and many of the young ladies with their eyes, assured him there was no mistake in the matter; that he was really the gifted person whom the nymphs had summoned to their presence, and that they were well acquainted with his talents as a poet and a painter. Tyrrel disclaimed, with earnestness and gravity, the charge of poetry, and professed, that, far from attempting the art itself, he "read with reluctance all but the productions of the very first-rate poets, and some of these—he was almost afraid to say—he should have liked better in humble prose."

"You have now only to disown your skill as an artist," said Lady Penelope, "and we must consider Mr. Tyrrel as the falsest and most deceitful of his sex, who has a mind to deprive us of the opportunity of benefiting by the productions of his unparalleled endowments. I assure you I shall put my young friends on their guard. Such dissimulation cannot be without its object."

"And I," said Mr. Winterblossom, "can produce a piece of real evidence against the culprit."

So saying, he unrolled the sketch which he had filched from Trotting Nelly, and which he had pared and pasted, (arts in which he was eminent,) so as to take out its creases, repair its breaches, and vamp it as well as my old friend Mrs. Weir could have repaired the damages of time on a folio Shakspeare.

"The vera corpus delicti," said the writer, grinning and rubbing his hands.

"If you are so good as to call such scratches drawings," said Tyrrel, "I must stand so far confessed. I used to do them for my own amusement; but since my landlady, Mrs. Doda, has of late discovered that I gain my livelihood by them, why should I disown it?"

This avowal, made without the least appearance either of shame or retenue, seemed to have a striking effect on the whole society. The president's trembling hand stole the sketch back to the portfolio, afraid doubtless it might be claimed in form, or else compensation expected by the artist. Lady Penelope was disconcerted, like an awkward horse when it changes the leading foot in galloping. She had to recede from the respectful and easy footing on which he had contrived to place himself, to one which might express patronage on her own part, and dependence on Tyrrel's; and this could not be done in a moment.

The Man of Law murmured, "Circumstances—circumstances—I thought so!"

Sir Bingo whispered to his friend the Squire, "Run out—blown up—off the course—pity—d—d pretty fellow he has been!"

"A ruff from the beginning!" whispered Mowbray.—"I never thought him any thing else."

"I'll hold ye a poney of that, my dear, and I'll ask him."

"Done, for a poney, provided you ask him in ten minutes," said the Squire; "but you dare not, Bingie—he has a d—d cross game look, with all that civil chaff of his."

"Done," said Sir Bingo, but in a less confident tone than before, and with a determination to proceed with some caution in the matter.—"I have got a rouleau above, and Winterblossom shall hold stakes."

"I have no rouleau," said the Squire; "but I'll fly a cheque on Meiklewham."

"See it be better than your last," said Sir Bingo, "for I won't be skylarked again. Jack, my boy, you are had."

"Not till the bet's won; and I shall see yon walking dandy break your head, Bingie, before that," answered Mowbray. "Best speak to the Captain before hand—it is a hellish scrape you are running into—I'll let you off yet, Bingie, for a guinea forfeit.—See, I am just going to start the tattler."

"Start, and be d—d!" said Sir Bingo. "You are gotten, I assure you o' that, Jack." And with a bow and a shuffle, he went up and introduced himself to the stranger as Sir Bingo Binks.

"Had—honour—write—sir," were the only sounds which his throat, or rather his cravat seemed to send forth.

"Confound the booby!" thought Mowbray; "he will get out of leading strings, if he goes on at this rate; and doubly confounded be this cursed trumper, who, the Lord knows why, has come hither from the Lord knows where, to drive the pigs through my game."

In the mean time, while his friend stood with his stop-watch in his hand, with a visage lengthened under the influence of these reflections, Sir Bingo, with an instinctive tact, which self-preservation seemed to dictate to a brain neither the most delicate nor subtle in the world, premised his inquiry by some general remark on fishing and field-sports. With all these, he found Tyrrel more than passably acquainted. Of fishing and shooting, particularly, he spoke with something like enthusiasm; so that Sir Bingo began to hold him in considerable respect, and to assure himself that he could not be, or at least could not originally have been bred, the itinerant artist which he now gave himself out—and this, with the fast lapse of the time, induced him thus to address Tyrrel.—"I say, Mr. Tyrrel—why, you have been one of us—I say"—

"If you mean a sportsman, Sir Bingo—I have been, and am a pretty keen one still," replied Tyrrel.

"Why, then, you did not always do them sort of things?"

"What sort of things do you mean, Sir Bingo?" said Tyrrel. "I have not the pleasure of understanding you."

"Why, I mean them sketches," said Sir Bingo. "I'll give you a handsome order for them, if you will tell me. I will, on my honour."

"Does it concern you particularly, Sir Bingo, to know any thing of my affairs?" said Tyrrel.

"No—certainly—not immediately," answered Sir Bingo, with some hesitation, for he liked not the dry tone in which Tyrrel's answers were returned, half so well as a bumper of dry sherry; "only I said you were a d—d gnostic fellow, and I laid a bet you have not been always professional—that's all."

Mr. Tyrrel replied, "A bet with Mr. Mowbray. I suppose?"

"Yes, with Jack," replied the Baronet—"you have hit it—I hope I have done him?"

Tyrrel bent his brows, and looked first at Mr. Mowbray, then at the Baronet, and, after a moment's thought, addressed the latter.—"Sir Bingo Binks, you are a gentleman of elegant inquiry and acute judgment.—You are perfectly right—I was not bred to the profession of an artist, nor did I practise it formerly, whatever I may do now; and so that question is answered."

"And Jack is diddled," said the Baronet, smiting his thigh in triumph, and turning towards the Squire and the stake-holder, with a smile of exultation.

"Stop a single moment, Sir Bingo," said Tyrrel; "take one word with you. I have a great respect for bets,—it is part of an Englishman's charter to bet on what he thinks fit, and to prosecute his inquiries over hedge and ditch, as if he were steple-hunting. But as I have satisfied you on the subject of two bets that is sufficient compliance with the custom of the country; and therefore I request, Sir Bingo, you will not make me or my affairs the subject of any more wagers."

"I'll be d—d if I do," was the internal resolution of Sir Bingo. Aloud he muttered some apologies, and was heartily glad that the dinner-bell, sounding at the moment, afforded him an apology for shuffling off in a different direction.

TABLE-TALK.

And, sir, if these accounts be true,
The Dutch have mighty things in view;
The Austrians—I admire French beans,
Dear ma'am, above all other greens.

And all as lively and as brisk
As—Ma'am, d'ye choose a game at whist?

Table-Talk.

WHEN they were about to leave the room, Lady Penelope assumed Tyrrel's arm with a sweet smile of condescension, meant to make the honoured party understand in its full extent the favour conferred. But the unreasonable artist, far from intimating the least confusion at an attention so little to be expected, seemed to consider the distinction as one which was naturally paid to the greatest stranger present; and when he placed Lady Penelope at the head of the table, by Mr. Winterblossom the president, and took a chair for himself betwixt her ladyship and Lady Blinks, the provoking wretch appeared no more sensible of being exalted above his proper rank in society, than if he had been sitting at the bottom of the table by honest Mrs. Blower from the Bow-head, who had come to the Well to carry off the drugs of the Influenzie, which she scorned to term a surfeit.

Now this indifference puzzled Lady Penelope's affections extremely, and irritated her desire to get at the bottom of Tyrrel's mystery, if there was one, and secure him to her own party. If you were ever at a watering-place, reader, you know that while the guests do not always pay the most polite attention to unmarked individuals, the appearance of a stray lion takes an interest as strong as it is reasonable, and the Amazonian chiefs of each coterie, like the hunters of Buenos-Ayres, prepare their lasso, and manœuvre to the best advantage they can, each hoping to noose the unsuspecting monster, and lead him captive to her own menagerie. A few words concerning Lady Penelope Penfeather will explain why she practised this sport with even more than common zeal.

She was the daughter of an earl, possessed a howy person, and features which might be called handsome in youth, though now rather too much rononcées to render the term proper. The nose was become sharper; the cheeks had lost the roundness of youth; and as, during fifteen years that she had signed a beauty and a ruling toast, the right man had not spoken, or, at least, had not spoken at the right time, her ladyship now rendered sufficiently independent by the inheritance of an old relation, poked in praise of friendship, began to dislike the town in summer, and to "babble of green fields."

About the time Lady Penelope thus changed the tenor of her life, she was fortunate enough, with Dr. Quackleben's assistance, to find out the virtues of St. Ronan's spring; and having contributed her share to establish the urbs in rure, which had risen round it, she sat herself down as leader of the fashions in the little province which she had in a great measure both discovered and colonized. She was therefore, justly desirous to compel homage and tribute from all who should approach the territory.

In other respects, Lady Penelope pretty much resembled the numerous class she belonged to. She was at bottom a well-principled woman, but too thoughtless to let her principles control her humour, therefore not scrupulously nice in her society. She was good-natured, but capricious and whimsical, and willing enough to be kind or generous, if it neither thwarted her humour, nor cost her much trouble; would have chaperoned a young friend any where, and moved the world for subscription tickets; but never troubled herself how much her giddy charge irritated, or with whom; so that, with a numerous lass of Misses, her ladyship was the most delightful creature in the world. Then Lady Penelope had lived so much in society, knew so exactly when to speak, and how to escape from an embarrassing discussion by professing ignorance, while she looked intelligence, that she was not generally discovered to be a fool, unless when she set up for being remarkably clever. This happened more frequently of late, when, perhaps, as she could not but observe that the repairs of the toilet became more necessary, she might suppose that new lights, according to the poet, were streaming on her mind through the chinks that Time was making. Many of her friends, however, thought that Lady Penelope would have better consulted her genius by remaining in mediocrity, as a fashionable and well-bred woman, than by parading her new-founded pretensions to taste and patronage; but such was not her own opinion, and doubtless, her ladyship was the best judge.

On the other side of Tyrrel sat Lady Binks, lately the beautiful Miss Bonnyrigg, who, during the last season, had made the company at the Well alternately admire, smile, and stare, by dancing the highest Highland fling, riding the wildest pony, laughing the loudest laugh at the broadest joke, and wearing the briefest petticoat of any nymph of St. Ronan's. Few knew that this wild, hoydenish, half-mad humour, was only superinduced over her real character, for the purpose of—getting well married. She had fixed her eyes on Sir Bingo, and was aware of his maxim, that to catch him, "a girl must be," in his own phrase, "bang up to every thing;" and that he would choose a wife for the neck-or-nothing qualities which recommend a good hunter. She made out her catch-match, and she was miserable. Her wild good-humour was entirely an assumed part of her character, which was passionate, ambitious, and thoughtful. Delicacy she had none—she knew Sir Bingo was a brute and a fool, even while she was hunting him down; but she had so far mistaken her own feelings, as not to have expected that when she became bone of his bone, she should feel so much shame and anger when she saw his folly expose him to be laughed at and plundered, or so disgusted when his brutality became intimately connected with herself. It is true, he was on the whole rather an innocent monster; and between biting and bridling, coaxing and humouring, might have been made to pad on well enough. But an unhappy hoggling which had taken place previous to the declaration of their private marriage, had so exasperated her spirits against her helpmate, that modes of conciliation were the last she was likely to adopt. Not only had the assistance of the Scottish Themis, so propitiously indulgent to the foibles of the fair, been resorted to on the occasion, but even Mars seemed ready to enter upon the tapis, if Hymen had not intervened. There was, de par le monde, a certain brother of the lady—an officer—and, as it happened, on leave of absence—who alighted from a hack-chaise at the Fox Hotel, at eleven o'clock at night, holding in his hand a slip of well-dried oak, accompanied by another gentleman, who, like himself, wore a military travelling-cap and a black stock; out of the said chaise, as was reported by the trusty Toby, was handed a small reise-sac, an Andrew Ferrara, and a neat mahogany box, eighteen inches long, three deep, and some six broad. Next morning a solemn palarer (as the natives of Madagascar call their national convention) was held at an unusual hour, at which Captain MacTurk and Mr. Mowbray assisted; and the upshot was, that at breakfast the company were made happy by the information, that Sir Bingo had been for some weeks the happy bridegroom of their general favourite; which union, concealed for family reasons, he was now at liberty to acknowledge, and to fly with the wings of love to bring his sorrowing turtle from the shades to which she had retired, till the obstacles to their mutual happiness could be removed. Now, though all this sounded very smoothly, that gall-less turtle, Lady Binks, could never think of the tenor of the proceedings without the deepest feelings of resentment and contempt for the principal actor, Sir Bingo.

Besides all these unpleasant circumstances, Sir Bingo's family had refused to countenance her wish that he should bring her to his own seat; and hence a new shock to her pride, and new matter of contempt against poor Sir Bingo, for being ashamed and afraid to face down the opposition of his kinsfolk, for whose displeasure, though never attending to any good advice from them, he retained a childish awe.

The manners of the young lady were no less changed than was her temper; and, from being much too careless and free, were become reserved, sullen, and haughty. A consciousness that many scrupled to hold intercourse with her in society, rendered her disagreeably tenacious of her rank, and jealous of every thing that appeared like neglect. She had constituted herself mistress of Sir Bingo's purse; and, unrestrained in the expenses of dress and equipage, chose, contrary to her maiden practice, to be rather rich and splendid than gay, and to command that attention by magnificence, which she no longer deigned to solicit by rendering herself either agreeable or entertaining. One secret source of her misery was the necessity of showing deference to Lady Penelope Penfeather, whose understanding she despised, and whose pretensions to consequence, to patronage, and to literature, she had acuteness enough to see through, and to condemn; and this dislike was the more grievous, that she felt she depended a good deal on Lady Penelope's countenance for the situation she was able to maintain even among the not very select society of St. Ronan's Well; and that, neglected by her, she must have dropped lower in the scale even there. Neither was Lady Penelope's kindness to Lady Binks extremely cordial. She partook in the ancient and ordinary dislike of single nymphs of a certain age, to those who make splendid alliances under their very eye—and she more than suspected the secret disaffection of the lady. But the name sounded well; and the style in which Lady Binks lived was a credit to the place. So they satisfied their mutual dislike with saying a few sharp things to each other occasionally, but all under the mask of civility.

Such was Lady Binks; and yet, being such, her dress, and her equipage, and carriages, were the envy of half the Misses at the Well, who, while she sat disfiguring with sullenness her very lovely face, (for it was as beautiful as her shape was exquisite,) only thought she was proud of having carried her point, and felt herself, with her large fortune and diamond bandeau, no fit company for the rest of the party. They gave way, therefore, with meekness to her domineering temper, though it was not the less tyrannical, that in her maiden state of hoydenhood, she had been to some of them an object of slight and of censure: and Lady Binks had not forgotten the offences offered to Miss Bonnyrigg. But the fair sisterhood submitted to her retaliations, as lieutenants endure the bullying of a rude and boisterous captain of the sea, with the secret determination to pay it home to their underlings, when they shall become captains themselves.

In this state of importance, yet of penance, Lady Binks occupied her place at the dinner-table, alternately disconcerted by some stupid speech of her lord and master, and by some slight sarcasm from Lady Penelope, to which she longed to reply, but dared not.

She looked from time to time at her neighbour Frank Tyrrel, but without addressing him, and accepted in silence the usual civilities which he proffered to her. She had remarked keenly his interview with Sir Bingo, and knowing by experience the manner in which her honoured lord was wont to retreat from a dispute in which he was unsuccessful, as well as his genius for getting into such perplexities, she had little doubt that he had sustained from the stranger some new indignity; whom, therefore, she regarded with a mixture of feeling, scarce knowing whether to be pleased with him for having given pain to him whom she hated, or angry with him for having affronted one in whose degradation her own was necessarily involved. There might be other thoughts—on the whole, she regarded him with much though with mute attention. He paid her but little in return, being almost entirely occupied in replying to the questions of the engrossing Lady Penelope Penfeather.

Receiving polite though rather evasive answers to her inquiries concerning his late avocations, her ladyship could only learn that Tyrrel had been travelling in several remote parts of Europe, and even of Asia. Baffled, but not repulsed, the lady continued her courtesy, by pointing out to him, as a stranger, several individuals of the company to whom she proposed introducing him, as persons from whose society he might derive either profit or amusement. In the midst of this sort of conversation, however, she suddenly stopped short.

"Will you forgive me, Mr. Tyrrel," she said, "if I say I have been watching your thoughts for some moments, and that I have detected you? All the while that I have been talking of these good folks, and that you have been making such civil replies, that they might be with great propriety and utility inserted in the 'Familiar Dialogues, teaching foreigners how to express themselves in English upon ordinary occasions'—your mind has been entirely fixed upon that empty chair, which hath remained there opposite betwixt our worthy president and Sir Bingo Binks."

"I own, madam," he answered, "I was a little surprised at seeing such a distinguished seat unoccupied, while the table is rather crowded."

"O, confess more, sir!—Confess that to a poet a seat unoccupied—the chair of Banquo—has more charms than if it were filled even as an alderman would fill it.—What if 'the Dark Ladye' should glide in and occupy it?—Would you have courage to stand the vision, Mr. Tyrrel?—I assure you the thing is not impossible."

"What is not impossible, Lady Penelope?" said Tyrrel, somewhat surprised.

"Startled already?—Nay, then, I despair of your enduring the awful interview."

"What interview? who is expected?" said Tyrrel, unable with the utmost exertion to suppress some signs of curiosity, though he suspected the whole to be merely some mystification of her ladyship.

"How delighted I am," she said, "that I have found out where you are vulnerable!—Expected—do I say expected?—no, not expected."

* She glides, like Night, from land to land,
She hath strange power of speech.*

—But come, I have you at my mercy, and I will be generous and explain.—We call—that is, among ourselves, you understand—Miss Clara Mowbray, the sister of that gentleman that sits next to Miss Parker, the Dark Ladye, and that seat is left for her.—For she was expected—no, not expected—I forget again!—but it was thought possible she might honour us to-day, when our feast was so full and piquant.—Her brother is our Lord of the Manor—and so they pay her that sort of civility to regard her as a vis à vis—and neither Lady Binks nor I think of objecting.—She is a singular young person, Clara Mowbray—she amuses me very much—I am always rather glad to see her."

"She is not to come hither to-day," said Tyrrel: "am I so to understand your ladyship?"

"Why, it is past her time—even her time," said Lady Penelope—"dinner was kept back half an hour, and our poor invalids were famishing, as you may see by the deeds they have done since.—But Clara is an odd creature, and if she took it into her head to come hither at this moment, hither she would come—she is very whimsical.—Many people think her handsome—but she looks so like something from another world, that she makes me always think of Mat Lewis's Spectre Lady."

And she repeated with much cadence,

"There is a thing—there is a thing,
I fain would have from thee;
I fain would have that gay gold ring,
O warrior, give it me!"

"And then you remember his answer:

"This ring Lord Brooke from his daughter took,
And a solemn oath he swore,
That that ladye my bride should be
When this crusade was o'er."

You do figures as well as landscapes, I suppose, Mr. Tyrrel?—You shall make a sketch for me—a slight

* The Dark Ladye is one of those tantalizing fragments in which Mr. Coleridge has shown us what exquisite powers of poetry he has suffered to remain uncultivated. Let us be thankful for what we have received, however. The unfashioned ore, drawn from so rich a mine, is worth all to which art can add its highest decorations, when drawn from less abundant sources. The verses beginning the poem which are published separately, are said to have soothed the last hours of Mr. Fox. They are the stanzas entitled LOVE.

thing—for sketches, I think, show the freedom of art better than finished pieces—I date on the first coruscations of genius—dashing like lightning from the cloud!—You shall make a sketch for my own boudoir—my dear sulky den at Air Castle, and Clara Mowbray shall sit for the Ghost Ladye.”

“That would be but a poor compliment to your ladyship’s friend,” replied Tyrrel.

“Friend? We don’t get quite that length, though I like Clara very well—Quite sentimental cast of face—I think I saw an antique in the Louvre very like her—(I was there in 1800)—quite an antique countenance—eyes something hollowed—care has dug caves for them, but they are caves of the most beautiful marble, arched with jet—a straight nose, and absolutely the Grecian mouth and chin—a profusion of long straight black hair, with the whitest skin you ever saw—so white as the whitest parchment—and not a shade of colour in her cheek—none whatever—If she would be naughty, and borrow a prudent touch of complexion, she might be called beautiful. Even as it is, many think her so, although, surely, Mr Tyrrel, three colours are necessary to the female face. However, we used to call her the Welpomene of the Spring last season, as we called Lady Banks—who was not then Lady Banks—our Euphrosyne. Did we not, my dear?”

“Did we not what, madam?” said Lady Banks, in a tone something sharper than ought to have belonged to so beautiful a countenance.

“I am sorry I have started you out of your reverie, my love,” answered Lady Penelope. “I was only saying Mr. Tyrrel that you were once Euphrosyne, though now so much under the banners of Il Penseroso.”

“I do not know that I have been either one or the other,” answered Lady Banks; “one thing I certainly am not—I am not capable of understanding your ladyship’s wit and learning.”

“Poor soul!” whispered Lady Penelope to Tyrrel; “we know what we are, we know not what we may be.—And now, Mr Tyrrel, I have been your spy to guide you through the Elysium of ours, I think, in return, I deserve a little confidence in return.”

“If I had any to bestow, which could be in the slightest degree interesting to your ladyship,” answered Tyrrel.

“Oh! cruel men—he will not understand me!” exclaimed the lady.—“In plain words, then, a peep into your portfolio—just to see what objects you have rescued from natural decay, and rendered immortal by the pencil. You do not know—indeed, Mr Tyrrel, you do not know how I dote upon your ‘serenely silent art,’ accord to poetry alone—equal—superior perhaps—to music.”

“I really have little that could possibly be worth the attention of such a judge as your ladyship,” answered Tyrrel; “such trifles as your ladyship has seen, I sometimes leave at the foot of the tree I have been sketching.”

“As Orlando left his verses in the Forest of Ardenne?—Oh, the thoughtless prodigality!—Mr Winterblossom, do you hear this!—We must follow Mr Tyrrel in his walks, and glean what he leaves behind him.”

Her ladyship was here disconcerted by some laughter on Sir Bings’s side of the table, which she checked by an angry glance, and then proceeded emphatically.

“Mr Tyrrel—this must not be—this is not the way of the world, my good sir, to which even genius must stoop in flight. We must consult the engraver—though perhaps you etch as well as you draw?”

“I should suppose so,” said Mr. Winterblossom, adding in a word with difficulty, “from the freedom of Mr Tyrrel’s hand.”

“I will do it,” said Tyrrel, “since I am charged with the crime by such good judges; but it has only been by way of experiment.”

“No, no more,” said the lady; “my darling wish is accomplished! We have long desired to have the sumptuous and most romantic spots of our little Ardenne here—spots consecrated to friendship, the fine arts, the loves and the grapes, immortalized by the graver’s art, faithful to its charge of fame—you shall labour on this task, Mr Tyrrel, we will all contribute with notes and illustrations—we will all contribute—only some of us must be permitted to remain anonymous—Penny favours, you know, Mr Tyrrel, must be kept secret—And you shall be allowed the pilage of the Album—some sweet things there of Mr Chatterly’s—and Mr Edgell, a gentleman of your own profession, I am sure will lend his aid—Dr Quacklesben will contribute some scientific notions.—And for subscription.”

“Financial—financial—your ladyship, I speak to order” said the writer, interrupting Lady Penelope with a tone of impudent familiarity, which was meant doubtless for jocular ease.

“How am I out of order, Mr Methlewham?” said her ladyship, drawing herself up.

“I speak to order!—No warrants for money can be extracted before intimation to the Committee of Management.”

“Pray, who mentioned money, Mr Methlewham?” said her ladyship.—“That wretched old pettifogger,” she added in a whisper to Tyrrel, “thinks of nothing else but the filthy profit.”

“Ye spoke of subscription, my lady, which is the same thing as money, differing only in respect of time—the subscription being a contract de futuro, and having a tractus temporis in gremio.—And I have heard many honest folks in the company at the Well complain of the subscriptions as a great abuse, as obliging them either to look unlike other folk, or to go good lawful coin for bell-ringers and picture-dealers, and things they care not a pinch of snuff for.”

Several of the company, at the lower end of the table, assented both by nods and murmurs of approbation, and the writer was about to proceed, when Tyrrel with difficulty procured a hearing before the debate went farther, and assured the company that her ladyship’s goodness had led her into an error; that he had no work in hand worthy of their patronage, and, with the deepest gratitude for Lady Penelope’s goodness, had it not in his power to comply with her request. There was some intoning at her ladyship’s expense, who, as the writer slyly observed, had been something ultramarine in her patronage. Without attempting for the moment any rally, (as indeed the time which had passed since the removal of the dinner scarce permitted an opportunity,) Lady Penelope gave the signal for the ladies’ retreat, and left the gentlemen to the circulation of the bottles.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TEA-TABLE.

—While the eyes,
Watch cheer, but not intrude, well on each.—CRUYNE.

It was common at the Well, for the fair guests occasionally to give tea to the company,—such at least as, from their rank and leading in the little society, might be esteemed fit to constitute themselves patronesses of an evening; and the same lady generally carried the authority she had acquired into the ball-room, where two fiddles and a bass, at a guinea a night, with a quantum sufficit of tallow candles, (against the use of which Lady Penelope often protested,) enabled the company—to use the appropriate phrase—to close the evening on the light; fantasia for

On the present occasion, the lion of the hour, Mr. Francis Tyrrel, had so little answered the high-wrought expectations of Lady Penelope, that she rather regretted having ever given herself any trouble about him, and particularly that of having manoeuvred herself into the patronage of the tea-table for the evening, to the great expenditure of couching and corgo. Accordingly, her ladyship had no sooner summoned her own women, and her Allé de chambre, to make tea, with her page, footman, and postilion, to hand it about, (in which duty they were assisted by two richly-laced and thickly-powdered footmen of Lady Banks’s, whose jiveries put to shame the more modest garb of Lady Penelope’s, and even dimmed the glory of the suppressed coronet upon the buttons,) than she began to vilipend and depreciate what had been so long the object of her curiosity.

"This Mr. Tyrrel," she said, in a tone of authoritative decision, "seems after all a very ordinary sort of person, quite a commonplace man, who, she dared say, had considered his condition, in going to the old alehouse, much better than they had done for him, when they asked him to the Public Rooms. He had known his own place better than they did—there was nothing uncommon in his appearance or conversation—nothing at all frappant—she scarce believed he could even draw that sketch. Mr. Winterblossom, indeed, made a great deal of it; but then all the world knew that every scrap of engraving or drawing, which Mr. Winterblossom contrived to make his own, was, the instant it came into his collection, the finest thing that ever was seen—that was the way with collectors—their geese were all swans."

"And your ladyship's swan has proved but a goose, my dearest Lady Pen," said Lady Binks.

"My swan, dearest Lady Binks! I really do not know how I have deserved the appropriation."

"Do not be angry, my dear Lady Penelope; I only mean, that for a fortnight and more you have spoke constantly of this Mr. Tyrrel, and all dinner-time you spoke to him."

The fair company began to collect around, at hearing the word dear so often repeated in the same brief dialogue, which induced them to expect sport, and, like the vulgar on a similar occasion, to form a ring for the expected combatants.

"He sat betwixt us, Lady Binks," answered Lady Penelope, with dignity. "You had your usual headache, you know, and, for the credit of the company, I spoke for one."

"For two, if your ladyship pleases," replied Lady Binks. "I mean," she added, softening the expression, "for yourself and me."

"I am sorry," said Lady Penelope, "I should have spoken for one who can speak so smartly for herself, as my dear Lady Binks—I did not, by any means, desire to engross the conversation—I repeat it, there is a mistake about this man."

"I think there is," said Lady Binks, in a tone which implied something more than mere assent to Lady Penelope's proposition.

"I doubt if he is an artist at all," said the Lady Penelope; "or if he is, he must be doing things for some Magazine, or Encyclopedia, or some such matter."

"I doubt, too, if he be a professional artist," said Lady Binks. "If so, he is of the very highest class, for I have seldom seen a better-bred man."

"There are very well-bred artists," said Lady Penelope. "It is the profession of a gentleman."

"Certainly," answered Lady Binks; "but the poorer class have often to struggle with poverty and dependance. In general society, they are like commercial people in presence of their customers; and that is a difficult part to sustain. And so you see them of all sorts—shy and reserved, when they are conscious of merit—petulant and whimsical, by way of showing their independence—intrusive, in order to appear easy—and sometimes obsequious and fawning, when they chance to be of a mean spirit. But you seldom see them quite at their ease, and therefore I hold this Mr. Tyrrel to be either an artist of the first class, raised completely above the necessity and degradation of patronage, or else to be no professional artist at all."

Lady Penelope looked at Lady Binks with much such a regard as Baalam may have cast upon his ass, when he discovered the animal's capacity for holding an argument with him. She muttered to herself—

"Mon âne parle, et même il parle bien !"

But, declining the altercation which Lady Binks seemed disposed to enter into, she replied, with good humour, "Well, dearest Rachel, we will not pull caps about this man—nay, I think your good opinion of him gives him new value in my eyes. That is always the way with us, my good friend! We may confess it, when there are none of these conceited male wretches among us. We will know what he really is—he shall not wear fern-seed, and walk among us invisible thus—what say you, Maria?"

"Indeed, I say, dear Lady Penelope," answered Miss Digges, whose ready chatter we have already introduced to the reader, "he is a very handsome man, though his nose is too big, and his mouth too wide—but his teeth are like pearl—and he has such eyes!—especially when your ladyship spoke to him. I don't think you looked at his eyes—they are quite deep and dark, and full of glow, like what you read to us in the letter from that lady, about Robert Burns."

"Upon my word, miss, you come on finely!" said Lady Penelope.—"One had need take care what they read or talk about before you, I see.—Come, Jones, have mercy upon us—put an end to that symphony of tinkling cups and saucers, and let the first act of the tea-table begin, if you please."

"Does her leddyship mean the grace?" said honest Mrs. Blower, for the first time admitted into this worshipful society, and busily employed in arranging an Indian handkerchief, that might have made a mainsail for one of her husband's smuggling luggers, which she spread carefully on her knee, to prevent damage to a flowered black silk gown from the repast of tea and cake, to which she proposed to do due honour.—"Does her leddyship mean the grace? I see the minister is just coming in.—Her leddyship waits till ye say a blessing, an ye please, sir."

Mr. Winterblossom, who toddled after the chaplain, his toe having given him an alert hint to quit the dining-table, though he saw every feature in the poor woman's face swollen with desire to procure information concerning the ways and customs of the place, passed on the other side of the way, regardless of her agony of curiosity.

A moment after, she was relieved by the entrance of Dr. Quackleben, whose maxim being, that one patient was as well worth attention as another, and who knew by experience, that the honoraria of a godly wife of the Bow-head were as apt to be forthcoming, (if not more so,) as my Lady Penelope's he e'en sat himself quietly down by Mrs. Blower, and proceeded with the utmost kindness to inquire after her health, and to hope he had not forgotten taking a table-spoonful of spirits burnt to a residuum, in order to qualify the crudities.

"Indeed, Doctor," said the honest woman, "I loot the brandy burn as lang as I dought look at the gude creature wasting itself that gate—and then, when I was fain to put it out for very thrift, I did take a thimbleful of it, (although it is not the thing I am used to, Dr. Quackleben,) and I winna say but that it did me good."

"Unquestionably, madam," said the Doctor, "I am no friend to the use of alcohol in general, but there are particular cases—there are particular cases, Mrs. Blower—My venerated instructor, one of the greatest men in our profession that ever lived, took a wine-glassful of old rum, mixed with sugar, every day after his dinner."

"Ay? dear heart, he would be a comfortable doctor that," said Mrs. Blower. "He wad maybe ken something of my case. Is he leevin' think ye, sir?"

"Dead for many years, madam," said Dr. Quackleben; "and there are but few of his pupils that can fill his place, I assure ye. If I could be thought an exception, it is only because I was a favourite. Ah! blessings on the old red cloak of him!—It covered more of the healing science than the gowns of a whole modern university."

"There is ane, sir," said Mrs. Blower, "that has been muckle recommended about Edinburgh—Macgregor, I think they ca' him—folk come far and near to see him."*

"I know whom you mean, ma'am—a clever man—no denying it—a clever man—but there are certain cases—yours, for example—and I think that of many that come to drink this water—which I cannot say I think he perfectly understands—hasty—very hasty and rapid. Now I—I give the disease its own way at first—then watch it, Mrs. Blower—watch the turn of the tide."

* The late Dr. Gregory is probably intimated, as one of the celebrated Dr. Cullen's personal habits is previously mentioned. Dr. Gregory was distinguished for putting his patients on a severe regimen.

"Ay, troth, that's true," responded the widow; "John Blower was aye watching turn of tide, puir man."

"Then he is a starving doctor, Mrs. Blower—reduces diseases as soldiers do towns—by famine, not considering that the friendly inhabitants suffer as much as the hostile garrison—ahem!"

Here he gave an important and emphatic cough, and then proceeded.

"I am no friend either to excess or to violent stimulus, Mrs. Blower—but nature must be supported—a generous diet—cordials judiciously thrown in—not without the advice of a medical man—that is my opinion, Mrs. Blower, to speak as a friend—others may starve their patients if they have a mind."

"It wadna do for me, the starving, Dr. Keckerhen," said the alarmed relict,—“it wadna do for me at a’—Just a’ I can do to wear through the day with the sma’ supports that nature requires—not a soul to look after me, Doctor, since John Blower was ta’en awa.—Thank ye kindly, sir,” (to the servant who handed the tea,)—“thank ye, my bonny man,” (to the page who served the cake)—“Now, dinna, ye think, Doctor,” (in a low and confidential voice,) “that her leddyship’s tea is rather of the weakliest—water bewitched, I think—and Mrs. Jones, as they ca’ her, has cut the seedcake very thin?”

"It is the fashion, Mrs. Blower," answered Dr. Quackleben; "and her ladyship's tea is excellent. But your taste is a little chilled, which is not uncommon at the first use of the waters, so that you are not sensible of the flavour—we must support the system—reinforce the digestive powers—give me leave—you are a stranger, Mrs. Blower, and we must take care of you—I have an elixir which will put that matter to rights in a moment."

So saying, Dr. Quackleben pulled from his pocket a small portable case of medicines—"Catch me without my tools,"—he said, "here I have the real useful pharmacopœia—the rest is all humbug and hard names—this little case, with a fortnight or month, spring and fall, at St. Ronan's Well, and no one will die till his day come."

Thus boasting, the Doctor drew from his case a large vial or small flask, full of a high-coloured liquid, of which he mixed three tea-spoonfuls in Mrs. Blower's cup, who, immediately afterwards, allowed that the flavour was improved beyond all belief, and that it was "vera comfortable and restorative indeed."

"Will it not do good to my complaints, Doctor?" said Mr. Winterblossom, who had strolled towards them, and held out his cup to the physician.

"I by no means recommend it, Mr. Winterblossom," said Dr. Quackleben, shutting up his case with great coolness; "your case is œdematous, and you treat it your own way—you are as good a physician as I am, and I never interfere with another practitioner's patient."

"Well, Doctor," said Winterblossom, "I must wait till Sir Bingo comes in—he has a hunting-flask usually about him, which contains as good medicine as yours to the full."

"You will wait for Sir Bingo some time," said the Doctor; "he is a gentleman of sedentary habits—he has ordered another magnum."

"Sir Bingo is an unco name for a man o' quality, dinna ye think sae, Dr. Cocklehen?" said Mrs. Blower. "John Blower, when he was a wee bit in the wind's eye, as he ca'd it, puir fallow—used to sing a sang about a dog they ca'd Bingo, that suld hae be-langed to a farmer."

"Our Bingo is but a puppy yet, madam—or if a dog, he is a sad dog," said Mr. Winterblossom, applauding his own wit, by one of his own inimitable smiles.

"Or a mad dog, rather," said Mr. Chatterly, "for he drinks no water;" and he also smiled gracefully at the thoughts of having trumped, as it were, the president's pun.

"Twa pleasant men, Doctor," said the widow, "and so is Sir Bungy too, for that matter; but O! is nae it a pity he should bide sae lang by the bottle? It was puir John Blower's fault too, that weary tipping; when he wan to the lee-side of a bowl of punch, there was nae raising him.—But they are taking awa the things, and, Doctor, is it not an awfu' thing that the creature-comforts should hae been used without grace or thanksgiving?—that Mr. Chitterling, if he really be a minister, has muckle to answer for, that he neglects his Master's service."

"Why, madam," said the Doctor, "Mr. Chatterly is scarce arrived at the rank of a minister plenipotentiary."

"A minister potentiary—ah, Doctor, I doubt that is some jest of yours," said the widow; "that's sae like puir John Blower. When I wad hae had him gie up the Lovely Peggy, ship and cargo, (the vessel was named after me, Doctor Kittleben,) to be remembered in the prayers o' the congregation, he wad say to me, 'they may pray that stand the risk, Peggy Bryce, for I've made insurance.' He was a merry man, Doctor; but he had the root of the matter in him, for a' his light way of speaking, as deep as ony skipper that ever loosed anchor from Leith Roads. I hae been a forsaken creature since his death—O the weary days and nights that I have had!—and the weight on the spirits—the spirits, Doctor!—though I canna say I hae been easier since I hae been at the Wall than even now—if I kend what I was awing ye for clickstir, Doctor, for it's done me muckle heart's good, for-by the opening of my mind to you."

"Fie, fie, ma'am," said the Doctor, as the widow pulled out a seal-skin pouch, such as sailors carry tobacco in, but apparently well-stuffed with bank-notes,—"Fie, fie, madam—I am no apothecary—I have my diploma from Leyden—a regular physician, madam,—the elixir is heartily at your service; and should you want any advice, no man will be prouder to assist you than your humble servant."

"I am sure I am muckle obliged to your kindness, Dr. Kickalpin," said the widow, folding up her pouch; "this was puir John Blower's spleuchan,* as they ca' it—I e'en wear it for his sake. He was a kind man, and left me comfortable in world's gudes; but comforts hae their cumber,—to be a lone woman is a sair weird, Dr. Kittlepin."

Dr. Quackleben drew his chair a little nearer that of the widow, and entered into a closer communication with her, in a tone doubtless of more delicate consolation than was fit for the ears of the company at large.

One of the chief delights of a watering-place is, that every one's affairs seem to be put under the special surveillance of the whole company, so that, in all probability, the various flirtations, liaisons, and so forth, which naturally take place in the society, are not only the subject of amusement to the parties engaged, but also to the lookers on; that is to say, generally speaking, to the whole community, of which for the time the said parties are members. Lady Penelope, the presiding goddess of the region, watchful over all her circle, was not long of observing that the Doctor seemed to be suddenly engaged in close communication with the widow, and that he had even ventured to take hold of her fair plump hand, with a manner which partook at once of the gallant suitor, and of the medical adviser.

"For the love of Heaven," said her ladyship, "who can that comely dame be, on whom our excellent and learned Doctor looks with such uncommon regard?"

"Fat, fair, and forty," said Mr. Winterblossom; "that is all I know of her—a mercantile person."

"A carrack, Sir President," said the chaplain, "richly laden with colonial produce, by name the Lovely Peggy Bryce—no master—the late John Blower of North Leith having pushed off his boat for the Stygian Creek, and left the vessel without a hand on board."

"The Doctor," said Lady Penelope, turning her glass towards them, "seems willing to play the part of pilot."

* A fur pouch for keeping tobacco.

"I dare say he will be willing to change her name and register," said Mr. Chatterly.

"He can be no less in common requital," said Winterblossom. "She has changed his name six times in the five minutes that I stood within hearing of them."

"What do you think of the matter, my dear, Lady Binks?" said Lady Penelope.

"Madam?" said Lady Binks, starting from a reverie, and answering as one who either had not heard, or did not understand the question.

"I mean, what think you of what is going on yonder?"

Lady Binks turned her glass in the direction of Lady Penelope's glance, fixed the widow and the Doctor with one bold fashionable stare, and then dropping her hand slowly, said with indifference, "I really see nothing there worth thinking about."

"I dare say it is a fine thing to be married," said Lady Penelope; "one's thoughts, I suppose, are so much engrossed with one's own perfect happiness, that they have neither time nor inclination to laugh like other folks. Miss Rachel Bonnyrigg would have laughed till her eyes ran over, had she seen what Lady Binks cares so little about—I dare say it must be an all-sufficient happiness to be married."

"He would be a happy man that could convince your ladyship of that in good earnest," said Mr. Winterblossom.

"Oh, who knows—the whim may strike me," replied the lady; "but no—no—no;—and that is three times."

"Say it sixteen times more," said the gallant president, "and let nineteen nay-says be a grant."

"If I should say a thousand Noes, there exists not the alchymy in living man that could extract one Yes out of the whole mass," said her ladyship. "Blessed be the memory of Queen Bess!—She set us all an example to keep power when we have it—What noise is that?"

"Only the usual after-dinner quarrel," said the divine. "I hear the Captain's voice, else most silent, commanding them to keep peace, in the devil's name and that of the ladies."

"Upon my word, dearest Lady Binks, this is too bad of that lord and master of yours, and of Mowbray, who might have more sense, and of the rest of that claret-drinking set, to be quarrelling and alarming our nerves every evening with presenting their pistols perpetually at each other, like sportsmen confined to the house upon a rainy 12th of August. I am tired of the Peace-maker—he but skins the business over in one case to have it break out elsewhere.—What think you, love, if we were to give out in orders, that the next quarrel which may arise, shall be bona fide fought to an end?—We will all go out and see it, and wear the colours on each side; and if there should a funeral come of it, we will attend it in a body.—Weeds are so becoming!—Are they not, my dear Lady Binks? Look at Widow Blower in her deep black—don't you envy her, my love?"

Lady Binks seemed about to make a sharp and hasty answer, but checked herself, perhaps under the recollection that she could not prudently come to an open breach with Lady Penelope.—At the same moment the door opened, and a lady dressed in a riding-habit, and wearing a black veil over her hat, appeared at the entry of the apartment.

"Angels and ministers of grace!" exclaimed Lady Penelope, with her very best tragic start—"my dearest Clara, why so late? and why thus? Will you step to my dressing-room—Jones will get you one of my gowns—we are just of a size, you know—do, pray—let me be vain of something of my own for once, by seeing you wear it."

This was spoken in the tone of the fondest female friendship, and at the same time the fair hostess bestowed on Miss Mowbray one of those tender caresses, which ladies—God bless them!—sometimes bestow on each other with unnecessary prodigality, to the great discontent and envy of the male spectators.

"You are fluttered, my dearest Clara—you are feverish—I am sure you are," continued the sweetly anxious Lady Penelope; "let me persuade you to lie down."

"Indeed you are mistaken, Lady Penelope," said Miss Mowbray, who seemed to receive much as a matter of course her ladyship's profusion of affectionate politeness:—"I am heated, and my pony trotted hard, that is the whole mystery.—Let me have a cup of tea, Mrs. Jones, and the matter is ended."

"Fresh tea, Jones, directly," said Lady Penelope, and led her passive friend to her own corner, as she was pleased to call the recess, in which she held her little court—ladies and gentlemen curtsying and bowing as she passed; to which civilities the new guest made no more return, than the most ordinary politeness rendered unavoidable.

Lady Binks did not rise to receive her, but sat upright in her chair, and bent her head very stiffly; a courtesy which Miss Mowbray returned in the same stately manner, without farther greeting on either side.

"Now, wha can that be, Doctor?" said the Widow Blower—"mind ye have promised to tell me all about the grand folk—wha can that be that Leddy Penelope hauds such a racket wi'?—and what for does she come wi' a habit and a beaver-hat, when we are a' (a glance at her own gown) in our silks and sauns?"

"To tell you who she is, my dear Mrs. Blower, is very easy," said the officious Doctor. "She is Miss Clara Mowbray, sister to the Lord of the Manor—the gentleman who wears the green coat, with an arrow on the cape. To tell why she wears that habit, or does any thing else, would be rather beyond doctor's skill. Truth is, I have always thought she was a little—a very little—touched—call it nerves—hypocondria—or what you will."

"Lord help us, puir thing!" said the compassionate widow.—"And troth it looks like it. But it's a shame to let her go loose, Doctor—she might hurt hersell, or somebody. See, she has ta'en the knife!—O, it's only to cut a shave of the diet-loaf. She winna let the powder-monkey of a boy help her. There's judgment in that though, Doctor, for she can cut thick or thin as she likes.—Dear me! she has no taken mair than a crumb, that ane would pit between the wires of a canary-bird's cage, after all. I wish she would lift up that lang veil, or put off that riding-skirt, Doctor. She should really be showed the regulations, Doctor Kickelshin."

"She cares about no rules we can make, Mrs. Blower," said the Doctor; "and her brother's will and pleasure, and Lady Penelope's whim of indulging her, carry her through in every thing. They should take advice on her case."

"Ay, truly, it's time to take advice, when young creatures like her caper in amang dressed laddies just as if they were come from scampering on Leith sands.—Such a wark as my ledly makes wi' her, Doctor! Ye would think they were baith fools of a feather."

"They might have flown on one wing, for what I know," said Dr. Quackleben; "but there was early and sound advice taken in Lady Penelope's case. My friend, the late Earl of Featherhead, was a man of judgment—did little in his family but by rule of medicine—so that, what with the waters, and what with my own care, Lady Penelope is only freakish—fanciful—that's all—and her quality bears it out—the peccant principle might have broken out under other treatment."

"Ay—she has been weel-friended," said the widow; "but this bairn Mowbray, puir thing! how came she to be sae left to hersell?"

"Her mother was dead—her father thought of no thing but his sports," said the Doctor. "Her brother was educated in England, and cared for nobody but himself, if he had been here. What education she got was at her own hand—what reading she read was in a library full of old romances—what friends or company she had was what chance sent her—then no family-physician, not even a good surgeon, within ten miles! And so you cannot wonder if the poor thing became unsettled."

"Puir thing!—no doctor—nor even a surgeon!—But, doctor," said the widow, "may be the pui thing had the enjoyment of her health, ye ken, and then—

"Ah! ha! ha!—why then, madam, she needed a physician far more than if she had been delicate. A skilful physician, Mrs. Blower, knows how to bring down that robust health, which is a very alarming state of the frame when it is considered secundum artem. Most sudden deaths happen when people are in a robust state of health. Ah! that state of perfect health is what the doctor dreads most on behalf of his patient."

"Ay, ay, Doctor?—I am quite sensible, nae doubt," said the widow, "of the great advantage of having a skeelfu' person about ane."

Here the Doctor's voice, in his earnestness to convince Mrs. Blower of the danger of supposing herself capable of living and breathing without a medical nan's permission, sunk into a soft pleading tone, of which our reporter could not catch the sound. He was, as great orators will sometimes be, "inaudible in the gallery."

Mean while, Lady Penelope overwhelmed Clara Mowbray with her caresses. In what degree her adyship, at her heart, loved this young person, might be difficult to ascertain,—probably in the degree in which a child loves a favourite toy. But Clara was a toy not always to be come by—as whimsical in her way as her ladyship in her own, only that poor Clara's singularities were real, and her ladyship's chiefly affected. Without adopting the harshness of the Doctor's conclusions concerning the former, she was certainly unequal in her spirits; and her occasional fits of levity were chequered by very long intervals of sadness. Her levity also appeared, in the world's eye, greater than it really was; for she had never been under the restraint of society which was really good, and entertained an undue contempt for that which she sometimes mingled with; having unhappily none to teach her the important truth, that some forms and restraints are to be observed, less in respect to others than to ourselves. Her dress, her manners, and her ideas, were therefore very much her own; and though they became her wonderfully, yet, like Ophelia's garlands, and wild snatches of melody, they were calculated to excite compassion and melancholy, even while they amused the observer.

"And why came you not to dinner?—We expected you—your throne was prepared."

"I had scarce come to tea," said Miss Mowbray, "of my own free will. But my brother says your ladyship proposes to come to Shaws-Castle, and he insisted it was quite right and necessary, to confirm you in so flattering a purpose, that I should come and say, Pray do, Lady Penelope; and so now here am I to say, Pray, do come."

"Is an invitation so flattering limited to me alone, my dear Clara?—Lady Binks will be jealous."

"Bring Lady Binks, if she has the condescension to honour us"—[a bow was very stiffly exchanged between the ladies]—"bring Mr. Springblossom—Winterblossom—and all the lions and lionesses—we have room for the whole collection. My brother, I suppose, will bring his own particular regiment of bears, which, with the usual assortment of monkeys seen in all caravans, will complete the menagerie. How you are to be entertained at Shaws-Castle, is, I thank Heaven, not my business, but John's."

"We shall want no formal entertainment, my love," said Lady Penelope; "a déjeuner à la fourchette—we know, Clara, you would die of doing the honours of a formal dinner."

"Not a bit; I should live long enough to make my will, and bequeath all large parties to old Nick, who invented them."

"Miss Mowbray," said Lady Binks, who had been thwarted by this free-spoken young lady, both in her former character of a coquette and romp, and in that of a prude which she at present wore—"Miss Mowbray declares for 'Champagne and a chicken at last.'"

"The chicken without the champagne, if you please," said Miss Mowbray; "I have known ladies pay dear to have champagne on the board.—By the by, Lady Penelope, you have not your collection in the same order and discipline as Pidcock and Polito. There was much growling and snarling in the lower den when I passed it."

"It was feeding-time, my love," said Lady Penelope; "and the lower animals of every class become pugnacious at that hour—you see all our safer and well-conditioned animals are loose, and in good order."

"Oh, yes—in the keeper's presence, you know—Well, I must venture to cross the hall again among all that growling and grumbling—I would I had the fairy prince's quarters of mutton to toss among them if they should break out—He, I mean, who fetched water from the Fountain of Lions. However, on second thoughts, I will take the back way, and avoid them.—What says honest Bottom?—

'For if they should as lions come in strife Into such place, 'twere pity of their life.'"

"Shall I go with you, my dear?" said Lady Penelope.

"No—I have too great a soul for that—I think some of them are lions only as far as the hide is concerned."

"But why would you go so soon, Clara?"

"Because my errand is finished—have I not invited you and yours? and would not Lord Chesterfield himself allow I have done the polite thing?"

"But you have spoke to none of the company—how can you be so odd, my love?" said her ladyship.

"Why, I spoke to them all when I spoke to you and Lady Binks—but I am a good girl, and will do as I am bid."

So saying, she looked round the company, and addressed each of them with an affectation of interest and politeness, which thinly concealed scorn and contempt.

"Mr. Winterblossom, I hope the gout is better—Mr. Robert Rymar—I have escaped calling him Thomas for once—I hope the public give encouragement to the muses—Mr. Keelavine, I trust your pencil is busy—Mr. Chatterly, I have no doubt your flock improves—Dr. Quackleben, I am sure your patients recover.—These are all the especials of the worthy company I know—for the rest, health to the sick, and pleasure to the healthy!"

"You are not going in reality, my love?" said Lady Penelope; "these hasty rides agitate your nerves—they do, indeed—you should be cautious—Shall I speak to Quackleben?"

"To neither Quack nor quackle, on my account, my dear lady. It is not as you would seem to say, by your winking at Lady Binks—it is not, indeed—I shall be no Lady Clementina, to be the wonder and pity of the spring of St. Ronan's—No Ophelia neither—though I will say with her, Good-night, ladies—Good night, sweet ladies!—and now—not my coach, my coach—but my horse, my horse!"

So saying, she tripped out of the room by a side passage, leaving the ladies looking at each other significantly, and shaking their heads with an expression of much import.

"Something has ruffled the poor unhappy girl," said Lady Penelope; "I never saw her so very odd before."

"Were I to speak my mind," said Lady Binks, "I think, as Mrs. Highmore says in the farce, her madness is but a poor excuse for her impertinence."

"Oh fie! my sweet Lady Binks," said Lady Penelope, "spare my poor favourite! You, surely, of all others, should forgive the excesses of an amiable eccentricity of temper.—Forgive me, my love, but I must defend an absent friend—My Lady Binks, I am very sure, is too generous and candid to 'Hate for arts which caused herself to rise.'"

"Not being conscious of any high elevation, my lady," answered Lady Binks, "I do not know any arts I have been under the necessity of practising to attain it. I suppose a Scotch lady of an ancient family may become the wife of an English baronet, and no very extraordinary great cause to wonder at it."

"No, surely—but people in this world will, you know wonder at nothing," answered Lady Penelope.

"If you envy me my poor quiz, Sir Bingo, I'll get you a better, Lady Pen."

"I don't doubt your talents, my dear, but when I want one, I will get one for myself.—But here comes the whole party of quizzes.—Joliffe, offer the gentlemen tea—then get the floor ready for the dancers, and set the card-tables in the next room."

CHAPTER VIII.

AFTER DINNER.

They draw the cork, they broach the barrel,
And first they kiss, and then they quarrel.—Pope.

If the reader has attended much to the manners of the canine race, he may have remarked the very different manner in which the individuals of the different sexes carry on their quarrels among each other. The females are testy, petulant, and very apt to indulge their impatient dislike of each other's presence, or the spirit of rivalry which it produces, in a sudden bark and snap, which last is generally made as much at advantage as possible. But these ebullitions of peevishness lead to no very serious or prosecuted conflict; the affair begins and ends in a moment. Not so the ire of the male dogs, which, once produced and excited by growls of mutual offence and defiance, leads generally to a fierce and obstinate contest; in which, if the parties be dogs of game, and well-matched, they grapple, tattle, tear, roll each other in the kennel, and can only be separated by choking them with their own collars, till they lose wind and hold at the same time, or by surprising them out of their wrath by sousing them with cold water.

The simile, though a currish one, will hold good in its application to the human race. While the ladies in the tea-room of the Fox Hotel were engaged in the light snappish velitation, or skirmish, which we have described, the gentlemen who remained in the parlour were more than once like to have quarrelled more seriously.

We have mentioned the weighty reasons which induced Mr. Mowbray to look upon the stranger whom a general invitation had brought into their society, with unfavourable prepossessions; and these were far from being abated by the demeanour of Tyrrel, which, though perfectly well-bred, indicated a sense of equality, which the young Laird of St. Ronan's considered as extremely presumptuous.

As for Sir Bingo, he already began to nourish the genuine hatred always entertained by a mean spirit against an antagonist, before whom it is conscious of having made a dishonourable retreat. He forgot not the manner, look, and tone, with which Tyrrel had checked his unauthorized intrusion; and though he had sunk beneath it at the moment, the recollection rankled in his heart as an affront to be avenged. As he drank his wine, courage, the want of which was, in his more sober moments, a check upon his bad temper, began to inflame his malignity, and he ventured upon several occasions to show his spleen, by contradicting Tyrrel more flatly than good manners permitted upon so short an acquaintance, and without any provocation. Tyrrel saw his ill humour and despised it, as that of an overgrown school-boy, whom it was not worth his while to answer according to his folly.

One of the apparent causes of the Baronet's rudeness was indeed childish enough. The company were talking of shooting, the most animating topic of conversation among Scottish country gentlemen of the younger class, and Tyrrel had mentioned something of a favourite setter, an uncommonly handsome dog, from which he had been for sometime separated, but which he expected would rejoin him in the course of next week.

"A setter!" retorted Sir Bingo, with a sneer; "a pointer I suppose you mean?"

"No, sir," said Tyrrel; "I am perfectly aware of the difference betwixt a setter and a pointer, and I know the old-fashioned setter is become unfashionable among modern sportsmen. But I love my dog as a companion, as well as for his merits in the field; and a setter is more sagacious, more attached, and fitter for his place on the hearth-rug, than a pointer —not," he added, "from any deficiency of intellect on the pointer's part, but he is generally so abused while in the management of brutal breakers and grooms, that he loses all excepting his professional accomplishments, of finding and standing steady to game."

"And who the d—l desires he should have more?" said Sir Bingo.

"Many people, Sir Bingo," replied Tyrrel, "have been of opinion, that both dogs and men may follow sport indifferently well, though they do happen, at the same time, to be fit for mixing in friendly intercourse in society."

"That is for licking trenchers, and scratching copper, I suppose," said the Baronet, sotto voce; and added, in a louder and more distinct tone,—"He never before heard that a setter was fit to follow any man's heels but a poacher's."

"You know it now then, Sir Bingo," answered Tyrrel; "and I hope you will not fall into so great a mistake again."

The Peace-maker here seemed to think his interference necessary, and, surmounting his taciturnity, made the following pithy speech:—"By Cot! and do you see, as you are looking for my opinion, I think there is no dispute in the matter—because, by Cot! it occurs to me, d'ye see, that ye are both right, by Cot! It may do ferry well for my excellent friend Sir Bingo who hath stables, and kennels, and what not, to maintain the six filthy prutes that are yelping and yowling all the day, and all the night too, under my window, by Cot!—And if they are yelping and yowling there, may I never die but I wish they were yelping and yowling somewhere else. But then there's many a man who may be as cool a gentleman at the bottom as my worthy friend Sir Bingo, though it may be that he is poor; and if he is poor—and as if it might be my own case, or that of this honest gentleman, Mr. Tirl—is that a reason or a law, that he is not to keep a prute of a tog, to help him to take his sports and his pleasures? and if he has not a stable or a kennel to put the creature into, must he not keep it in his pit of room, or upon his parlour hearth, seeing that Lucke Dods would make the kitchen too hot for the pair—and so, if Mr. Tirl finds a setter more fitter for his purpose than a pointer, by Cot, I know no law against it, else may I never die the black death."

If this oration appear rather long for the occasion, the reader must recollect that Captain MacTurk had in all probability the trouble of translating it from the periphrastic language of Ossian, in which it was originally conceived in his own mind.

The Man of Law replied to the Man of Peace, "Ye are mistaken for ance in your life, Captain, for there is a law against setters; and I will undertake to prove them to be the 'lying dogs' which are mentioned in the auld Scots statute, and which all and sundry are discharged to keep, under a penalty of"—

Here the Captain broke in, with a very solemn mien and dignified manner—"By Cot! Master Meiklewham, and I shall be asking what you mean by talking to me of being mistaken, and about lying togs, sir—because I would have you to know, and to believe, and to very well consider, that I never was mistaken in my life, sir, unless it was when I took you for a gentleman."

"No offence, Captain," said Mr. Meiklewham; "dinna break the wand of peace, man, you that should be the first to keep it.—He is as cankered," continued the Man of Law, apart to his patron, "as an auld Highland terrier, that snaps at whatever comes near it—but I tell you ae thing, St. Ronan's, and that is on saul and conscience, that I believe this is the very lad Tirl, that I raised a summons against before the justices—him and another hempie—in your father's time, for shooting on the Spring-well-head muirs."

"The devil you did, Mick!" replied the Lord of the Manor, also aside;—"Well I am obliged to you for giving me some reason for the ill thoughts I had of him—I knew he was some trumpery scamp—I'll blow him, by"—

"Whisht—stop—hush—haud your tongue, St. Ronan's—keep a calm sough—ye see, I intended the process, by your worthy father's desire, before the Magistrate—but I can do no more. The old sheriff-clerk stood the lad's friend, and some of the justices thought it was but a mistake of the marches, and one we could get a judgment and your father was very ill of the gout, and I was forced to see him, and so I was fain to let the process sleep, for fear they had been acquitted. So ye had better go on cautiously to work, St. Ronan's, for though they were common-law, they were not convict."

"Could you not take up the action again?" said Mr. Mowbray.

"Where! it's been proscribed six or seven years ago. It is a great shame, St. Ronan's, that the same laws, which are the very best protection that is left to country gentlemen against the encroachment of their inferiors, run out short a course of prescription—a poacher may just pick ye back and forward like a bee in a blanket, (w^o pardon)—hap ye out of ye county and into another at their pleasure, like p^oys—and unless ye get your thumb-nail on them in the very nick o' time, ye may die on a dish of p^oys—son, and sup upon an abolitioner."

"It is a shame indeed," said Mowbray, turning from his confidant and agent, and addressing himself to the company in general, yet not without a peculiar look directed to Tyrrel.

"What is a shame, sir?" said Tyrrel, conceiving that the observation was particularly addressed to him.

"That we should have so many poachers upon our game, sir," answered St. Ronan's. "I sometimes regret having countenanced the Well here, when I think how many game it has brought on my property every season."

"Hout f^o! hout awa, St. Ronan's!" said his Men of Law. "no countenance the Well? What would be country-made be without it, I would be glad to see? It's the greatest improvement that has been made on this country since the year forty five. Na, na, it's no the Well that's to blame for the poaching and delinquencies on the game. We mean to the hilt for the howl of that kind of cattle. Our aim at the Well are clear and express against trespassers on the game."

"I can't think," said the Squire, "what made my other call the property of the old change-house you-lar, to the bag that keeps it open out of spite, I think, and so harbours thieves and vagabonds! I cannot conceive what made him do so foolish a thing?"

"Probably because your father wanted money, sir," said Tyrrel dryly, and my worthy landlady, Mrs. Judds, had got none.—You know, I presume, sir, but I lodge there?"

"Oh, sir, repeat! Mowbray, in a tone betwixt mere and civility, you cannot suppose the present company is shocked to, I only presumed to mention as a fact, that we have been annoyed with unqualified simple shooting on our grounds, without either liberty or license. And I hope to have her sign taken down as it—that is all.—There was the same plagu in my other's days, I think, Mick?"

But Mr. Mowbray, who did not like Tyrrel's talk as well as to induce him to become approver of the occasion, replied with an inarticulate grunt, addressed to the company, and a private admonition to his patron's own ear, "to let sleeping dogs lie."

"I can scarce forbear the fellow," said St. Ronan's, "and yet I cannot well tell where my dislike to him is—but it would be a—d—d folly to turn out with him or nothing; and so, honest Mick, I will be as quiet as I can."

"And that you may be so," said Mowbray, "I think you had best take no more wine."

"I think so too," said the Squire, "for each glass I drink in his company gives me the heartburn—yet the man is not different from other rascals either—but there is something about him intolerable to me."

So saying, he pushed back his chair from the table, and, re-ple of a receptor—after the pattern of the Lord, all the company arose.

Sir Bings got up with reluctance, which he testified by two or three deep groans, as he followed the rest of the company into the outer apartment, which served as an entrance-hall, and divided the dining-parlour from the tea-room, as it was called. Here, while the party were assuming their hats, for the purpose of joining the ladies' society, (which old-fashioned folk used only to take up for that of going into the open air,) Tyrrel asked a smart footman, who stood near, to hand him the bat which lay on the table beyond.

"Call your own servant, sir," answered the fellow, with the true assistance of a pampous manual.

"Your master," answered Tyrrel, "ought to have taught you good manners, my friend, before bringing you here."

"Sir Bings links is my master," said the fellow, in the same intemperate tone as before.

"Now for it, Bings," said Mowbray, who was aware that the Baronet's pet courage had arrived at fighting pitch.

"Yes," said Sir Bings aloud, and more articulately than usual. "The fellow is my servant—what has any one to say to it?"

"I at least have my mouth stopped," answered Tyrrel, with perfect composure. "I should have been surprised to have found Sir Bings's servant better bred than himself."

"What d'ye mean by that, sir?" said Sir Bings, coming up in an offensive attitude, for he was no mean pupil of the Five-Court—"What d'ye mean by that? D—n you, sir! I'll serve you out before you can say dumpling."

"And I, Sir Bings, unless you presently lay aside that look and manner, will knock you down before you can cry help."

The visitor held in his hand a slip of oak, with which he gave a flourish, that, however slight, intimated some acquaintance with the noble art of single-stick. From this demonstration Sir Bings thought it prudent somewhat to recede, though backed by a party of friends, who, in their zeal for his honour, would rather have seen his bones broken in conflict with him, than his honour injured by a discreditable retreat; and Tyrrel seemed to have some inclination to indulge them. But, at the very instant when his hand was raised with a motion of no doubtful import, a whispering voice, close to his ear, pronounced the emphatic words—"Are you a man?"

Not the thrilling tone with which our immortal Siddons used to electrify the scene, when she uttered the same whisper, ever had a more powerful effect upon an auditor than had three unexpected words on him, in whom they were now addressed. Tyrrel forgot every thing—his quarrel, the circumstances in which he was placed—the company. The crowd was to him at once annihilated, and life seemed to have no other object than to follow the person who had spoken. But suddenly as he turned, the disappearance of the monitor was at least equally so, for amid the group of commonplace countenances by which he was surrounded, there was none which asserted to the tone and words, which possessed such a power over him. "Make way," he said, to those who surrounded him; and it was in the tone of one who was prepared, if necessary, to make way for himself.

Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's stepped forward. "Come, sir," said he, "this will not do—you have come here, a stranger among us, to assume airs and dignity, which, by G—d, would become a duke, or a prince! We must know who and what you are, before we permit you to carry your high tone any farther."

This address seemed at once to arrest Tyrrel's anger, and his impatience to leave the company. He turned to Mowbray, collected his thoughts for an instant, and then answered him thus—"Mr. Mowbray, I seek no quarrel with any one here—with you, in particular, I am most unwilling to have any disagreement. I came here by invitation, not certainly expecting much pleasure, but, at the same time, supposing myself secure from necessity. In the last point, I find myself mistaken, and therefore wish the company good-night. I must also make my adieu to the ladies."

So saying, he walked several steps, yet, as it seemed, rather irresolutely, towards the door of the card-room—and then, to the increased surprise of the company, stopped suddenly, and muttering something about the “untitness of the time,” turning on his heel, and bowing haughtily, as there was way made for him, walked in the opposite direction towards the door which led to the outer hall.

“D—me, Sir Bingo, will you let him off?” said Mowbray, who seemed to delight in pushing his friend into new scrapes—“To him, man—to him—he shows the white feather.”

Sir Bingo, thus encouraged, planted himself with a look of defiance exactly between Tyrrel and the door; upon which the retreating guest, bestowing on him most emphatically the epithet Fool, seized him by the collar, and flung him out of his way with some violence.

“I am to be found at the Old Town of St. Ronan’s by whomsoever has any concern with me.”—Without waiting the issue of this aggression farther than to utter these words, Tyrrel left the hotel. He stopped in the court-yard, however, with the air of one uncertain whither he intended to go, and who was desirous to ask some question, which seemed to die upon his tongue. At length his eye fell upon a groom who stood not far from the door of the inn, holding, in his hand a handsome pony, with a side-saddle.

“Whose?”—said Tyrrel—but the rest of the question he seemed unable to utter.

The man, however, replied, as if he had heard the whole interrogation.—“Miss Mowbray’s, sir, of St. Ronan’s—she leaves directly—and so I am walking the pony—a clever thing, sir, for a lady.”

“She returns to Shaws-Castle by the Buck-stane road?”

“I suppose so, sir,” said the groom. “It is the nighest, and Miss Clara cares little for rough roads. Zounds! She can spank it over wet and dry.”

Tyrrel turned away from the man, and hastily left the hotel—not, however, by the road which led to the Aultoun, but by a footpath among the natural copse-wood, which, following the course of the brook, intersected the usual horse-road to Shaws-Castle, the seat of Mr. Mowbray, at a romantic spot called the Buck-stane.

In a small peninsula, formed by a winding of the brook, was situated, on a rising hillock, a large rough-hewn pillar of stone, said by tradition to commemorate the fall of a stag of unusual speed, size, and strength, whose flight, after having lasted through a whole summer’s day, had there terminated in death, to the honour and glory of some ancient baron of St. Ronan’s, and of his stanch hounds. During the periodical cuttings of the copse, which the necessities of the family of St. Ronan’s brought round more frequently than Ponty would have recommended, some oaks had been spared in the neighbourhood of this massive obelisk, old enough perhaps to have heard the whoop and halloo which followed the fall of the stag, and to have witnessed the raising of the rude monument by which that great event was commemorated. These trees, with their broad spreading boughs, made a twilight even of noon-day; and, now that the sun was approaching its setting point, their shade already anticipated night. This was especially the case where three or four of them stretched their arms over a deep gully, through which winded the horse-path to Shaws-Castle, at a point about a pistol-shot distant from the Buck-stane. As the principal access to Mr. Mowbray’s mansion was by a carriageway, which passed in a different direction, the present path was left almost in a state of nature, full of large stones, and broken by gullies, delightful, from the varied character of its banks, to the picturesque traveller, and most inconvenient, nay dangerous, to him who had a stumbling horse.

The footpath to the Buck-stane, which here joined the bridle-road, had been constructed, at the expense of a subscription, under the direction of Mr. Winterblossom, who had taste enough to see the beauties of this secluded spot, which was exactly such as in earlier times might have harboured the ambush of some marauding chief. This recollection had not escaped Tyrrel, to whom the whole scenery was familiar, who now hastened to the spot, as one which peculiarly suited his present purpose. He sat down by one of the larger projecting trees, and, screened by its enormous branches from observation, was enabled to watch the road from the Hotel for a great part of its extent, while he was himself invisible to any who might travel upon it.

Mean while his sudden departure excited a considerable sensation among the party whom he had just left, and who were induced to form conclusions not very favourable to his character. Sir Bingo, in particular, blustered loudly and more loudly, in proportion to the increasing distance betwixt himself and his antagonist, declaring his resolution to be revenged on the scoundrel for his insolence—to drive him from the neighbourhood—and I know not what other menaces of formidable import. The devil in the old stories of diablerie, was always sure to start up at the elbow of any one who nursed diabolical purposes, and only wanted a little backing from the foul fiend to carry his imaginations into action. The noble Captain MacTurk had so far this property of his infernal majesty, that the least hint of an approaching quarrel drew him always to the vicinity of the party concerned. He was now at Sir Bingo’s side, and was taking his own view of the matter, in his character of peace-maker.

“By Cot! and it’s very exceedingly true, my good friend, Sir Bincó—and as you say, it concerns your honour, and the honour of the place, and credit and character of the whole company, by Cot! that this matter be properly looked after; for, as I think he laid hands on your body, my excellent good friend.”

“Hands, Captain MacTurk!” exclaimed Sir Bingo, in some confusion; “no, blast him—not so bad as that neither—if he had, I should have handed him over the window—but, by —, the fellow had the impudence to offer to collar me—I had just stepped back to square at him, when, curse me, the blackguard ran away.”

“Right, vara right, Sir Bingo,” said the Man of Law, “a vara perfect blackguard, a poaching soring sort of fallow, that I will have scoured out of the country before he be three days aulder. Fash you your beard nae farther about the matter, Sir Bincó.”

“By Cot! but I can tell you, Mr. Meiklewham,” said the Man of Peace, with great solemnity of visage, “that you are scalding your lips in other folk’s kae, and that it is necessary for the credit, and honour, and respect of this company, at the Well of St. Ronan’s that Sir Bingo goes by more competent advice than yours upon the present occasion, Mr. Meiklewham; for though your counsel may do very well in a small debt court, here, do you see, Mr. Meiklewham, is a question of honour, which is not a thing in your line, as I take it.”

“No, before George! it is not,” answered Meiklewham; “e’en take it all to yoursell, Captain, and meikle ye are likely to make on’t.”

“Then,” said the Captain, “Sir Bincó, I will beg the favour of your company to the smoking room where we may have a cigar and a glass of gin-twist; and we will consider how the honour of the company must be supported and upholden upon the present conjuncture.”

The Baronet complied with this invitation, as much perhaps, in consequence of the medium through which the Captain intended to convey his warlike counsels, as for the pleasure with which he anticipated the result of these counsels themselves. He followed the military step of his leader, whose stride was more stiff, and his form more perpendicular, when exalted by the consciousness of an approaching quarrel, to the smoking-room, where, sighing as he lighted his cigar, Sir Bingo prepared to listen to the words of wisdom and valour, as they should flow in mingled stream from the lips of Captain MacTurk.

Mean while the rest of the company joined the ladies. “Here has been Clara,” said Lady Penelope to Mr. Mowbray; “here has been Miss Mowbray among us, like the ray of a sun which does but dazzle and die.”

“Ah, poor Clara,” said Mowbray; “I thought I saw her way through the crowd a little while [was not sure.]

said Lady Penelope, "she has asked us all to Shaw-Castle on Thursday, to a déjeuner à la—I trust you confirm your sister's invitation?"

"Oh, yes," replied Mowbray; "truly glad Clara has had the grace to think we shall acquit ourselves is a different matter—neither she nor I are much accustomed to be a hostess."

"It will be delightful, I am sure," said Lady Penelope. "Clara has a grace in every thing she does, you, Mr. Mowbray, can be a perfectly well-mannered man—when you please."

"Your qualification is severe—Well—good manners—speed—I will certainly please to do my duty. I see your ladyship at Shaw-Castle, and received no company this many a day.—I have lived a wild life of it, each in their own way," said Lady Binks, "if I presume to speak—I think you do suffer your mind about a little too much without an

"I know Miss Mowbray rides as a woman before, but still an accident may happen." "Accident?" replied Mowbray—"Ah, Lady Binks, accidents happen as frequently when ladies are alone as when they are without them."

"Yes, who, in her maiden state, had cantered all about these woods under Sir Bingo's eye, looked spiteful, and was silent."

"Yes," said John Mowbray, more lightly, "the risk, after all? There are no wolves in the woods to eat up our pretty Red-Riding Hoods; and as for the accidents—except those of Lady Penelope's raw the ear of Cybele," said Mr. Chatterly. Lady Penelope luckily did not understand the allusion, which was indeed better intended than imagination!" she said; "what have you done with the lion of the day? I see Mr. Tyrrel no where shining an additional bottle with Sir Bingo?" "Tyrrel, madam," said Mowbray, "has acted like the lion rampant, and the lion passant: he has quarrelled, and he has run away—fled from the lion of your doughty knight, Lady Binks."

"Sure I hope not," said Lady Binks; "my sister's unsuccessful campaigns have been unable to change his taste for quarrels—a victory would have been a man of him for life."

"Inconvenience might bring its own consolation," said Winterblossom, apart to Mowbray; "as do not usually live long."

"Oh," replied Mowbray, "the lady's despair, she looks out just now, even in her own despite, is rational—absolutely legitimate. Sir Bingo will have no chance that way."

"He then made his bow to Lady Penelope, in answer to her request that he would join the card-table, observed, that he had no time to spare—that the heads of the old domestics at Shaw-Castle would be by this time absolutely turned, and apprehensions of what Thursday was to bring forth—that as Clara would certainly give no dinner, and the proper arrangements, it was necessary he should take that trouble himself."

"To ride smartly," said Lady Penelope, "you must give even a temporary alarm, by overtaking your creature, ere she gets home—She sometimes her pony to go at will along the lane, as Betty Foy's."

"But then," said little Miss Digges, "Miss Mowbray sometimes gallops as if the lark was a snail—very—and it quite frights one to see her."

"Doctor touched Mrs. Blower, who had appeared as to be on the verge of the genteel cough, she did not venture within it—they exchanged exaggerated looks, and a most pitiful shake of the head."

Mowbray's eye happened at that moment to fall on them; and doubtless, notwithstanding his attempt to compose their countenances to a dispassionate expression, he comprehended what was passing through their minds;—and perhaps it awoke a corresponding note in his own. He took his hat, and with a cast of thought upon his countenance which it seldom wore, left the apartment. A moment afterwards his horse's feet were heard spurning the pavement, as he started off at a sharp pace.

"There is something singular about these Mowbrays to-night," said Lady Penelope.—"Clara, poor dear angel, is always particular; but I should have thought Mowbray had too much worldly wisdom to be fanciful.—What are you consulting your souvenir for with such attention, my dear Lady Binks?"

"Only for the age of the moon," said her ladyship, putting the little tortoise shell bound calendar into her reticule; and having done so, she proceeded to assist Lady Penelope in the arrangements for the evening.

CHAPTER IX.

THE MEETING.

We meet as shadows in the land of dreams,
Which speak not but in signs.

Anonymous.

BEHIND one of the old oaks which we have described in the preceding chapter, shrouding himself from observation like a hunter watching for his game, or an Indian for his enemy, but with different, very different purpose, Tyrrel lay on his breast near the Buck-stane, his eye on the horse-road which winded down the valley, and his ear alertly awake to every sound which mingled with the passing breeze, or with the ripple of the brook.

"To have met her in yonder congregated assembly of brutes and fools"—such was a part of his internal reflections,—"had been little less than an act of madness—madness almost equal in its degree to that cowardice which has hitherto prevented my approaching her when our eventful meeting might have taken place unobserved.—But now—now—my resolution is as fixed as the place is itself favourable. I will not wait till some chance again shall throw us together, with a hundred malignant eyes to watch, and wonder, and stare, and try in vain to account for the expression of feelings which I might find it impossible to suppress.—Hark—hark!—I hear the tread of a horse—No—it was the changeful sound of the water rushing over the pebbles. Surely she cannot have taken the other road to Shaw-Castle!—No—the sounds become distinct—her figure is visible on the path, coming swiftly forward.—Have I the courage to show myself?—I have—the hour is come, and what must be shall be."

Yet this resolution was scarcely formed ere it began to fluctuate, when he reflected upon the fittest manner of carrying it into execution. To show himself at a distance, might give the lady an opportunity of turning back and avoiding the interview which he had determined upon—to hide himself till the moment when her horse, in rapid motion, should pass his lurking-place, might be attended with danger to the rider—and while he hesitated which course to pursue, there was some chance of his missing the opportunity of presenting himself to Miss Mowbray at all. He was himself sensible of this, formed a hasty and desperate resolution not to suffer the present moment to escape, and, just as the ascent induced the poney to slacken its pace, Tyrrel stood in the middle of the defile, about six yards distant from the young lady.

She pulled up the reins, and stopped as if arrested by a thunderbolt.—"Clara!"—"Tyrrel!" These were the only words which were exchanged between them, until Tyrrel, moving his feet as slowly as if they had been of lead, began gradually to diminish the distance which lay betwixt them. It was then that, observing his closer approach, Miss Mowbray called out with great eagerness,—"No nearer—no nearer!—So long have I endured your presence, but if you approach me more closely, I shall be mad indeed!"

"What do you fear?" said Tyrrel, in a hollow voice—"What can you fear?" and he continued to draw nearer, until they were within a pace of each other.

Clara, mean while, dropping her bridle, clasped her hands together, and held them up towards Heaven, muttering, in a voice scarcely audible, "Great God!—If this apparition be formed by my heated fancy, let it pass away; if it be real, enable me to bear its presence!—Tell me, I conjure you, are you Francis Tyrrel in blood and body, or is this but one of those wandering visions, that have crossed my path and glared on me, but without daring to abide my steadfast glance?"

"I am Francis Tyrrel," answered he, "in blood and body, as much as she to whom I speak is Clara Mowbray."

"Then God have mercy on us both!" said Clara, in a tone of deep feeling.

"Amen!" said Tyrrel.—"But what avails this excess of agitation?—You saw me but now, Miss Mowbray—Your voice still rings in my ears—You saw me but now—you spoke to me—and that when I was among strangers—Why not preserve your composure, when we are where no human eye can see—no human ear can hear?"

"Is it so?" said Clara; "and was it indeed yourself whom I saw even now?—I thought so, and something I said at the time—but my brain has been but ill settled since we last met—But I am well now—quite well—I have invited all the people yonder to come to Shaws-Castle—my brother desired me to do it—I hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing Mr. Tyrrel there—though I think there is some old grudge between my brother and you."

"Alas! Clara, you mistake. Your brother I have scarcely seen," replied Tyrrel much distressed, and apparently uncertain in what tone to address her, which might soothe, and not irritate her mental malady, of which he could now entertain no doubt.

"True—true," she said, after a moment's reflection, "my brother was then at college. It was my father, my poor father, whom you had some quarrel with.—But you will come to Shaws-Castle on Thursday, at two o'clock?—John will be glad to see you—he can be kind when he pleases—and then we will talk of old times—I must get on, to have things ready—Good evening."

She would have passed him, but he took gently hold of the rein of her bridle.—"I will walk with you, Clara," he said; "the road is rough and dangerous—you ought not to ride fast.—I will walk along with you, and we will talk of former times now, more conveniently than in company."

"True—true—very true, Mr. Tyrrel—it shall be as you say. My brother obliges me sometimes to go into company at that hateful place down yonder; and I do so because he likes it, and because the folks let me have my own way, and come and go as I list. Do you know Tyrrel, that very often when I am there, and John has his eye on me, I can carry it on as gayly as if you and I had never met?"

"I would to God we never had," said Tyrrel, in a trembling voice, "since this is to be the end of all?"

"And wherefore should not sorrow be the end of sin and of folly? And when did happiness come of disobedience?—And when did sound sleep visit a bloody pillow? That is what I say to myself, Tyrrel, and that is what you must learn to say too, and then you will bear your burden as cheerfully as I endure mine. If we have no more than our deserts, why should we complain?—You are shedding tears, I think—Is not that childish?—They say it is a relief—if so, weep on, and I will look another way."

Tyrrel walked on by the pony's side, in vain endeavouring to compose himself so as to reply.

"Poor Tyrrel," said Clara, after she had remained silent for some time—"Poor Frank Tyrrel!—Perhaps you will say in your turn, Poor Clara—but I am not so poor in spirit as you—the blast may bend, but it shall never break me."

There was another long pause; for Tyrrel was unable to determine with himself in what strain he could address the unfortunate young lady, without awakening recollections equally painful to her feelings, and dangerous, when her precarious state of health was considered. At length she herself proceeded:—

"What needs all this, Tyrrel?—and indeed, why came you here?—Why did I find you but now brawling and quarrelling among the loudest of the brawlers and quarrellers of yonder idle and dissipated debauchees?—You were used to have more temper—more sense. Another person—ay, another that you and I once knew—he might have committed such a folly, and he would have acted perhaps in character.—But you who pretend to wisdom—for shame, for shame!—And indeed, when we talk of that, what wisdom was there in coming hither at all?—or what good purpose can your remaining here serve?—Surely you need not come, either to renew your own unhappiness or to augment mine?"

"To augment yours—God forbid!" answered Tyrrel. "No—I came hither only because, after so many years of wandering, I longed to revisit the spot where all my hopes lay buried."

"Ay—buried is the word," she replied, "crushed down and buried when they budded fairest. I often think of it, Tyrrel; and there are times when Heaven help me! I can think of little else.—Look at me—you remember what I was—see what grief and solitude have made me."

She flung back the veil which surrounded her riding-hat, and which had hitherto hid her face. It was the same countenance which he had formerly known in all the bloom of early beauty; but though the beauty remained, the bloom was fled for ever. Not the agitation of exercise—not that which arose from the pain and confusion of this unexpected interview, had called to poor Clara's cheek even the momentary semblance of colour. Her complexion was marble-white, like that of the finest piece of statuary.

"Is it possible?" said Tyrrel; "can grief have made such ravages?"

"Grief," replied Clara, "is the sickness of the mind, and its sister is the sickness of the body—they are twin-sisters, Tyrrel, and are seldom long separate. Sometimes the body's disease comes first, and dims our eyes and palsies our hands, before the fire of our mind and of our intellect is quenched. But mark me—soon after comes her cruel sister with her urn, and sprinkles cold dew on our hopes and on our loves, our memory, our recollections, and our feelings, and shows us that they cannot survive the decay of our bodily powers."

"Alas!" said Tyrrel, "is it come to this?"

"To this," she replied, speaking from the rapid and irregular train of her own ideas, rather than comprehending the purport of his sorrowful exclamation,— "to this it must ever come, while immortal souls are wedded to the perishable substance of which our bodies are composed. There is another state, Tyrrel, in which it will be otherwise—God grant our time of enjoying it were come!"

She fell into a melancholy pause, which Tyrrel was afraid to disturb. The quickness with which she spoke, marked but too plainly the irregular succession of thought, and he was obliged to restrain the agony of his own feelings, rendered more acute by a thousand painful recollections, lest by giving way to his expressions of grief, he should throw her into a still more disturbed state of mind.

"I did not think," she proceeded, "that after so horrible a separation, and so many years, I could have met you thus calmly and reasonably. But although what we were formerly to each other can never be forgotten, it is now all over, and we are only friends—Is it not so?"

Tyrrel was unable to reply.

"But I must not remain here," she said, "till the evening grows darker on me.—We shall meet again, Tyrrel—meet as friends—nothing more—You will come up to Shaws-Castle and see me?—no need of secrecy now—my poor father is in his grave, and his prejudices sleep with him—my brother John is kind, though he is stern and severe sometimes—Indeed, Tyrrel, I believe he loves me, though he has taught me to tremble at his frown when I am in spirits, and talk too much—But he loves me, at least I think so, for I am sure I love him; and I try to go down amongst them yonder, and to endure their folly, and all things considered, I do carry on the farce of life wonderfully well—We are but actors, you know, and the world but a stage."

"And ours has been a sad and tragic scene," said Tyrrel, in the bitterness of his heart, unable any longer to refrain from speech.

"It has indeed—but, Tyrrel, when was it otherwise with engagements formed in youth and in folly? You and I would, you know, become men and women, while we were yet scarcely more than children—We have run, while yet in our nonage, through the passions and adventures of youth, and therefore we are now old before our day, and the winter of our life has come on ere its summer was well begun.—O Tyrrel! often and often have I thought of this!—Thought of it often? Alas, when will the time come that I shall be able to think of any thing else!"

The poor young woman sobbed bitterly, and her tears began to flow with a freedom which they had not probably enjoyed for a length of time. Tyrrel walked on by the side of her horse, which now prosecuted its road homewards, unable to devise a proper mode of addressing the unfortunate young lady, and dreading alike to awaken her passions and his own. Whatever he might have proposed to say, was disconcerted by the plain indications that her mind was clouded, more or less slightly, with a shade of insanity, which deranged, though it had not destroyed, her powers of judgment.

At length he asked her, with as much calmness as he could assume—if she was contented—if aught could be done to render her situation more easy—if there was aught of which she could complain which he might be able to remedy? She answered gently, that she was calm and resigned, when her brother could permit her to stay at home; but that when she was brought into society, she experienced such a change as that which the water of the brook that lumbers in a crystalline pool of the rock may be supposed to feel, when, gliding from its quiet bed, it becomes involved in the hurry of the cataract.

"But my brother Mowbray," she said, "thinks he is right,—and perhaps he is so. There are things on which we may ponder too long;—and were he mistaken, why should I not constrain myself in order to please him—there are so few left to whom I can now give either pleasure or pain?—I am a gay girl, too, in conversation. Tyrrel—still as gay for a moment, as when you used to chide me for my folly. So, now I have told you all.—I have one question to ask on my part—one question—if I had but breath to ask it—Is he still alive?"

"He lives," answered Tyrrel, but in a tone so low, that naught but the eager attention which Miss Mowbray paid could possibly have caught such feeble sounds.

"Lives!" she exclaimed,—"lives!—he lives, and the blood on your hand is not then indelibly imprinted—O Tyrrel, did you but know the joy which this assurance gives to me!"

"Joy!" replied Tyrrel—"joy, that the wretch lives who has poisoned our happiness for ever?—lives, perhaps, to claim you for his own?"

"Never, never shall he—dare he do so," replied Clara, wildly, "while water can drown, while cords can strangle, steel pierce—while there is a precipice on the hill, a pool in the river—never—never!"

"Be not thus agitated, my dearest Clara," said Tyrrel; "I spoke I know not what—he lives indeed—but far distant, and, I trust, never again to revisit Scotland."

He would have said more, but that, agitated with fear or passion, she struck her horse impatiently with her riding-whip. The spirited animal, thus stimulated and at the same time restrained, became intractable, and reared so much, that Tyrrel, fearful of the consequences, and trusting to Clara's skill as a horsewoman, thought he best consulted her safety in letting her take the rein. The animal instantly spring forward on the broken and hilly path at a very rapid pace, and as soon lost to Tyrrel's anxious eyes.

As he stood pondering whether he ought not to follow Miss Mowbray towards Shaws-Castle, in order to be satisfied that no accident had befallen her on the road, he heard the tread of a horse's feet advancing hastily in the same direction, leading from the hotel. Unwilling to be observed at this moment, he stepped aside under shelter of the underwood, and presently afterwards saw Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's, followed by a groom, ride hastily past his lurking-place, and pursue the same road which had been just taken by his sister. The presence of her brother seemed to assure Miss Mowbray's safety, and so removed Tyrrel's chief reason for following her. Involved in deep and melancholy reflection upon what had passed, nearly satisfied that his longer residence in Clara's vicinity could only add to her unhappiness and his own, yet unable to tear himself from that neighbourhood, or to relinquish feelings which had become entwined with his heart-strings, he returned to his lodgings in the Aultoun, in a state of mind very little to be envied.

Tyrrel, on entering his apartment, found that it was not lighted, nor were the Abigails of Mrs. Dods quite so alert as a waiter at Long's might have been, to supply him with candles. Unapt at any time to exact much personal attendance, and desirous to shun at that moment the necessity of speaking to any person whatever, even on the most trifling subject, he walked down into the kitchen to supply himself with what he wanted. He did not at first observe that Mrs. Dods herself was present in this the very centre of her empire, far less that a lofty air of indignation was seated on the worthy matron's brow. At first it only vented itself in broken soliloquy and interjections; as, for example, "Vera bonny wark this!—vera creditable wark, indeed!—a decent house to be disturbed at these hours—Keep a public—as weel keep a bed-lam!"

Finding these murmurs attracted no attention, the dame placed herself betwixt her guest and the door, to which he was now retiring with his lighted candle, and demanded of him what was the meaning of such behaviour.

"Of what behaviour, madam?" said her guest, repeating her question in a tone of sternness and impatience so unusual with him, that perhaps she was sorry at the moment that she had provoked him out of his usual patient indifference; nay, she might even feel intimidated at the altercation she had provoked, for the resentment of a quiet and patient person has always in it something formidable to the professed and habitual grumbler. But her pride was too great to think of a retreat, after having sounded the signal for contest, and so she continued, though in a tone somewhat lowered.

"Maister Tirl, I wad but just ask you, that are a man of sense, whether I hae ony right to take your behaviour weel? Here have you been these ten days and mair, eating the best, and drinking the best, and taking up the best room in my house; and now to think of your gaun down and taking up with von idle harebrained cattle at the Waal—I maun e'en be plain wi' ye—I like nane of the fair-fasioned folk that can say My Jo, and think it no; and therefore"—

"Mrs. Dods," said Tyrrel, interrupting her, "I have no time at present for trifles. I am obliged to you for your attention while I have been in your house; but the disposal of my time, here or elsewhere, must be according to my own ideas of pleasure or business—If you are tired of me as a guest, send in your bill to-morrow."

"My bill!" said Mrs. Dods; "my bill to-morrow! And what for no wait till Saturday, when it may be cleared atween us, plack and bawbee, as it was on Saturday last?"

"Well—we will talk of it to-morrow, Mrs. Dods—Good night." And he withdrew accordingly.

Luckie Dods stood ruminating for a moment. "The deil's in him," she said, "for he winna bide being thrawn. And I think the deil's in me too for thraving him, sic a canny lad, and sac gude a customer;—and I am judging he has something on his mind—want of siller it canna be—I am sure if I thought that, I wadna care about my small thing.—But want o' siller it canna be—he pays ower the shillings as if they were selate stanes, and that's no the way that folk part with their siller when there's but little on't—I ken weel enough how a customer looks that's near the grund of the purse.—Weel! I hope he winna mind ony thing of this nonsense the morn, and I'll try to guide my tongue something better.—Hush, now! but, as the minister says, it's an angry minister—truth, I am whilst ashamed o' myself.

CHAPTER I.

SCENES.

Come, let us have thy counsel, for I need it
Thou art of them, who have help their friends
With sage advice, then counsel with gold.
Oh! how they with their words will tempt to love
For I ask only from thee words, not deeds.

The Clerk had now no more to say.

THE day of which we last gave the events the need to be Monday, and two days thereafter intervened between it and that for which the entertainment was fixed, that was to assemble in the hall of the Lord of the Manor the flower of the company near St. Ronan's Well. The interval was but brief for the preparations necessary on an occasion so unusual. Since the house, though delightfully situated, was in very indifferent repair, and for years had never received any visitors, except when some birth-day or the like hunter shared the hospitality of Mr. Mowbray, an event which became daily more and more uncommon, for as he himself almost lived at the Well, he generally contrived to receive his company in a house which could be done without expense to himself. Hence the health of his more afflicted or remarkable guests to any of those old-fashioned Scottish gentlemen who might be expected in the rudeness of a first visit (two days) to consider a friend's house as their own. Mr. Mowbray was now however in the green light of all his companions, added down, he was accepted, given and accepted, and they looked forward to the accomplishment of his promise, with the eagerness which the prospect of some entertaining novelty never fails to produce among idlers.

A good deal of trouble devolved on Mr. Mowbray, and his trusty agent Mr. Menkewham, before any thing like decent preparation could be made for the ensuing entertainment, and they were let to their animated endeavours by Clara, who, during both the Tuesday and Wednesday obstinately refused to be excluded, nor could her brother either by flattery, entreaty, or any high concern, or by any game on the approaching and important Thursday. To do John Mowbray justice he loved his money as much as he was capable of loving any thing but himself; and when, in several arguments, he had manifested to find that she was not to be got a cent on to afford her assistance he, without compunction, quietly set himself to do the best he could by his own unassisted judgment or opinion with regard to the necessary preparations.

This was not at present, so easy a task as might be supposed, for Mowbray was ambitious of the character of ten and elegance which modern social life alone are seldom capable of attaining on such momentous occasions. The more solid materials of a collection were indeed to be obtained for money from the next market-town, and were purchased accordingly, but he felt it was likely to prove the vulgar plenty of a farmer's feast instead of the elegant entertainment which might be announced in a notice of the county paper, as given by John Mowbray, Esq. of St. Ronan's, to the gay and fashionable company assembled at that celebrated spring. There was likely to be all sorts of error and irregularity in the cooking, and in sending up, for Mowbray's own household neither an accomplished housekeeper, nor a kitchen-maid with a hundred pair of hands to execute her mandates. All the domestic arrangements were on the minutest system of economy consistent with ordinary decency except in the kitchen, which was excellent and well kept. But even a groom of the stable perform the labours of a groom of the chamber? or can the gamekeeper arrange in tempting order the carcasses of the birds he has shot, dress them with flowers, and garnish them with piquant sauces? It would be as reasonable to expect a gallant soldier to act as undertaker, and conduct the funeral of the enemy he has slain.

In a word, Mowbray talked, and consulted, and advised, and squabbled, with the deaf cook, and a little old man whom he called the butler, until he at length perceived so little chance of bringing order out of confusion, or making the best advantage of his position on such elaborate understandings as he had to deal with, that he fairly committed the whole matter of the collection, with two or three hearty curses to the charge of the officials principally concerned, and proceeded to take the state of the furniture and apartments under his consideration.

Here he found himself almost equally helpless, for what male wit is adequate to the thousand little acquirements practised in such arrangements? but his irregular eye judge of the degree of darkness which is to be admitted into a decorated apartment, or determine where the broad light should be suffered to fall on a miserable picture, where it should be excluded, lest the dull dash of a privileged gaze should become too rigidly prominent? And if men are unfit for viewing such a fairy web of light and darkness as may best suit furniture or ornaments, and complexion, how shall they be adequate to the yet more mysterious office of arranging while they derange, the various movements of the apartment? so that while all has the air of mystery and chance, the seats are placed as if they had been transported by a wish to the spot most suitable for accommodation, suffrage and confusion; as once seated the company are neither limited to formal circles of chairs, nor exposed to break their bones over wandering stools, but the arrangement seems to correspond to what ought to be the use of the conversation, rather without being confused and regulated, without being constrained or stiffened.

Then how can a clumsy male wit attempt the arrangement of all the shiftness by which old and broken, broken of cases, pomander boxes, ivory fans, and all the trash usually found in the paragon-hall of the barons of old-fashioned ladies, may be brought into play, by throwing them, either grouped with other unconsidered trifles, such as to be seen in the windows of a pawnbroker's shop upon a marble mantelpiece, or a mosaic work, thereby turning to advantage the trash and lumber which all the old maids or magpies, who have accumulated the mansion for a century, have contrived to accumulate. With what admiration of the spirit of the fair sex have I sometimes peered into the miscellaneous groups of pseudo bijouterie, and at the great grandiose's thumb-ring couchant with the coral and bells of the first horn—and the husband's whistle of some old naval uncle, or his silver watch-box redolent of Oronoko, happily grouped with the mother's very comb-rose, and coronet of truth, all with some vague and a tortoise-shell spectacle, and the eagle's talon of study, with which, in the days of long and stiff eaves, our grandmothers used to alleviate any little irritation in their back shoulders! Then there was the silver streamer, which in more economical times than ours, the lot of the house placed the tea leaves, after the carter's drop had been exhausted, that they might afterwards be hospitably divided among the company, to be used with sugar and with bread and butter. Mowbray upon a fashion which has received from the cloud of age, and the melting pot of the silver-smith, the neglected relics, for the benefit of antiquaries of the decoration of a table! But who shall venture to place them there, unless under the dream of female taste? and of that Mr. Mowbray, though possessed of a large stock of such treasures, was in the present entirely deprived.

The diversion upon his difficulties is already so long, or I might mention the Lord's magnanimity in the art of making the worst appear the best, by the use of having a dinner served with a new fire cloth, and flinging an Indian shawl over a faded and threadbare sofa. But I have said enough, and am then enough, to explain his dilemma to so unfeeling a bachelor who, without mother, sister, or cousin, without skilful housekeeper, or experienced clerk of the kitchen, or valet of parts and figures, attempts to give an entertainment, and expects to make a dinner and supper of fault.

The sense of his insufficiency was the more vexations to Mowbray, as he was aware he would find sharp critics in the ladies, and particularly in his constant rival, Lady Penelope Penfeather. He was, therefore, incessant in his exertions; and for two whole days ordered and disordered, demanded, commanded, countermanded, and reprimanded, without pause or cessation. The companion, for he could not be termed an assistant, of his labours, was his trusty agent, who trotted from room to room after him, affording him exactly the same degree of sympathy which a dog doth to his master when distressed in mind, by looking in his face from time to time with a piteous gaze, as if to assure him that he partakes of his trouble, though he neither comprehends the cause nor the extent of it, nor has in the slightest degree the power to remove it.

At length when Mowbray had got some matters arranged to his mind, and abandoned a great many which he would willingly have put in better order, he sat down to dinner upon the Wednesday preceding the appointed day, with his worthy aid-de-camp, Mr. Meiklewham; and after bestowing a few muttered curses upon the whole concern, and the fantastic old maid who had brought him into the scrape, by begging an invitation, declared that all things might now go to the devil their own way, for so sure as his name was John Mowbray, he would trouble himself no more about them.

Keeping this doughty resolution, he sat down to dinner with his counsel learned in the law; and speedily they despatched the dish of chops which was set before them, and the better part of the bottle of old port, which served for its menstruum.

"We are well enough now," said Mowbray, "though we have had none of their d—d kick-shaws."

"A wamefou' is a wamefou'," said the writer, swabbing his greasy chops, "whether it be of the barley-meal or the bran."

"A cart-horse thinks so," said Mowbray; "but we must do as others do, and gentlemen and ladies are of a different opinion."

"The waur for themselves and the country baith, St. Ronan's—it's the jinketing and the jirbling wi' a and wi' trumpery that brings our nobles to nine-mice, and mony a het ha'-house to a hired lodging in the Abbey."

The young gentleman paused for a few minutes—filled a bumper, and pushed the bottle to the senior—then said abruptly, "Do you believe in luck, Mick?"

"In luck?" answered the attorney; "what do you mean by the question?"

"Why, because I believe in luck myself—in a good bad run of luck at cards."

"You wad have mair luck the day, if you had never mached them," replied his confidant.

"That is not the question now," said Mowbray; "but what I wonder at is the wretched chance that is attended us miserable Lairds of St. Ronan's for more than a hundred years, that we have always been sitting worse in the world, and never better. Never was there been such a backsliding generation, as the reason would say—half the country once belonged to my ancestors, and now the last furrows of it seem to be flying."

"Fleeing!" said the writer, "they are barking and singing baith.—This Shaws-Castle here, I see warrant flee up the chimney after the rest, were it not weel stened down wi' your grandfather's tailzie."

"Damn the tailzie!" said Mowbray; "if they had wanted to keep up their estate, they should have enled it when it was worth keeping: to tie a man down such an insignificant thing as St. Ronan's, is like tethering a horse on six rods of a Highland moor."

"Ye have broke weel in on the mailing by your feus won at the Well," said Meiklewham, "and raxed over the tether maybe a wee bit farther than ye had y right to do."

"It was by your advice, was it not?" said the laird.

"I see ne'er deny it, St. Ronan's," answered the writer; "but I am such a gude-natured guse, that I set about pleasing you as an auld wife pleases a son."

"Ay," said the man of pleasure, "when she reaches it a knife to cut its own fingers wi'.—These acres would have been safe enough, if it had not been for your d—d advice."

"And yet you were grumbling e'en now," said the man of business, "that you have not the power to gar the whole estate flee like a wild-duck across a bog? Troth, you need care little about it; for if you have incurred an irritancy—and sae thinks Mr. Wisebehind, the advocate, upon an A. B. memorial that I laid before him—your sister, or your sister's goodman, if she should take the fancy to marry, might bring a declarator, and evict St. Ronan's frae ye in the course of twa or three sessions."

"My sister will never marry," said John Mowbray.

"That's easily said," replied the writer; "but as broken a ship's come to land. If ony body kend o' the chance she has o' the estate, there's mony a weel-doing man would think little of the bee in her bonnet."

"Hark ye, Mr. Meiklewham," said the Laird, "I will be obliged to you if you will speak of Miss Mowbray with the respect due to her father's daughter, and my sister."

"Nae offence, St. Ronan's, nae offence," answered the man of law; "but ilka man maun speak sae as to be understood,—that is, when he speaks about business. Ye ken yoursell, that Miss Clara is no just like other folk; and were I you—it's my duty to speak plain—I wad e'en gie in a bit scroll of a petition to the Lords, to be appointed Curator Bonis, in respect of her incapacity to manage her own affairs."

"Meiklewham," said Mowbray, "you are a"—and then stopped short.

"What am I, Mr. Mowbray?" said Meiklewham, somewhat sternly—"What am I? I wad be glad to ken what I am."

"A very good lawyer, I dare say," replied St. Ronan's, who was too much in the power of his agent to give way to his first impulse. "But I must tell you, that rather than take such a measure against poor Clara, as you recommend, I would give her up the estate, and become an ostler or a postilion for the rest of my life."

"Ah, St. Ronan's," said the man of law, "if you had wished to keep up the auld house, you should have taken another trade, than to become an ostler or a postilion. What ailed you, man, but to have been a lawyer as weel as other folk? My auld Maister had a wee bit Latin about rerum dominos gentemque togatam, whilk signified, he said, that all lairds should be lawyers."

"All lawyers are likely to become lairds, I think," replied Mowbray; "they purchase our acres by the thousand, and pay us, according to the old story, with a multiplepoinding, as your learned friends call it, Mr. Meiklewham."

"Weel—and mightna you have purchased as weel as other folk?"

"Not I," replied the Laird; "I have no turn for that service, I should only have wasted bombazine on my shoulders, and flour upon my three-tailed wig—should but have lounged away my mornings in the Outer-House, and my evenings at the play-house, and acquired no more law than what would have made me a wise justice at a Small debt Court."

"If you gained little, you would have lost as little," said Meiklewham; "and albeit ye were nae great gun at the bar, ye might aye have gotten a Sherifdom, or a Commissaryship, among the lave, to keep the banes green; and sae ye might have saved your estate from deteriorating, if ye dinna mend it muckle."

"Yes, but I could not have had the chance of doubling it, as I might have done," answered Mowbray, "had that inconstant jade, Fortune, but stood a moment faithful to me. I tell you, Mick, that I have been, within this twelvemonth, worth a hundred thousand—worth fifty thousand—worth nothing, but the remnant of this wretched estate, which is too little to do one good while it is mine, though, were it sold, I could start again, and mend my hand a little."

"Ay, ay, just fling the helve after the hatchet," said his legal adviser—"that's a' you think of. What signifies winning a hundred thousand pounds, if you win them to lose them a' again?"

"What signifies it?" replied Mowbray. "Why, it signifies as much to a man of spirit, as having won a battle signifies to a general—no matter that he is beaten afterwards in his turn. he knows there is luck for him as well as others, and so he has spirit to try it again. Here is the young Earl of Ethrington will be amongst us in a day or two—they say he is up to every thing—if I had but five hundred to begin with, I should be soon up to him."

"Mr. Mowbray," said Meiklewham, "I am sorry for ye. I have been your house's man-of-business—I may say, in some measure, your house's servant—and now I am to see an end of it all, and just by the lad that I thought maist likely to set it up again better than ever; for, to do ye justice, you have aye had an ee to your ain interest, sae far as your lights gaed. It brings tears into my auld een."

"Never weep for the matter, Mick," answered Mowbray; "some of it will stick, my old boy, in your pockets, if not in mine—your service will not be altogether gratuitous, my old friend—the labourer is worthy of his hire."

"Weel I wot is he," said the writer; "but double fees would hardly carry folk through some wark. But if ye will have siller, ye maun have siller—but, I warrant, it goes just where the rest gaed."

"No, by twenty devils!" exclaimed Mowbray, "to fail this time is impossible—Jack Wolverine was too strong for Ethrington at any thing he could name; and I can beat Wolverine from the Land's-End to Johnnie Groat's—but there must be something to go upon—the blunt must be had, Mick."

"Very likely—nae doubt—that is always provided it can be had," answered the legal adviser.

"That's your business, my old cock," said Mowbray. "This youngster will be here perhaps to-morrow, with money in both pockets—he takes up his rents as he comes down, Mick—think of that, my old friend."

"Weel for them that have rents to take up," said Meiklewham; "ours are lying rather ower low to be lifted at present.—But are you sure this Earl is a man to mell with?—are you sure ye can win of him, and that if you do, he can pay his losings, Mr. Mowbray?—because I have kend mony ane come for wool, and gang hame shorn; and though ye are a clever young gentleman, and I am bound to suppose ye ken as much about life as most folk, and all that; yet some gate or other ye have aye come off at the losing hand, as ye have ower much reason to ken this day—howbeit!"

"O, the devil take your gossip, my dear Mick! If you can give no help, spare drowning me with your pother.—Why, man, I was a fresh hand—had my apprentice-fees to pay—and these are no trifles, Mick.—But what of that?—I am free of the company now, and can trade on my own bottom."

"Aweel, aweel, I wish it may be sae," said Meiklewham.

"It will be so, and it shall be so, my trusty friend," replied Mowbray, cheerily, "so you will but help me to the stock to trade with."

"The stock?—what d'ye ca' the stock? I ken nae stock that ye have left."

"But you have plenty, my old boy—Come, sell out a few of your three per cents; I will pay difference—interest—exchange—every thing."

"Ay, ay—every thing or naething," answered Meiklewham; "but as you are sae very pressing, I hae been thinking—Whan is the siller wanted?"

"This instant—this day—to-morrow at farthest!" exclaimed the proposed borrower.

"Wh—ew!" whistled the lawyer, with a long prolongation of the note; "the thing is impossible."

"It must be, Mick, for all that," answered Mr. Mowbray, who knew by experience that impossible, when uttered by his accommodating friend in this tone, meant only, when interpreted, extremely difficult, and very expensive.

"Then it must be by Miss Clara selling her stock, now that ye speak of stock," said Meiklewham; "I wonder ye didna think of this before."

"I wish you had been dumb rather than that you had mentioned it now," said Mowbray, starting, as if stung by an adder—"What, Clara's pittance!—the trifle my aunt left her for her own fanciful expenses—her own little private store, that she puts to so many good purposes—Poor Clara, that has so little!—And why not rather your own, Master Meiklewham, who call yourself the friend and servant of our family?"

"Ay, St. Ronan's," answered Meiklewham, "that is a' very true—but service is nae inheritance; and as for friendship, it begins at home, as wise folk have said lang before our time. And for that matter, I think they that are nearest sib should take maist reck. You are neurer and dearer to your sister, St. Ronan's, than you are to poor Saunders Meiklewham, that hasna sae muckle gentle blood as would supper up a hungry flea."

"I will not do this," said St. Ronan's, walking up and down with much agitation; for, selfish as he was he loved his sister, and loved her the more on account of those peculiarities which rendered his protection indispensable to her comfortable existence—"I will not," he said, "pillage her, come on't what will. I will rather go a volunteer to the continent, and be like a gentleman."

He continued to pace the room in a moody silence, which began to disturb his companion, who had not been hitherto accustomed to see his patron take matters so deeply. At length he made an attempt to attract the attention of the silent and sullen ponderer.

"Mr. Mowbray"—no answer—"I was saying, St. Ronan's"—still no reply. "I have been thinking about this matter—and"—

"And what, sir?" said St. Ronan's, stopping short and speaking in a stern tone of voice.

"And, to speak truth, I see little seamability in the matter ony way; for if ye had the siller in your pocket to-day, it would be a' in the Earl of Etherington's the morn."

"Pshaw! you are a fool," answered Mowbray.

"That is not unlikely," said Meiklewham; "but so is Sir Bingo Binks, and yet he's had the better of you, St. Ronan's, this twa or three times."

"It is false!—he has not," answered St. Ronan's fiercely.

"Weel I wot," resumed Meiklewham, "he took ye in about the saumon fish, and some other wags ye lost to him this very day."

"I tell you once more, Meiklewham, you are a fool and no more up to my trim than you are to the locket.—Bingo is got shy—I must give him a little lesson that is all—then I shall strike him to purpose—I am as sure of him as I am of the other—I know the fi! they will both rise to—this cursed want of five hundred will do me out of ten thousand!"

"If you are so certain of being the bangster—so very certain, I mean, of sweeping stakes,—what harm will Miss Clara come to by your having the use of her siller? You can make it up to her for the risk as times told."

"And so I can, by Heaven!" said St. Ronan's. "Mick, you are right, and I am a scrupulous, chicken-hearted fool. Clara shall have a thousand for her poor five hundred—she shall, by —. And I will carry her to Edinburgh for a season, or perhaps to London, and we will have the best advice for her case, and the best company to divert her. And I think her a little odd—why, d—me, I am her brother, and will bear her through it. Yes—yes—ye are right; there can be no hurt in borrowing five hundred of her for a few days, when such profit may be made on't, both for her and me—Here, fill us glasses, my old boy, and drink success to it, for ye are right."

"Here is success to it, with all my heart," answered Meiklewham, heartily glad to see his patron's sanguine temper arrive at this desirable conclusion, and yet willing to hedge in his own credit; "but it is ye are right, and not me, for I advise nothing except on your assurances, that you can make your ain of the English earl, and of this Sir Bingo—and if ye can but do that, I am sure it would be unwise and unkind in ony one of your friends to stand in your light."

"Truc, Mick, true," answered Mowbray.—"And at dice and cards are but bones and pasteboard, and the best horse ever started may slip a shoulder before he get to the winning-post—and so I wish Clara's nature had not been in such a bottom.—But, hang care killed a cat—I can hedge as well as any one, if the odds turn up against me—so let us have the cash, jek."

"Aha! but there go two words to that bargain—the stock stands in my name, and Tam Turnpenny the banker's, as trustees for Miss Clara—Now, get us her letter to us, desiring us to sell out and to pay us the proceeds, and Tam Turnpenny will let you have five hundred pounds instantly, on the faith of the transaction; for I fancy you would desire a' the stock to be sold out, and it will produce more than six hundred, or seven hundred pounds either—and I reckon you will be selling out the whole—it's needless making two bites of a cherry."

"True," answered Mowbray; "since we must be guessed, or something like it, let us make it worth our while at least; so give me a form of the letter, and Clara shall copy it—that is, if she consents; for you now she can keep her own opinion as well as any other woman in the world."

"And that," said Meiklewham, "is as the wind will keep its way, preach to it as ye like. But if I might advise about Miss Clara—I wad say naething air than that I was stressed for the penny money; for I mistake her muckle if she would like to see you angling to pitch and toss wi' this lord and tither cronet for her aunt's three per cents—I ken she has some queer notions—she gives away the feck of the vidends on that very stock in downright charity."

"And I am in hazard to rob the poor as well as my sister!" said Mowbray, filling once more his own glass and his friend's. "Come, Mick, no skylights—there is Clara's health—she is an angel—and I am—that I will not call myself, and suffer no other man to call me.—But I shall win this time—I am sure I shall, since Clara's fortune depends upon it."

"Now, I think, on the other hand," said Meiklewham, "that if any thing should chance wrang, (and heaven kens that the best-laid schemes will gang ae,) it will be a great comfort to think that the ultimate losers will only be the poor folk, that have the Irish between them and absolute starvation—if your sister spent her ain siller, it would be a very different story."

"Hush, Mick—for God's sake, hush, mine honest end," said Mowbray; "it is quite true; thou art a rare counsellor in time of need, and hast as happy a manner of reconciling a man's conscience with his necessities, as might set up a score of casuists; but beware, my most zealous counsellor and confessor, now you drive the nail too far—I promise you some of the chaffing you are at just now rather abates my neck.—Well—give me your scroll—I will to Clara with it—though I would rather meet the best shot in Britain, with ten paces of green sod betwixt us." So saying, he left the apartment.

CHAPTER XI.

FRATERNAL LOVE.

Nearest of blood should still be next in love;
And when I see these happy children playing,
While William gathers flowers for Ellen's ringlets,
And Ellen dresses flies for William's angle,
I scarce can think, that in advancing life,
Coldness, unkindness, interest, or suspicion,
Will e'er divide that unity so sacred,
Which nature bound at birth.—Anonymous.

When Mowbray had left his dangerous adviser, in order to steer the course which his agent had indicated, without offering to recommend it, he went to the parlour which his sister was wont to term her room, and in which she spent great part of her time. It was fitted up with a sort of fanciful neatness; and its perfect arrangement and good order, formed a strong contrast to the other apartments of the old and neglected mansion-house. A number of little tables lay on the work-table, indicating the elegant, and, at the same time, the unsettled turn of the inhabitant's mind. There were unfinished drawings, blotted music, needle-work of various kinds, and many other little female tasks; all undertaken with zeal, and so far prosecuted with art and elegance, but all flung aside before any one of them was completed.

Clara herself sat upon a little low couch by the window, reading, or at least turning over the leaves of a book, in which she seemed to read. But instantly starting up when she saw her brother, she ran towards him with the most cordial cheerfulness.

"Welcome, welcome, my dear John; this is very kind of you to come to visit your recluse sister. I have been trying to nail my eyes and my understanding to a stupid book here, because they say too much thought is not quite good for me. But, either the man's dulness, or my want of the power of attending, makes my eyes pass over the page, just as one seems to read in a dream, without being able to comprehend one word of the matter. You shall talk to me, and that will do better. What can I give you to show that you are welcome? I am afraid tea is all I have to offer, and that you set too little store by."

"I shall be glad of a cup at present," said Mowbray, "for I wish to speak with you."

"Then Jessy shall make it ready instantly," said Miss Mowbray, ringing, and giving orders to her waiting-maid—"but you must not be ungrateful, John, and plague me with any of the ceremonial for your fête—'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.' I will attend, and play my part as prettily as you can desire; but to think of it beforehand, would make both my head and my heart ache; and so I beg you will spare me on the subject."

"Why, you wild kitten," said Mowbray, "you turn every day more shy of human communication—we shall have you take the woods one day, and become as savage as the Princess Caraboo. But I will plague you about nothing if I can help it. If matters go not smooth on the great day, they must e'en blame the dull thick head that had no fair lady to help him in his need. But, Clara, I had something more material to say to you—something indeed of the last importance."

"What is it?" said Clara, in a tone of voice approaching to a scream—"In the name of God, what is it? You know not how you terrify me!"

"Nay you start at a shadow, Clara," answered her brother. "It is no such uncommon matter neither—good faith, it is the most common distress in the world, so far as I know the world—I am sorely pinched for money."

"Is that all?" replied Clara, in a tone which seemed to her brother as much to underrate the difficulty, when it was explained, as her fears had exaggerated it before she heard its nature.

"Is that all? Indeed it is all, and comprehends a great deal of vexation. I shall be hard run unless I can get a certain sum of money—and I must e'en ask you if you can help me?"

"Help you?" replied Clara; "Yes, with all my heart—but you know my purse is a light one—more than half of my last dividend is in it, however, and I am sure, John, I shall be happy if I can serve you—especially as that will at least show that your wants are but small ones."

"Alas, Clara, if you would help me," said her brother, half repentant of his purpose, "you must draw the neck of the goose which lays the golden eggs—you must lend me the whole stock."

"And why not, John," said the simple-hearted girl, "if it will do you a kindness? Are you not my natural guardian? Are you not a kind one? And is not my little fortune entirely at your disposal? You will, I am sure, do all for the best."

"I fear I may not," said Mowbray, starting from her, and more distressed by her sudden and unsuspecting compliance, than he would have been by difficulties, or remonstrance. In the latter case, he would have stifled the pangs of conscience amid the manœuvres which he must have resorted to for obtaining her acquiescence; as matters stood, there was all the difference that there is between slaughtering a tame and unresisting animal, and pursuing wild game, until the animation of the sportsman's exertions overcomes the internal sense of his own cruelty. The same idea occurred to Mowbray himself.

"By G—," he said, "this is like shooting the bird sitting.—Clara," he added, "I fear this money will scarce be employed as you would wish."

"Employ it as you yourself please, my dearest brother," she replied, "and I will believe it is all for the best."

"Nay, I am doing for the best," he replied; "at least, I am doing what must be done, for I see no other way through it—so all you have to do is to copy this paper, and bid adieu to bank dividends—for a little while at least. I trust soon to double this little matter for you, if Fortune will but stand my friend."

"Do not trust to Fortune, John," said Clara, smiling, though with an expression of deep melancholy. "Alas! she has never been a friend to our family—not at least for many a day."

"She favours the bold, say my old grammatical exercises," answered her brother; "and I must trust her, were she as changeable as a weathercock.—And yet—if she should jilt me!—What will you do—what will you say, Clara, if I am unable, contrary to my hope, trust, and expectation, to repay you this money within a short time?"

"Do?" replied Clara; "I must do without it, you know; and for saying, I will not say a word."

"True," replied Mowbray, "but your little expenses—your charities—your halt and blind—your round of paupers?"

"Well, I can manage all that too. Look you here, John, how many half-worked trifles there are. The needle or the pencil is the resource of all distressed heroines, you know; and I promise you, though I have been a little idle and unsettled of late, yet, when I do set about it, no Emmeline or Ethelinde of them all ever sent such loads of trumpery to market as I shall, or made such wealth as I will do. I dare say Lady Penelope, and all the gentry at the Well, will purchase, and will raffle, and do all sort of things to encourage the pensive performer. I will send them such lots of landscapes, with sap-green trees, and mazareen-blue rivers, and portraits that will terrify the originals themselves—and handkerchiefs and turbans, with needle-work scalloped exactly like the walks on the Belvidere—Why, I shall become a little fortune in the first season."

"No, Clara," said John, gravely, for a virtuous resolution had gained the upperhand in his bosom, while his sister ran on in this manner.—"We will do something better than all this. If this kind help of yours does not fetch me through, I am determined I will cut the whole concern. It is but standing a laugh or two, and hearing a gay fellow say, D—me, Jack, are you turned clodhopper at last?—that is the worst. Dogs, horses, and all, shall go to the hammer; we will keep nothing but your pony, and I will trust to a pair of excellent legs. There is enough left of the old acres to keep us in the way you like best, and that I will learn to like. I will work in the garden, and work in the forest, mark my own trees, and cut them myself, keep my own accounts, and send Saunders Meiklewham to the devil."

"That last is the best resolution of all, John," said Clara; "and if such a day should come round, I should be the happiest of living creatures—I should not have a grief left in the world—if I had, you should never see or hear of it—it should lie here," she said, pressing her hand on her bosom, "buried as deep as a funeral urn in a cold sepulchre. Oh! could we not begin such a life to-morrow? If it is absolutely necessary that this trifle of money should be got rid of first, throw it into the river, and think you have lost it amongst gamblers and horse-jockeys."

Clara's eyes, which she fondly fixed on her brother's face, glowed through the tears which her enthusiasm called into them, while she thus addressed him. Mowbray, on his part, kept his looks fixed on the ground, with a flush on his cheek, that expressed at once false pride and real shame.

At length he looked up:—"My dear girl," he said, "how foolishly you talk, and how foolishly I, that have twenty things to do, stand here listening to you! All will go smooth on my plan—if it should not, we have yours in reserve, and I swear to you I will adopt it. The trifle which this letter of yours enables me to command, may have luck in it, and we must not throw up the cards while we have a chance of the game.—Were I to cut from this moment, these few hundreds would make us little better or little worse—so you see we have two strings to our bow. Luck is sometimes against me, that is true—but upon true principle, and playing on the square, I can manage the best of them, or my name is not Mowbray. Adieu, my dearest Clara." So saying, he kissed her cheek with a more than usual degree of affection.

Ere he could raise himself from his stooping posture, she threw her arm kindly over his neck, and said with a tone of the deepest interest, "My dearest brother, your slightest wish has been, and ever shall be, a law to me—Oh! if you would but grant me one request in return!"

"What is it, you silly girl?" said Mowbray, gaily disengaging himself from her hold.—"What is it you can have to ask that needs such a solemn preface?—Remember, I hate prefaces; and when I happen to open a book, always skip them."

"Without preface, then, my dearest brother, will you, for my sake, avoid those quarrels in which the people yonder are eternally engaged? I never go down there but I hear of some new brawl; and I never lay my head down to sleep, but I dream that you are the victim of it. Even last night!"

"Nay, Clara, if you begin to tell your dreams, we shall never have done. Sleeping, to be sure, is the most serious employment of your life—for as to eating, you hardly match a sparrow; but I entreat you to sleep without dreaming, or to keep your visions to yourself.—Why do you keep such fast hold of me?—What on earth can you be afraid of?—Surely you do not think the blockhead Binks, or any other of the good folks below yonder, dared to turn on me? Egad, I wish they would pluck up a little mettle, that I might have an excuse for drilling them. Gad, I would soon teach them to follow at heel."

"No, John," replied his sister; "it is not of such men as these that I have any fear—and yet, cowards are sometimes driven to desperation, and become more dangerous than better men—but it is not such as these that I fear. But there are men in the world whose qualities are beyond their seeming—whose spirit and courage lie hidden, like metals in the mine, under an unmarked or a plain exterior.—You may meet with such—you are rash and headlong, and apt to exercise your wit without always weighing consequences, and thus"—

"On my word, Clara," answered Mowbray, "you are in a most sermonizing humour this morning! the parson himself could not have been more logical or profound. You have only to divide your discourse into heads, and garnish it with conclusions for use, and conclusions for doctrine, and it might be preached before a whole presbytery, with every chance of instruction and edification. But I am a man of the world, my little Clara; and though I wish to go a death's way as little as possible, I must not fear the raw-head and bloody-bones neither.—And who the devil is to put the question to me?—I must know that, Clara, for you have some especial person in your eye when you bid me take care of quarrelling."

Clara could not become paler than was her usual complexion; but her voice faltered as she eagerly assured her brother, that she had no particular person in her thoughts.

"Clara," said her brother, do you remember, when there was a report of a bogle* in the upper orchard, when we were both children?—Do you remember how you were perpetually telling me to take care of the bogle, and keep away from its haunts?—And do you remember my going on purpose to detect the bogle, finding the cow-boy, with a shirt about him, busied in pulling pears, and treating him to a handsome drubbing?—I am the same Jack Mowbray still, as ready to face danger, and unmask imposition; and your fears, Clara, will only make me watch more closely, till I find out the real object of them. If you warn me of quarrelling with some one, it must be la-bars of Jenny Sutton, in token he cared not a farthing how the matter was to end.

With a swifter pace than his half-pay leisure usually encouraged, or than his habitual dignity permitted, Captain MacTurk cleared the ground betwixt the Spring and its gay vicinity, and the ruins of the Aultoun, where reigned our friend Meg Dods, the sole assertor of its ancient dignities. To the door of the Chickum Inn the Captain addressed himself, as one too much accustomed to war to fear a rough reception; although at the very first aspect of Meg, who presented her person at the half-opened door, his military experience taught him that his entrance into the place would, in all probability, be disputed.

"Is Mr. Tyrrel at home?" was the question; and the answer was conveyed, by the counter-interrogation, "Wha may ye be that speers?"

As the most polite reply to this question, and an indulgence, at the same time, of his own taciturn disposition, the Captain presented to Luckie Dods the fifth part of an ordinary playing card, much grimed with snuff, which bore on its blank side his name and quality. But Luckie Dods rejected the information thus tendered, with contemptuous scorn.

"Nane of your deil's play-books for me," said she; "it's an ill world since sic prick-my-dainty doings came in fashion—It's a poor tongue that canna tell its ain name, and I'll hae nane of your searts upon pasteboard."

"I am Captain MacTurk, of the — regiment," said the Captain, disdaining further answer.

"MacTurk?" repeated Meg, with an emphasis, which induced the owner of the name to reply, "Yes, honest woman—MacTurk—Hector MacTurk—have you any objections to my name, good wife?"

"Nae objections have I," answered Meg; "it's e'en an excellent name for a heathen. — But, Captain MacTurk, since sae it be that ye are a captain, ye may e'en face about and march your ways hame again, to the tune of Dumbarton drums; for ye are ganging to have nae speech of Maister Tirl, or ony lodger of mine."

"And wherefore not?" demanded the veteran; "and is this of your own foolish head, honest woman, or has your lodger left such orders?"

"Maybe he has and maybe no," answered Meg, sturdily; "and I ken nae mair right that ye suld ca' me honest woman, than I have to ca' you honest man, whilk is as far frae my thoughts as it wad be from heaven's truth."

"The woman is delectit!" said Captain MacTurk; "but coom, coom—a gentleman is not to be misused in this way when he comes on a gentleman's business; so make you a bit room on the door-stane, that I may pass by you, or I will make room for myself, by Cot! to your small pleasure."

And so saying he assumed the air of a man who was about to make good his passage. But Meg, without deigning farther reply, flourished around her head the hearth-broom, which she had been employing to its more legitimate purpose, when disturbed in her housewifery by Captain MacTurk.

"I ken your errand weel enough, Captain—and I ken yourself. Ye are one of the folk that gang about yonder setting folk by the lugs, as callants set their collics to fight. But ye shall come to nae lodger o' mine, let a-be Maister Tirl, wi' ony sic ungodly errand; for I am one that will keep God's peace and the King's within my dwelling."

So saying, and in explicit token of her peaceable intentions, she again flourished her broom.

The veteran instinctively threw himself under Saint George's guard, and drew two paces back, exclaiming, "That the woman was either mad, or as drunk as whisky could make her;" an alternative which afforded Meg so little satisfaction, that she fairly rushed on her retiring adversary, and began to use her weapon to full purpose.

"Me drunk, ye scandalous black guard!" (a blow with the broom interposed as parenthetically,) "me, that am fasting from all but sin and bohea!" (another whack.)

The Captain, swearing, exclaiming, and parrying, caught the blows as they fell, showing much dexterity in single-stick. The people began to gather, and how long his gallantry might have maintained itself against the spirit of self-defence and revenge, must be left uncertain, for the arrival of Tyrrel, returned from a short walk, put a period to the contest.

Meg, who had a great respect for her guest, began to feel ashamed of her own violence, and flunk into the house; observing, however, that she trusted she had made her hearth-broom and the auld nation's pow right weel acquainted. The tranquility which ensued upon her departure, gave Tyrrel an opportunity to ask the Captain, whom he at length recognized, the meaning of this singular affray, and whether the visit was intended for him; to which the veteran replied very discomposedly, that "he should have known that long enough ago, if he had had a people to open his door, and answer a civil question instead of a flying madwoman, who was wearing an eagle," he said, "or a mastiff-bitch, or a sheldie, or any other female beast in the creation."

Half suspecting his errand, and desirous to avoid unnecessary notoriety, Tyrrel, as he showed the Captain to the parlour, which he called his own, endeavoured to excuse the rudeness of his landlady, and to pass from the topic to that which had procured the honour of this visit.

"And you are right, my good Master Tyrrel," said the Captain, pulling down the sleeves of his coat, adjusting his handkerchief and breast-ruff, and endeavouring to recover the composure of manner becoming his mission, but still adverting indifferently to the usage he had received—"By Cot! if she had been a man, if it were the King himself—Hav' ye Mr. Tyrrel, I am come on a civil errand—and very civilly I have been treated—the auld brack sack he set in the stocks, and be tanned!—My friend Sir Bingo—By Cot! I shall never forget that woman's insolence—if there be a constable or a cat-o'-nines within ten miles!"

"I perceive, Captain," said Tyrrel, "that you are too much disturbed at this moment to enter upon the business which has brought you here—if you will step into my bedroom, and make use of some clean shirt and a towel, it will give you the time to compose yourself a little."

"I shall do no such thing, Mr. Tyrrel," answered the Captain, snappishly; "I do not want to be composed at all, and I do not want to stay in this place a minute longer than to do my errand to your friend's behalf. — And as for this tanned woman Dods"—

"You will in that case forgive my interrupting you, Captain MacTurk, as I presume your errand to me can have no reference to this strange quarrel with my landlady, with which I have nothing to do."

"And if I thought that it had, sir," said the Captain, interrupting Tyrrel in his turn, "you should have given me satisfaction before you was a quarter of an hour older—Oh, I would give five pounds to the first fellow that would say, Captain MacTurk, the wretch did right!"

"I certainly will not be that person you wish for, Captain," replied Tyrrel, "because I really do not know who was in the right or wrong; but I am certainly sorry that you should have met with ill usage when your purpose was to visit me."

"Well, sir, if you are concerned," said the man of peace, snappishly, "so am I, and there is an end of it. — And touching my errand to you—you cannot have forgotten that you treated my friend, Sir Bingo Brass, with singular incivility?"

"I recollect nothing of the kind, Captain," replied Tyrrel. "I remember that the gentleman, so called, took some uncivil liberties in laying foolish bets concerning me, and that I treated him, from respect to the rest of the company, and the ladies in particular, with a great degree of moderation and forbearance."

"And you must have very fine ideas of forbearance," replied the Captain, "when you took my good friend by the collar of the coat, and lifted him out of your way as if he had been a puppy dog! My good Mr. Tyrrel, I can assure you he does not think that you have forbore him at all, and he has no patience to forbear you; and I must either carry back a stiff-cient apology, or you must meet in a quiet way, with a good friend on each side.—And this was the errand I came on, when this tanned woman, with the hearth-broom, who is an enemy to all quiet and peaceable proceedings.”

“We will forget Mrs. Dods for the present, if you please, Captain MacTurk,” said Tyrrel—“and, to speak to the present subject, you will permit me to say, that I think this summons comes a little of the latest. You know best as a military man, but I have always understood that such differences are usually settled immediately after they occur—not that I intend to baulk Sir Bingo’s inclinations upon the score of delay, or any other account.”

“I dare say you will not—I dare say you will not,” Mr. Tyrrel, answered the Captain—“I am free to think that you know better what belongs to a gentleman.—And as to time—look you, my good sir, there are different sorts of people in this world, as there are different sorts of fire-arms. There are your hair-triggered rifles, that go off just at the right moment, and in the twinkling of an eye, and that, Mr. Tyrrel, is your true man of honour;—and there is a sort of person that takes a thing up too soon, and sometimes backs out of it, like your rubbishy Birmingham pieces, that will at one time go off at half-cock, and at another time burn priming without going off at all;—then again there are pieces that hang fire—for I should rather say, that are like the matchlocks which the black fellows use in the East Indies—there must be some blowing of the match, and so forth, which occasions delay, but the piece carries true enough after all.”

“And your friend Sir Bingo’s valour is of this last kind, Captain—I presume that is the inference. I should have thought it more like a boy’s cannon, which is fired by means of a train, and is but a pop-gun after all.”

“I cannot allow of such comparisons, sir,” said the Captain; “you will understand that I come here as Sir Bingo’s friend, and a reflection on him will be an affront to me.”

“I disclaim all intended offence to you, Captain—I have no wish to extend the number of my adversaries, or to add to them the name of a gallant officer like yourself,” replied Tyrrel.

“You are too obliging, sir,” said the Captain, drawing him up with dignity. “By Cot! and that was said very handsomely!—Well, sir, and shall I not have the pleasure of carrying back any explanation from you to Sir Bingo?—I assure you it would give me pleasure to make this matter handsomely up.”

“To Sir Bingo, Captain MacTurk, I have no apology to offer—I think I treated him more gently than his impertinence deserved.”

“Och, Och!” sighed the Captain, with a strong Highland intonation; “then there is no more to be said, but just to settle time and place; for pistols I suppose must be the weapons.”

“All these matters are quite the same to me,” said Tyrrel; “only, in respect of time, I should wish it to be as speedy as possible.—What say you to one, afternoon, this very day?—You may name the place.”

“At one, afternoon,” replied the Captain deliberately, “Sir Bingo will attend you—the place may be the Back-stane; for as the whole company go to the water-side to-day to eat a kettle of fish, there will be no risk of interruption.—And who shall I speak to, my good friend, on your side of the quarrel?”

“Really, Captain,” replied Tyrrel, “that is a puzzling question—I have no friend here—I suppose you could hardly ask for both?”

“It would be hardly, absolutely, and altogether out of the question, my good friend,” replied MacTurk.

A kettle of fish is a kind of stew of a particular kind, which is to be found in what the literary catalogue of Brown’s call it, but in actual poetry. A large caldron is fixed by the side of a salmon river, containing a quantity of water, seasoned with salt to the consistence of brine. In this the fish is plunged when taken, and eaten by the company frank water a rize. This is accounted the best way of eating salmon, by those who desire to taste the fish in a state of extreme freshness. Other prefer it after being kept a day or two, when the cold melts into oil, and the fish becomes richer and more luscious. The more judicious gastronomes eat no other sauce than a spoonful of the water in which the salmon is boiled, together with a little pepper and vinegar.

“But if you will trust to me, I will bring up a friend on your part from the Well, who, though you have hardly seen him before, will settle matters for you as well as if you had been intimate for twenty years—and I will bring up the Doctor too, if I can get him unloosed from the petticoat of that fat widow Blower, that he has strung himself upon.”

“I have no doubt you will do every thing with perfect accuracy, Captain. At one o’clock, then, we meet at the Back-stane—stay, permit me to see you to the door.”

“By Cot! and it is not altogether so unnecessary,” said the Captain; “for the tanned woman with the besom might have some advantage in that long dark passage, knowing the ground better than I do—tann her, I will have amends on her, if there be whipping-post, or ducking-stool, or a pair of stocks in the parish!” And so saying, the Captain trudged off, his spirits ever and anon agitated by recollection of the causeless aggression of Meg Dods, and again composed to a state of happy serenity by the recollection of the agreeable arrangement which he had made between Mr. Tyrrel, and his friend Sir Bingo Binks.

We have heard of men of undoubted benevolence of character and disposition, whose principal delight was to see a miserable criminal, degraded alike by his previous crimes, and the sentence which he had incurred, conclude a vicious and wretched life, by an ignominious and painful death. It was some such inconsistency of character which induced honest Captain MacTurk, who had really been a meritorious officer, and was a good-natured, honourable, and well-intentioned man, to place his chief delight in setting his friends by the ears, and then acting as umpire in the dangerous recitations, which, according to his code of honour, were absolutely necessary to restore peace and cordiality. We leave the explanation of such anomalies to the labours of craniologists, for they seem to defy all the researches of the Ethic philosopher.

CHAPTER XIII.

DISAPPOINTMENT.

Errol. I pray you now, good Master Slender’s serving-man, and friend Simple by your name, which way have you looked for Master Caus?

Slender. Murry, sir, the City-ward, the Park-ward, every way; Old Wind or way, and every way.

Murry. West of Winton.

Sir Bingo Binks received the Captain’s communication with the same dogged sulteriness he had displayed at sending the challenge; a most ungracious humph, ascending, as it were, from the very bottom of his stomach, through the folds of a Belcher handkerchief, intrinsically his equal, sooner, in a tone nearly as gracious as that with which the drowsy traveller acknowledges the intimation of the slipshod ostler, that it is on the table of five, and the horn will sound in a minute. Captain MacTurk by no means considered this exclamation as expressing a proper estimate of his own trouble and services. “Humph?” he replied; “and yha does that mean, Sir Bingo? Have not I here had the trouble to put you just into the next ready? or I would you have been able to make a handkerchief affair out of it at all, after you had let it hang so long in the wind, if I had not taken on myself to make it agreeable to the gentleman, and cooked as ne’er a mess out of it as I have seen a Frenchman do out of a stale rat?”

Sir Bingo saw it was necessary to utter some intimation of acquiescence and acknowledgment, which, however inarticulate, was sufficient to satisfy the veteran, to whom the adjustment of a personal affair of this kind was a labour of love, and who was now, kindly reminded of his promise to Tyrrel, hurried away as if he had been about the most creditable action upon earth, to secure the attendance of some one as a witness on the stranger’s part.

Mr. Winterblossom was the person whom MacTurk had in his own mind pitched upon as the fittest person to perform the act of benediction, and he lost no time in communicating his wish to that worthy gentleman. But Mr. Winterblossom, though a man of the world, and well enough acquainted with such matters, was by no means so passionately addicted to them as was the man of peace, Captain Hector MacTurk. As a bon vivant, he hated trouble of any kind, and the shrewd selfishness of his disposition enabled him to foresee, that a good deal might accrue to all concerned in the course of this business. He, therefore, coolly replied, that he knew nothing of Mr. Tyrrel—not even whether he was a gentleman or not; and besides, he had received no regular application in his behalf—he did not, therefore, feel himself at all inclined to go to the field as his second. This refusal drove the poor Captain to despair. He conjured his friend to be more public-spirited, and entreated him to consider the reputation of the Well, which was to them as a common country, and the honour of the company to which they both belonged, and of which Mr. Winterblossom was in a manner the proper representative, as being, with consent of all, the perpetual president. He reminded him how many quarrels had been nightly undertaken and departed from on the ensuing morning, without any suitable consequences—said, “that people began to talk of the place oddly; and that, for his own part, he found his own honour so nearly touched, that he had begun to think he himself would be obliged to bring somebody or other to account, for the general credit of the Well; and now, just when the most beautiful occasion had arisen to put every thing on a handsome footing, it was hard—it was cruel—it was most unjustifiable—in Mr. Winterblossom, to decline so simple a matter as was requested of him.”

Dry and taciturn as the Captain was on all ordinary occasions, he proved, on the present, eloquent and almost pathetic; for the tears came into his eyes when he recounted the various quarrels which had become addled, notwithstanding his best endeavours to hatch them into an honourable meeting; and here was one, at length, just clipping the shell, like to be smothered, for want of the most ordinary concession on the part of Winterblossom. In short, that gentleman could not hold out any longer. “It was,” he said, “a very foolish business, he thought; but to oblige Sir Bingo and Captain MacTurk, he had no objection to walk with them about noon as far as the Buck-stane, although he must observe the day was hazy, and he had felt a prophetic twinge or two, which looked like a visit of his old acquaintance podagra.”

“Never mind that, my excellent friend,” said the Captain, “a sup out of Sir Bingo’s flask is like enough to put that to rights; and by my soul, it is not the thing he is like to leave behind him on this sort of occasion, unless I be far mistaken in my man.”

“But,” said Winterblossom, “although I comply with your wishes thus far, Captain MacTurk, I by no means undertake for certain to back this same Master Tyrrel, of whom I know nothing at all, but only agree to go to the place in hopes of preventing mischief.”

“Never fash your beard about that, Mr. Winterblossom,” replied the Captain; “for a little mischief, as you call it, is become a thing absolutely necessary to the credit of the place; and I am sure, whatever be the consequences, they cannot in the present instance be very fatal to any body; for here is a young fellow that, if he should have a misfortune, nobody will miss, for nobody knows him; then there is Sir Bingo, whom every body knows so well, that they will miss him all the less.”

“And there will be Lady Bingo, a wealthy and handsome young widow,” said Winterblossom, throwing his hat upon his head with the grace and pretension of former days, and sighing to see, as he looked in the mirror, how much time, that had whitened his hair, rounded his stomach, wrinkled his brow, and bent down his shoulders, had disqualified him, as he expressed it, “for entering for such a plate.”

Secure of Winterblossom, the Captain’s next anxiety was to obtain the presence of Dr. Quackleben, who, although he wrote himself M. D., did not by any means decline practice as a surgeon, when any job offered for which he was likely to be well paid, as was warranted in the present instance, the wealthy baronet being a party principally concerned. The Doctor, therefore, like the eagle scented the carnage, seized, at the first word, the huge volume of morocco leather which formed his case of portable instruments, and uncoiled before the Captain, with ostentatious display, its formidable and glittering contents, upon which he began to lecture as upon a copious and interesting text, until the man of war thought it necessary to give him a word of caution.

“Och,” says he, “I do pray you, Doctor, to carry that packet of yours under the breast of your coat, or in your pocket, or somewhere out of sight, and by no means to produce or open it before the parties. For although scalpels, and tourniquets, and pincers, and the like, are very ingenious implements, and pretty to behold, and are also useful when time and occasion call for them, yet I have known the sight of them take away a man’s fighting stomach, and so lose their owner a job, Dr. Quackleben.”

“By my faith, Captain MacTurk,” said the Doctor, “you speak as if you were graduated!—I have known these treacherous articles play their master many a cursed trick. The very sight of my forceps, without the least effort on my part, once cured an inveterate toothache of three days’ duration, prevented the extraction of a carious molendinar, which it was the very end of their formation to achieve, and sent me home minus a guinea.—But hand me that great-coat, Captain, and we will place the instruments in ambuscade, until they are called into action in due time. I should think something will happen—Sir Bingo is a sure shot at a moorcock.”

“Cannot say,” replied MacTurk; “I have known the pistol shake many a hand that held the fowling-piece fast enough. Yonder Tyrrel looks like a devilish cool customer—I watched him the whole time I was delivering my errand, and I can promise you he is mettle to the backbone.”

“Well—I will have my bandages ready secundum artem,” replied the man of medicine. “We must guard against hæmorrhage—Sir Bingo is a phthonic subject.—One o’clock, you say—at the Buck-stane—I will be punctual.”

“Will you not walk with us?” said Captain MacTurk, who seemed willing to keep his whole convoy together on this occasion, lest, peradventure, any of them had fled from under his patronage.

“No,” replied the Doctor, “I must first make an apology to worthy Mrs. Blower, for I had promised her my arm down to the river-side, where they are all to eat a kettle of fish.”

“By Cot! and I hope we shall make them a prettier kettle of fish than was ever seen at St. Ronan’s,” said the Captain, rubbing his hands.

“Don’t say we, Captain,” replied the cautious Doctor; “I for one have nothing to do with the meeting—wash my hands of it. No, no, I cannot afford to be clapt up as accessory.—You ask me to meet you at the Buck-stane—no purpose assigned—I am willing to oblige my worthy friend, Captain MacTurk—walk that way, thinking of nothing particular—hear the report of pistols—hasten to the spot—fortunately just in time to prevent the most fatal consequences—chance most opportunely to have my case of instruments with me—indeed, generally walk with them about me—nunquam non paratus—then give my professional definition of the wound and state of the patient. That is the way to give evidence, Captain, before sheriffs, coroners, and such sort of folk—never commit one’s self—it is a rule of our profession.”

“Well, well, Doctor,” answered the Captain, “you know your own ways best; and so you are but there to give a chance of help in case of accident, all the laws of honour will be fully complied with. But it would be a foul reflection upon me, as a man of honour, if I did not take care that there should be somebody to come in thirdsman between Death and my principal.”

At the awful hour of one, afternoon, there arrived upon the appointed spot Captain MacTurk, leading to the field the valorous Sir Bingo, not exactly straining like a greyhound in the slips, but rather looking moody like a butcher’s bull-dog, which knows he must fight since his master bids him. Yet the Baronet showed no outward flinching or abatement of courage, excepting, that the une of Jenny Saton which he had whistled without intermission since he left the Hotel, had, during the last half mile of their walk, sunk into silence; although, to look at the muscles of the mouth, projection of the lip, and vacancy of the eye, it seemed as if the notes were still passing through his mind, and that he whistled Jenny Sutton in his imagination. Mr. Winterblossom came two minutes after this happy pair and the Doctor was equally punctual.

"Upon my soul," said the former, "this is a mighty silly affair, Sir Bingo, and might, I think, be easily taken up, at less risk to all parties than a meeting of this kind. You should recollect, Sir Bingo, that you have much depending upon your life—you are a married man, Sir Bingo."

Sir Bingo turned the quid in his mouth and squirted out the juice in a most coachman-like manner.

"Mr. Winterblossom," said the Captain, "Sir Bingo has in this matter put himself in my hands, and unless you think yourself more able to direct his course than I am, I must frankly tell you, that I will be disoblged by your interference. You may speak to your own friend as much as you please; and if you find yourself authorized to make any proposal, I shall be desirous to lend an ear to it on the part of my worthy principal, Sir Bingo. But I will be plain with you, that I do not greatly approve of settlements upon the field, though I hope I am a quiet and peaceable man. But here is our honour to be looked after in the first place; and moreover, I must insist that every proposal for accommodation shall originate with your party or yourself."

"My party?" answered Winterblossom; "why really, though I came hither at your request, Captain MacTurk, yet I must see more of the matter, ere I can fairly pronounce myself second to a man I never saw but once."

"And, perhaps, may never see again," said the Doctor, looking at his watch; "for it is ten minutes past the hour, and here is no Mr. Tyrrel."

"Hey! what's that you say, Doctor?" said the Baronet, awakened from his apathy.

"He speaks tamned nonsense," said the Captain, pulling out a huge old-fashioned, turnip-shaped implement, with a blackened silver dial-plate. "It is not above three minutes after one by the true time, and I will uphold Mr. Tyrrel to be a man of his word—never saw a man take a thing more coolly."

"Not more coolly than he takes his walk this way," said the Doctor; "for the hour is as I tell you—remember I am professional—have pulses to count by the second and half-second—my time-piece must go as true as the sun."

"And I have mounted guard a thousand times by my watch," said the Captain; "and I defy the devil to say that Hector MacTurk did not always discharge his duty to the twentieth part of the fraction of a second—it was my great grandmother, Lady Killbracklin's and I will maintain its reputation against any timepiece that ever went upon wheels."

"Well, then, look at your own watch, Captain," said Winterblossom, for time stands still with no man, and while we speak the hour advances. On my word, I think this Mr. Tyrrel intends to humbug us."

"Hey! what's that you say?" said Sir Bingo, once more starting from his sullen reverie.

"I shall not look at my watch upon no such matter," said the Captain; "nor will I any way be disposed to doubt your friend's honour, Mr. Winterblossom."

"My friend?" said Mr. Winterblossom; "I must tell you once more, Captain, that this Mr. Tyrrel is no friend of mine—none in the world. He is your friend, Captain MacTurk; and I own, if he keeps us waiting much longer on this occasion, I will be apt to consider his friendship as of very little value."

"And how dare you, then, say that the man is my friend?" said the Captain, knitting his brows in a most formidable manner.

"Pooh! pooh! Captain," answered Winterblossom, coolly, if not contemptuously—"keep all that for silly boys; I have lived in the world too long either to provoke quarrels, or to care about them. So, reserve your fire; it is all thrown away on such an old cock as I am. But I really wish we knew whether this fellow means to come—twenty minutes past the hour—I think it is odds that you are bilked, Sir Bingo?"

"Bilked! hey!" cried Sir Bingo; "by Gad, I always thought so—I wagered with Mowbray he was a raff—I am had, by Gad. I'll wait no longer than the half hour, by Gad, were he a field-marshal."

"You will be directed in that matter by your friend, if you please, Sir Bingo," said the Captain.

"D—n me if I will," returned the Baronet—"Friend? a pretty friend, to bring me out here on such a fool's errand! I knew the fellow was a raff—but I never thought you, with all your chaff about honour, such a d—d spoon as to bring a message from a fellow who has fled the pit!"

"If you regret so much having come here to no purpose," said the Captain, in a very lofty tone, "and if you think I have used you like a spoon, as you say, I will have no objection in life to take Mr. Tyrrel's place, and serve your occasion, my boy."

"By —! and if you like it, you may fire away, and welcome," said Sir Bingo; "and I'll spin a crown for first shot, for I do not understand being brought here for nothing, d—n me!"

"And there was never man alive so ready as I am to give you something to stay your stomach," said the irritable Highlander.

"Oh, fie, gentlemen! fie, fie, fie!" exclaimed the pacific Mr. Winterblossom—"For shame, Captain—Out upon you, Sir Bingo, are you mad?—what, principal and second!—the like was never heard of—never."

The parties were in some degree recalled to their more cool recollections by this expostulation, yet continued a short quarter-deck walk to and fro, upon parallel lines, looking at each other sullenly as they passed, and bristling like two dogs who have a mind to quarrel, yet hesitate to commence hostilities. During this promenade, also, the perpendicular and erect carriage of the veteran, rising on his toes at every step, formed a whimsical contrast with the heavy loutish shuffle of the bulky Baronet, who had, by dint of practice, very nearly attained that most enviable of all carriages, the gate of a shambling Yorkshire ostler. His coarse spirit was now thoroughly kindled, and like iron, or any other baser metal, which is slow in receiving heat, it retained long the smouldering and angry spirit of resentment that had originally brought him to the place, and now rendered him willing to wreak his uncomfortable feelings upon the nearest object which occurred, since the first purpose of his coming thither was frustrated. In his own phrase, his pluck was up, and finding himself in a fighting humour, he thought it a pity, like Bob Acres, that so much good courage should be thrown away. As, however, that courage after all consisted chiefly in ill humour; and as, in the demeanour of the Captain, he read nothing deferential or deprecatory of his wrath, he began to listen with more attention to the arguments of Mr. Winterblossom, who entreated them not to sully, by private quarrel, the honour they had that day so happily acquired without either blood or risk.

"It was now," he said, "three quarters of an hour past the time appointed for this person, who calls himself Tyrrel, to meet Sir Bingo Binks. Now, instead of standing squabbling here, which serves no purpose, I propose we should reduce to writing the circumstances which attend this affair, for the satisfaction of the company at the Well, and that the memorandum shall be regularly attested by our subscriptions; after which, I shall farther humbly propose that it be subjected to the revision of the Committee of Management."

"I object to any revision of a statement to which my name shall be appended," said the Captain.

"Right—very true, Captain," said the complaisant Mr. Winterblossom; "undoubtedly you know best, and your signature is completely sufficient to authenticate this transaction—however, as it is the most important which has occurred since the Spring was established, I propose we shall all sign the procès-verbal, as I may term it."

"Leave me out, if you please," said the Doctor, not much satisfied that both the original quarrel and the by-battle had passed over without any occasion for the offices of a Machaon; "leave me out, if you please; for it does not become me to be ostensibly concerned in any proceedings, which have had for their object a breach of the peace. And for the importance of waiting here for an hour, in a fine afternoon, it is my opinion there was a more important service done to the Well of St. Ronan's, when I, Quentin Quackleben, M. D., cured Lady Penelope Penfeather of her seventh attack upon the nerves, attended with febrile symptoms."

"No disparagement to your skill at all, Doctor," said Mr. Winterblossom; "but I conceive the lesson which this fellow has received will be a great means to prevent improper persons from appearing at the Spring hereafter; and, for my part, I shall move that no one be invited to dine at the table in future, till his name is regularly entered as a member of the company, in the lists at the public room. And I hope both Sir Bingo and the Captain will receive the thanks of the company, for their spirited conduct in expelling the intruder.—Sir Bingo, will you allow me to apply to your flask—a little twinge I feel, owing to the dampness of the grass."

Sir Bingo, soothed by the consequence he had acquired, readily imparted to the invalid a thimbleful of his cordial, which, we believe, had been prepared by some cunning chymist in the wilds of Glenlivat. He then filled a bumper, and extended it towards the veteran, as an unequivocal symptom of reconciliation. The real turbinacious flavour no sooner reached the nose of the Captain, than the beverage was turned down his throat with symptoms of most unequivocal applause.

"I shall have some hope of the young fellows of this day," he said, "now that they begin to give up their Dutch and French distilled waters, and stick to genuine Highland ware. By Cot, it is the only liquor fit for a gentleman to drink in a morning, if he can have the good fortune to come by it, you see."

"Or after dinner either, Captain," said the Doctor, to whom the glass had passed in rotation; "it is worth all the wines in France for flavour, and more cordial to the system besides."

"And now," said the Captain, "that we may not go off the ground with any thing on our stomachs worse than the whisky, I can afford to say, (as Captain Hector MacTurk's character is tolerably well established,) that I am sorry for the little difference that has occurred betwixt me and my worthy friend, Sir Bingo, here."

"And since you are so civil, Captain," said Sir Bingo, "why, I am sorry too—only it would put the devil out of temper to lose so fine a fishing day—wind south—fine air on the pool—water settled from the flood—just in trim—and I dare say three pairs of books have passed over my cast before this time!"

He closed this elaborate lamentation with a libation of the same cordial which he had imparted to his companions; and they returned in a body to the Hotel, where the transactions of the morning were soon afterwards announced to the company, by the following program:—

STATEMENT.

"Sir Bingo Binks, baronet, having found himself aggrieved by the uncivil behaviour of an individual calling himself Francis Tyrrel, now or lately a resident at the Cleikum Inn, Aultoun of St. Ronan's; and having empowered Captain Hector MacTurk to wait upon the said Mr. Tyrrel to demand an apology, under the alternative of personal satisfaction, according to the laws of honour and the practice of gentlemen, the said Tyrrel voluntarily engaged to meet the said Sir Bingo Binks, baronet, at the Buck-stane near St. Ronan's Burn, upon this present day, being Wednesday—August. In consequence of which appointment, we, the undersigned, did attend at the place named, from one o'clock till two, without seeing or hearing any thing whatever of the said Francis Tyrrel, or any one in his behalf—which fact we make thus publicly known, that all men, and particularly the distinguished company assembled at the Fox Hotel, may be duly apprized of the character and behaviour of the said Francis Tyrrel, in case of his again presuming to intrude himself into the society of persons of honour.

"The Fox Inn and Hotel, St. Ronan's Well—August 18—

(Signed)

"BINGO BINKS,
"HECTOR MACTURK,
"PHILIP WINTERBLOSSOM."

A little lower followed this separate attestation:

"I, Quentin Quackleben, M. D., F. R. S., D. E., B. L., X. Z., &c. &c., being called upon to attest what I know in the said matter, do hereby verify, that being by accident at the Buck-stane, near St. Ronan's Burn, on this present day, at the hour of one afternoon, and chancing to remain there for the space of nearly an hour, conversing with Sir Bingo Binks, Captain MacTurk, and Mr. Winterblossom, we did not, during that time, see or hear any thing of or from the person calling himself Francis Tyrrel, whose presence at that place seemed to be expected by the gentlemen I have just named." This affiche was dated like the former, and certified under the august hand of Quentin Quackleben, M. D., &c. &c. &c.

Again, and prefaced by the averment that an improper person had been lately introduced into the company of St. Ronan's Well, there came forth a legislative enactment, on the part of the Committee, declaring, "that no one shall in future be invited to the dinners, or balls, or other entertainments of the Well, until their names shall be regularly entered in the books kept for the purpose at the rooms." Lastly, there was a vote of thanks to Sir Bingo Binks and Captain MacTurk for their spirited conduct, and the pains which they had taken to exclude an improper person from the company at St. Ronan's Well.

These annunciations speedily became the magnet of the day. All idlers crowded to peruse them; and it would be endless to notice the "God bless me's"—the "Lord have a care of us"—the "Saw you ever the like's" of gossips, any more than the "Dear me's" and "Oh, laa's" of the titupping misses, and the oaths of the pantalooned or buck-skin'd beaux. The character of Sir Bingo rose like the stocks at the news of a despatch from the Duke of Wellington, and, what was extraordinary, attained some consequence even in the estimation of his lady. All shook their heads at the recollection of the unlucky Tyrrel, and found out much in his manner and address which convinced them that he was but an adventurer and swindler. A few, however, less partial to the Committee of Management, (for whenever there is an administration, there will soon arise an opposition,) whispered among themselves, that, to give the fellow his due, the man, be he what he would, had only come among them, like the devil, when he was called for; and honest Dame Blower blessed herself when she heard of such blood-thirsty doings as had been intended, and "thanked God that honest Doctor Kickherben had come to nae harm amang a' their nonsense."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE CONSULTATION.

Clown. I hope here be proofs.—Measure for Measure

THE borough of — lies, as all the world knows, about fourteen miles distant from St. Ronan's, being the county town of that shire, which, as described in the Tourist's Guide, numbers among its objects of interest that gay and popular watering-place, whose fame, no doubt, will be greatly enhanced by the present annals of its earlier history. As it is at present unnecessary to be more particular concerning the scene of our story, we will fill up the blank left in the first name with the fictitious appellation of Marchthorn, having often found ourselves embarrassed in the course of a story, by the occurrence of an ugly hiatus, which we cannot always at first sight fill up, with the proper reference to the rest of the narrative.

Marchthorn, then, was an old-fashioned Scottish town, the street of which, on market-day, showed a reasonable number of stout great-coated yeomen, bartering or dealing for the various commodities of their farms; and on other days of the week, only a few forlorn burghers, crawling about like half-awakened flies, and watching the town steeple till the happy sound of twelve strokes from Time's oracle should tell them it was time to take their meridian dram. The narrow windows of the shops intimated very imperfectly the miscellaneous contents of the interior, where every merchant, as the shopkeepers of Marchthorn were termed, more Scotico, sold every thing that could be thought of. As for manufactures, there were none, except that of the careful Town-Council, who were nightly busied in preparing the warp and woof, which, at the end of every five or six years, the town of Marchthorn contributed, for the purpose of weaving the fourth or fifth part of a member of Parliament.

In such a town, it usually happens, that the Sheriff-clerk, especially supposing him agent for several lairds of the higher order, is possessed of one of the best-looking houses; and such was that of Mr. Bindloose. None of the smartness of the brick-built and brass-hammered mansion of a southern attorney appeared indeed in this mansion, which was a tall, thin, grim-looking building, in the centre of the town, with narrow windows and projecting gables, notched into that sort of descent, called crow-steps, and having the lower casements defended by stanchions of iron; for Mr. Bindloose, as frequently happens, kept a branch of one of the two national banks, which had been lately established in the town of Marchthorn.

Towards the door of this tenement, there advanced slowly up the ancient, but empty streets of this famous borough, a vehicle, which, had it appeared in Piccadilly, would have furnished unremitted laughter for a week, and conversation for a twelve month. It was a two-wheeled vehicle, which claimed none of the modern appellations of tilbury, tandem, dennet, or the like; but aspired only to the humble name of that almost forgotten accommodation, a whiskey; or, according to some authorities, a tum-whiskey. Green was, or had been, its original colour, and it was placed sturdily and safely low upon its little old-fashioned wheels, which bore much less than the usual proportion to the size of the carriage which they sustained. It had a calash head, which had been pulled up, in consideration either to the dampness of the morning air or to the retiring delicacy of the fair form, which, shrouded by leathern curtains, tenanted this venerable specimen of antediluvian coach-building.

But, as this fair and modest dame no way aspired to the skill of a charioteer, the management of a horse, which seemed as old as the carriage he drew, was in the exclusive charge of an old fellow in a postilion's jacket, whose gray hairs escaped on each side of an old-fashioned velvet jockey-cap, and whose left shoulder was so considerably elevated above his head, that it seemed as if, with little effort, his neck might have been tucked under his arm, like that of a roasted grouse-cock. This gallant equerry was mounted on a steed as old as that which toiled betwixt the shafts of the carriage, and which he guided by a leading rein. Goading one animal with his single spur, and stimulating the other with his whip, he effected a reasonable trot upon the causeway, which only terminated when the whiskey stopped at Mr. Bindloose's door—an event of importance enough to excite the curiosity of the inhabitants of that and the neighbouring houses. Wheels were laid aside, needles left sticking in the half-finished seams, and many a nose, spectacled and unspectacled, was popped out of the adjoining windows, which had the good fortune to command a view of Mr. Bindloose's front door. The faces of two or three giggling clerks were visible at the barred casements of which we have spoken, much amused at the descent of an old lady from this respectable carriage, whose dress and appearance might possibly have been fashionable at the time when her equipage was new. A satin cardinal, lined with gray squirrels' skin, and a black silk bonnet, trimmed with crape, were garments which did not now excite the respect, which in their fresher days they had doubtless commanded. But there was that in the features of the wearer, which would have commanded Mr. Bindloose's best regard, though it had appeared in far worse attire; for he beheld the face of an ancient customer, who had always paid her law expenses with the ready penny, and whose account with the bank was balanced by a very respectable sum at her credit. It was, indeed, no other than our respected friend, Mrs. Dods of the Clakum Inn, St. Ronan's, Aultoun.

Now her arrival intimated matter of deep import. Meg was a person of all others most averse to leave her home, where, in her own opinion at least, nothing went on well without her immediate superintendence. Limited, therefore, as was her sphere, she remained fixed in the centre thereof; and few as were her satellites, they were under the necessity of performing their revolutions around her, while she herself continued stationary. Saturn, in fact, would be scarce more surprised at a passing call from the Sun, than Mr. Bindloose at this unexpected visit of his old client. In one breath he rebuked the inquisitive impertinence of his clerks, in another stimulated his housekeeper, old Hannah—for Mr. Bindloose was a bluff bachelor—to get tea ready in the green parlour; and while yet speaking, was at the side of the whiskey, unclasping the curtains, rolling down the apron, and assisting his old friend to dismount.

"The japanned tea-caddie, Hannah—the best bohea—bid Tib kindle a spark of fire—the morning's damp—Draw in the giggling faces of ye, ye d—d idle scoundrels, or laugh at your ain toom pouches—it will be lang or your weel-doin' fill them." This was spoken, as the honest lawyer himself might have said, in transitu, the rest by the side of the carriage. "My stars, Mrs. Dods, and is this really your ain sell, in propria persona?—Wha lookit for you at such a time of day?—Anthony, how's a' wi' ye, Anthony?—so ye hae taen the road again, Anthony—help us down wi' the apron, Anthony—that will do.—Lean on me, Mrs. Dods—help your mistress, Anthony—put the horses in my stable—the lads will give you the key.—Come away, Mrs. Dods—I am blithe to see you straight your legs on the causeway of our auld borough again—come in by, and we'll see to get you some breakfast, for ye hae been asteer early this morning."

"I am a sair trouble to you, Mr. Bindloose," said the old lady, accepting the offer of his arm, and accompanying him into the house; "I am e'en a sair trouble to you, but I could not rest till I had your advice on something of moment."

"Happy will I be to serve you, my gude auld acquaintance," said the Clerk; "but sit you down—sit you down—sit you down, Mrs. Dods—meat and mess never hindered wark. Ye are something overcome wi' your travel—the spirit cannot aye bear through the flesh, Mrs. Dods; ye should remember that your life is a precious one, and ye should take care of your health, Mrs. Dods."

"My life precious?" exclaimed Meg Dods; "nane o' your whullywhaing, Mr. Bindloose—Deil an' wad miss the auld girning alewife, Mr. Bindloose, unless it were here and there a puir body, and maybe the auld house-tyke, that wadna be sae weel guided, puir fallow."

"Fie, fie! Mrs. Dods," said the Clerk, in a tone of friendly rebuke; "it vexes an auld friend to hear ye speak of yourself in that respectless sort of a way; and, as for quitting us, I bless God I have not seen you look better this half score of years. But maybe you will be thinking of setting your house in order, which is the act of a careful and of a Christian woman—O! it's an awfu' thing to die intestate, if we had grace to consider it."

"Aweel, I daur say I'll consider that some day soon Mr. Bindloose; but that's no my present errand."

"Be it what it like, Mrs. Dods, ye are right heartily welcome here, and we have a' the day to speak of the business in hand—festina lente, that is the true law language—hooly and fairly, as one may say—ill treating of business with an empty stomach—and here comes your tea, and I hope Hannah has made it to your taste."

Meg sipped her tea—confessed Hannah's skill in the mysteries of the Chinese herb—sipped again, then tried to eat a bit of bread and butter, with very indifferent success; and notwithstanding the lawyer's compliments to her good looks, seemed, in reality, on the point of becoming ill.

"In the deil's name, what is the matter!" said the lawyer, too well read in a profession where sharp observation is peculiarly necessary, to suffer these symptoms of agitation to escape him. "Ay, dame? ye are taking this business of yours deeper to heart than ever I kend you take ony thing. Ony o' your banded debtors failed, or like to fail? What then! cheer ye up—you can afford a little loss, and it canna be ony great matter, or I would doubtless have heard of it."

"In troth, but it is a loss, Mr. Bindloose; and what say ye to the loss of a friend?"

This was a possibility which had never entered the lawyer's long list of calamities, and he was at some loss to conceive what the old lady could possibly mean by so sentimental a prolusion. But just as he began to come out with his "Ay, ay, we are all mortal, Vita incerta, mors certissima!" and two or three more pithy reflections, which he was in the habit of uttering after funerals, when the will of the deceased was about to be opened,—just then Mrs. Dods was pleased to become the expounder of her own oracle.

"I see how it is, Mr. Bindloose," she said; "I maun tell my ain ailment, for you are no likely to guess it; and so, if ye will shut the door, and see that nane of your giggling callants are listening in the passage, I will e'en tell you how things stand with me."

Mr. Bindloose hastily arose to obey her commands, gave a cautionary glance into the Bank-Office, and saw that his idle apprentices were fast at their desks—turned the key upon them, as if it were in a fit of absence, and then returned, not a little curious to know what could be the matter with his old friend: and leaving off all further attempts to put cases, quietly drew his chair near hers, and awaited her own time to make her communication.

"Mr. Bindloose," said she, "I am no sure that you may mind, about six or seven years ago, that there were twa daft English callants, lodgers of mine, that had some trouble from auld St. Ronan's about shooting on the Springwell-head muirs."

"I mind it as weel as yesterday, Mistress," said the Clerk; "by the same token you gave me a note for my trouble, (which wasna worth speaking about,) and bade me no bring in a bill against the puir bairns—ye had aye a kind heart, Mrs. Dods."

"Maybe, and maybe no, Mr. Bindloose—that is just as I find folk.—But concerning these lads, they baith left the country, and, as I think, in some ill blude wi' ane another, and now the auldest and the doucest of the twa came back again about a fortnight sin' syne, and has been my guest ever since."

"Aweel, and I trust he is not at his auld tricks again, goodwife?" answered the Clerk. "I havena see muckle to say either wi' the new Sheriff or the Bench of Justices as I used to hac, Mrs. Dods—and the Procurator-fiscal is very severe on poaching, being borne out by the new Association—few of our auld friends of the Killnakelty are able to come to the sessions now, Mrs. Dods."

"The waur for the country, Mr. Bindloose," replied the old lady—"they were decent, considerate men, that didna plague a puir herd callant muckle about a moorfowl or a mawkin, unless he turned common fowler—Sir Robert Ringhorse used to say the herd lads shot as mony gleds and pyots as they did game.—But new lords new laws—naething but fine and imprisonment, and the game no a feather the plentier. If I wad hac a brace or twa of birds in the house, as every body looks for them after the twelfth—I ken what they are like to cost me—And what for no?—risk maun be paid for.—There is John Pirner himsell, that has kept it the muir-side thirty year in spite of a' the lairds in the country, shoots, he tells me, now-a-days, as if he felt a rape about his neck."

"It wasna about ony game business, then, that you wanted advice?" said Bindloose, who, though somewhat of a digresser himself, made little allowance for the excursions of others from the subject in hand.

"Indeed is it no, Mr. Bindloose," said Meg; "but it is e'en about this unhappy callant that I spoke to you about. Ye maun ken I have cleiket a particular fancy to this lad, Francis Tirl—a fancy that whiles surprises my very sell, Mr. Bindloose, only that there is nae sin in it."

"None—none in the world, Mrs. Dods," said the lawyer, thinking at the same time within his mind. "Oho! the mist begins to clear up—the young roacher has hit the mark, I see—winged the old barren gray hen!—ay, ay, a marriage-contract, no doubt—but I maun gie her line. Ye are a wise woman, Mrs. Dods," he continued aloud, "and can doubtless consider the chances and the changes of human affairs."

"But I could never have considered what has befallen this puir lad, Mr. Bindloose," said Mrs. Dods, "through the malice of wicked men.—He lived, then, at the Cleikum, as I tell you, for mair than a fortnight, as quiet as a lamb on a lea-rig—a decenter lad never came within my door—ate and drank enough for the gude of the house, and nae mair than was for his an gude, whether of body or soul—cleared his bills ilka Saturday at e'en, as regularly as Saturday came round."

"An admirable customer, no doubt, Mrs. Dods," said the lawyer.

"Never was the like of him for that matter," answered the honest dame. "But to see the malice of men!—Some of thae landloupers and gill-flirts down at the filthy puddle yonder, that they ca' the Waal, had heard of this puir lad, and the bits of pictures that he made fashion of drawing, and they maun cridle him awa down to the hottle, where mony a bonny story they had clecked, Mr. Bindloose, baith of Mr. Tirl and of mysell."

"A Commissary Court business," said the writer, going off again upon a false scent. "I shall trim their jackets for them, Mrs. Dods, if you can but bring tight evidence of the facts—I will soon bring them to fine and palinode—I will make them repent meddling with your good name."

"My gude name! What the sorrow is the matter wi' my name, Mr. Bindloose?" said the irritable client. "I think ye hae been at the wee cappie this morning, for as early as it is—My gude name!—if ony body touched my gude name, I would neither seek counsel nor commissary—I wad be down amang them, like a jer-falcon amang a wheen wild-geese, and the best amang them that dared to say ony thing of Meg Dods by what was honest and civil, I wad sune see if her cockernounie was made of her ain hair or other folk's. My gude name, indeed!"

"Weel, weel, Mrs. Dods, I was mista'en; that's a'," said the writer, "I was mista'en; and I dare to say you would haud your ain wi' your neighbours as weel as ony woman in the land.—But let us hear now what the grief is, in one word."

"In one word, then, Clerk Bindloose, it is little short of—murder," said Meg in a low tone, as if the very utterance of the word startled her.

"Murder! murder, Mrs. Dods?—it cannot be—there is not a word of it in the Sheriff-office—the Procurator-fiscal kens nothing of it—there could not be murder in the country, and me not hear of it—for God's sake, take heed what you say, woman and dinna get yourself into trouble."

"Mr. Bindloose, I can but speak according to my lights," said Mrs. Dods; "you are in a sense a judge in Israel, at least you are one of the scribes having authority—and I tell you, with a wee and a bitter heart, that this puir callant of mine that was lodging in my house has been murdered or kidnapped awa amang thae banditti folk down at the New Waal; and I'll have the law put in force against them, if it should cost me a hundred pounds."

The Clerk stood much astonished at the nature of Mag's reputation, and the pertinacity with which she seemed disposed to insist upon it.

"I have this comfort," she continued, "that whatever has happened, it has been by no fault of mine. Mr. Hindloom, for well I wot, before that blood-thirsty and half-pay Philistine, MacTurk, got to speech of him, I showed his castle to some purpose with my hearty-bonnet. But the poor simple hearted barnet, that had no more knowledge of the wickedness of human nature than a calf has of a flambé's gully, he thought to see the wild hardened blood-shedder, and tryed wi' him to meet wi' some of the gang at an hour certain that same day, and awa he went to keep tryat, but since that hour nobody ever has set een on him. And the man's own 'd case now want to put a degree on him, and say that he killed the country rather than face them—a likely story—find the country for them!—and leave his bell un-entitled—him that was so regular—and his gun mangle and his fishing rod, and the penes and pictures he held as a work about!—Is my faithful belief, Mr. Hindloom—and ye may trust me or no as ye like—that he had some foul play between the Clankum and the Duck-stane. I have thought it, and I have dreamed it, and I will be at the bottom of it, or my name is not Meg Doda, and that I wad have them a' to reckon on. Ay, ay, that's right Mr. Hindloom, tak out your pen and inkhorn, and let us set about it to purpose."

With considerable difficulty and at the expense of much cross-examination, Mr. Hindloom extracted from his client a detailed account of the proceedings of the company at the Well towards Tyrrel, so far as they were known to, or suspected by Meg, making note, as the examination proceeded, of what appeared to be matter of consequence. After a moment's consideration, he asked the dame the very natural question, how she came to be acquainted with the matter; and, that a hostile appointment was made between Captain MacTurk and her lodger, when, according to her own account, it was made infra parietes, and in medio latibatur?

"Ay, but ye retailers ken wae enough what goes on in our ain houses," said Meg—"And what for no? If ye wou'd ken a' about it, I c'd listen through e' her hole of the door."

"And do you say you heard them settle an appointment for a duel?" said the Clerk; "and did you see any measures to hinder mischief, Mrs. Doda, owing much a respect for this lad as you say you have, Mrs. Doda!—I really wadna have looked for the like this at your hands."

"In truth, Mr. Hindloom," said Meg, putting her foot to her eye, "and that's what vexes me mair on a' the rest, and ye wou'dna say much to one sae heart as a'en the aiver that she has been a sought to blame. But there has been mair a coal-burn, so they co' it, passed in my house when that it lads of the Widdie Club and the Hottelshelter are upon their rambles, and they had aye power enough to make it up without fighting, see that I illy did not apprehend any thing like mischief—id ye maun think, moreover, Mr. Hindloom, that it wou'd have been on once thing if a guest, in a decent creditable public like mine, was to have cried ward before any of these land-louping blackguards at live down at the horne sundre."

"That is to say, Mrs. Doda, you were dangerous just awt should fight for the honour of your house," said Hindloom.

"What for na, Mr. Hindloom?—Isna that hand Gray aye about honour? and what for should the mair of a substantial, four-nooked, solid house of me stories, no be foughten for, as wae as the credit of any of these feckless callants that make such a y about their reputation?—I promise you my house, a Clankum, stood in the Auld Town of St. Ronan's fore they were born, and it will stand there after ay are hanged, as I trust some of them are like to."

"Well, but perhaps your lodger had less zeal for the honour of the house, and has quietly taken himself a' of harm's way," said Mr. Hindloom; "for if I understand your story, this meeting never took place."

"Have less zeal?" said Meg, determined to be pleased with no suppression of her lawyer, "Mr. Hindloom, ye little ken him—I wad ye had seen him when he was angry!—I dard hardly face him myself, and there are no mony folk that I am feared for—Mosting? there was nae meeting, I trow—they never dard to meet him fairly—but I am awre wae come of it than ever wou'd have come of a meeting; for Anthony heard two shots gang off as he was watering the mill aye down at the burn, and that is not far frae the footpath that leads to the Duck-stane. I was angry at him for no making us to see what the matter was, but he thought it was awt First out with the double barrel, and he wadna been of making himself a witness, in case he shud have been cas'd on in the Peaching Court."

"Well," said the Sheriff-clerk, "and I dare say he did hear a poacher fire a couple of shots—nothing more likely. Believe me, Mrs. Doda, your guest had no fear for the party Captain MacTurk invited him to—and being a quiet sort of man, he has just walked away to his own home if he has one—I am really sorry you have given yourself the trouble of this long journey about so simple a matter."

Mrs. Doda remained with her eyes fixed on the ground in a very silent and discontented pensive, and when she spoke, it was in a tone of corresponding displeasure.

"Awat—awat—live and learn, they say—I thought I had a friend in you, Mr. Hindloom—I am awre I aye took your part when both wou'dna'd ye, and said ye were that, and the other thing, and bide better than an awt snick drawing lann, Mr. Hindloom. And ye have aye kept my penny of money, though, nae doubt, Tam Turnpenny lives nearer me, and they say he allows half a per cent mair than ye do if the mill has, and mine is but seldom started."

"But ye have not the Bank's security, madam," said Mr. Hindloom reidening. "I say harm of no man's credit—all wou'd it beseem me—but there is a difference between Tam Turnpenny and the Bank, I trow."

"Weel, weel, Bank here Bank there, I thought I had a friend in you, Mr. Hindloom, and here am I, come from my ain house all the way to yours for awt comfort, I think."

"My stars, madam," said the perplexed justice, "what would you have me to do in such a blood story as yours, Mrs. Doda?—Is a thought reasonable—consider that there is no Corpus delicti?"

"Corpus delicti? and what's that?" said Meg; "something to be paid for, nae doubt, for your hard words a end in that—And what for said I no have a Corpus delicti, or a Habeas Corpus, or any other Corpus that I like, as long as I am willing to lide and lay down the ready siller?"

"Lord help and pardon us, Mrs. Doda," said the distressed agent, "ye mistake the matter's together! When I say there is no Corpus delicti, I mean to say there is no proof that a crime has been committed."

"And does the man say that murder is not a crime, then?" answered Meg, who had taken her own view of the subject far too strongly to be converted to any other—"Weel I wot it's a crime, besh by the law of God and man, and mony a pretty man has been strapp'd for it."

"I ken all that very weel," answered the writer; "but, my stars, Mrs. Doda, there is nae evidence of murder in this case—nae proof that a man has been slain—nae production of his dead body—and that is what we call the Corpus delicti."

"Weel, then, the deil hark it out of ye," said Meg, rising in wrath, "for I will gae home agn, and so for the past lad's body, I'll be—And if I meet me turning the earth for three mounth and w' park and shool—if it were but to give the poor barnet (barnet's burial, and to bring punishment on MacTurk and the murdering crew at the Well, and—awt—awt—awt—dared fule like yourself, John Hindloom."

She rose in wrath to call her witness, but it was neither the interest nor the interest of the writer that

For example, a man cannot be tried for murder merely in the case of the non-appearance of an individual; there must be proof that the party has been murdered.

his company and he should part on such indifferent terms. He implored her patience, and reminded her that the horses, poor things, had just come off their stage—an argument which sounded reasonable in the ears of the old sho-pubster, in whose early education the care of the poor cattle mingled with the most sacred duties. She therefore returned her seat again in a sullen mood, and Mr. Hindloose was ruminating his brains for some argument which might bring the old lady to reason, when his attention was drawn by a sound in the passage.

CHAPTER XV.

A PHASE OF FAST TIMES.

— "You your travelling He did his mistress at my workshop room."

King John.

THE noise stated at the conclusion of last chapter to have described Mr. Hindloose was the rapping of one, as it were, and impetuous at the Bank office door, which office was an apartment of the banker's house, on the left hand of his passage as the parlour in which he had received Mrs. Dods was upon the right.

In general, this office was patent to all having business there; but at present, whatever might be the hurry of the party who knocked, the clerks within the office could not admit him, being themselves made prisoners by the jealous jealousy of Mr. Hindloose to prevent them from listening to his consultation with Mrs. Dods. They therefore answered the angry and impatient knocking of the stranger on y with stifled grumbling from within, finding it no doubt an excellent joke, that their master's pervasion was thus interfering with their own discharge of duty.

With one or two hearty curses upon them, as the regular plague of his life, Mr. Hindloose darted into the passage and admitted the stranger into his official apartment. The doors both of the parlour and office remaining open, the ears of Larkie Smith's apprentices, as the reader knows, in collecting an ignorance could partly overhear what passed. The conversation seemed to regard a cash transaction of some importance, as Mrs. Dods' voice when the stranger raised a voice which was naturally sharp and high, as he did when uttering the following words, towards the close of a conversation which had lasted about five minutes—"Premium!—Not a pure one, not a course—not a farthing—premium for a Bank of England bill!—I'll take me for a fool, sir!—do not I know that you call forty days pay when you give remittances to London?"

Mr. Hindloose was here heard to mutter something indignantly about the custom of the trade.

"Custom!" retorted the stranger, "no such thing—custom had custom, if it is one—don't tell my systems—banking men, I know the rate of exchange all over the world, and have drawn bills from Timbuctoo—My friends in the Strand find it along with Bruce's from Goudar—talk to me of premium on a Bank of England post bill!—What do you look at the bill for?—Do you think it doubtful?—I can change it."

"By no means necessary," answered Hindloose, "the bill is quite right, but it is usual to induce me."

"Certainly—mark me a pen—do you think I can write with my rotten pen?—What sort of ink is this?" yellow as curry sauce—never used there in my name—Pennyroyal Touchwood—I got it from the Wallowghins my Christian name—Have I my full change here?"

"Your full change, sir," answered Hindloose.

"Why, you should give me a premium, friend, instead of me giving you one."

"It is out of our way I assure you, sir," said the banker, "quite out of our way—but if you would step into the parlour and take a cup of tea—"

"Why, ay," said the stranger, his voice sounding more decidedly as (talking all the while, and undisturbed along by Mr. Hindloose) he left the office and moved towards the parlour—a cup of tea were as much for him if one could come by it previous—but as for your premium—No saying, he entered the parlour, and made his bow to Mrs. Dods, who, seeing what she called a decent, purpose-like body, and seeing that his pocket was replenished with English and Scotch paper currency, returned the compliment with her best courtesy.

Mr. Touchwood, when surveyed more at home, was a short, stout, active man, who, though any years of age and upwards, retained in his countenance and frame the elasticity of an earlier period. His countenance expressed self-confidence, and something like contempt for those who had neither seen nor endured so much as he had himself. His short black hair was mingled with grey, but not entirely obscured by it. His eyes were jet black, deep-set, small and sparkling, and contributed, with a short turned-up nose, to express an amiable and choleric habit. His complexion was burnt to a brick-colour by the vicissitudes of climate to which it had been subjected; and his face, which at the distance of a yard or two seemed hair and smooth, appeared, when closely examined, to be covered with a million of wrinkles, crossing each other in every direction possible, but so fine as if drawn by the point of a very small needle. His dress was a blue coat and buff waistcoat, his boots remarkably well blacked, and a silk handkerchief tied with military precision. The only unquieted part of his dress was a checked hat of regular dimensions, in the button-hole of which he wore a very small cockade. Mrs. Dods, accustomed a judge of persons by their first appearance, and, as it were, eyes which he made from the door in the tea-table she recognised, without the possibility of mistake, the gist of a person who was well to pass the world; and that, she added with a sigh, a what we virtuosos are seldom devoted to. If a glass-faced woman has an empty pocket, the glass falls down will be the brewer of the two.

"A dashing morning, good madam," said Mr. Touchwood, as with a view of sounding what sort of company he had got into.

"A fine soft morning for the crop, sir," answered Mrs. Dods with equal solemnity.

"Right, my good madam, soft is the very word, though it has been sometime since I heard it. I have lost a double bank about the round world since I last heard of a soft morning."

"You will be from those parts, then?" said the wife, indignantly putting a case, which, he hoped, would induce the stranger to explain himself. "At yet, sir," he added, after a pause, "I was thinking that Touchwood is not a Scottish name, at least that I hear of."

"Scottish name?—no," replied the traveller, "but a man may have been in those parts before, without being a native—or being a native, he may have had some reason to change his name—there are many reasons why men change their names."

"Certainly, and some of them very good ones," said the lawyer, "as in the common case of an heir of entail, where deed of provision and entail is usually implemented by taking up some old arms."

"Ay, or in the case of a man having made the country too hot for him under his own proper appellations," said Mr. Touchwood.

"That is a supposition, sir," replied the lawyer, "which it would ill become me to put—But at any rate if you knew this country formerly, you cannot but be marvellously pleased with the change we have been making since the American war—bill sales bearing close instead of heather—rents doubled, milled quadrupled—the said rich dungeons pulled down, and gentlemen living in as good houses as you will see any where in England."

"Mark good may it do them, for a pack of fools!" replied Mr. Touchwood, hastily.

"You do not seem much delighted with our improvements, sir?" said the banker, astonished to hear a dissentient voice where he conceived all men were unanimous.

"Pleased?" answered the stranger—"Yes, as much pleased as I am with the devil, who I believe will stay."

* This was a quantity in the countenance of the old-fashioned Scotch leader, Plaid.

* As a spirit which expresses, in Scotland, what the French call esprit.

of them agoing. Ye have got an idea that every thing must be changed—Unstable as water, ye shall not excel—I tell ye, there have been more changes in this oor nook of yours within the last forty years, than in the great empires of the East for the space of four thousand, for what I know."

"And why not," replied Bindloose, "if they be changes for the better?"

"But they are not for the better," replied Mr. Touchwood, eagerly. "I left your peasantry as poor as rats indeed, but honest and industrious, enduring their lot in this world with firmness, and looking forward to be next with hope—Now they are mere eye-servants—looking at their watches, forsooth, every ten minutes, lest they should work for their master half an instant after losing-time—And then, instead of studying the Bible on the work days, to kittle the lergymen with doubtful points of controversy on the sabbath, they glean all their theology from Tom Paine and Voltaire."

"Weel I wot the gentleman speaks truth," said fra. Dods. "I fand a bundle of their bawbee blasphemies in my ain kitchen—But I trow I made a lean house of the packman loon that brought them!—No content wi' turning the tawpies' heads wi' balants, and driving them daft wi' ribands, to cheat them out of their precious souls, and gie them the devil's ware, that I could say sac, in exchange for the iller that suld support their puir father that's aff rark and bedridden!"

"Father! madam," said the stranger; "they think no more of their father than Regan or Goneril."

"In good troth, ye have skeel of our sect, sir," replied the dame; "they are gomerils, every one of them—I tell them sac every hour of the day, but catch them profiting by the doctrine."

"And then the brutes are turned mercenary, madam," said Mr. Touchwood. "I remember when a Scottishman would have scorned to touch a shilling that he had not earned, and yet was as ready to help a stranger as an Arab of the desert. And now, did but drop my cane the other day as I was riding—a fellow who was working at the hedge made three steps to lift it—I thanked him, and my friend threw us hat on his head, and 'damned my thanks, if that were all'—Saint Giles could not have excelled him."

"Weel, weel," said the banker, "that may be a' as ye say, sir, and nae doubt wealth makes wit waver; but the country's wealthy, that cannot be denied, and wealth, sir, ve ken!"

"I know wealth makes itself wings," answered the cynical stranger; "but I am not quite sure we have it even now. You make a great show, indeed, with building and cultivation; but stock is not capital, any more than the fat of a corpulent man is health or strength."

"Surely, Mr. Touchwood," said Bindloose, who set his own account in the modern improvements, "a set of landlords, living like lairds in good earnest, and tenants with better housekeeping than the lairds used to have, and facing Whitsunday and Martinmas as I would face my breakfast—if these are not signs of wealth, I do not know where to seek for them."

"They are signs of folly, sir," replied Touchwood; "folly that is poor, and renders itself poorer, by desiring to be thought rich; and how they come by the means they are so ostentatious of, you, who are a banker, perhaps can tell me better than I can guess."

"There is maybe an accommodation bill dismounted now and then, Mr. Touchwood; but men must have accommodation, or the world would stand still—accommodation is the grease that makes the wheels go."

"Ay, makes them go down hill to the devil," answered Touchwood. "I left you bothered about one yr bank, but the whole country is an Air bank now, think—And who is to pay the piper?—But it's all nae—I will see little more of it—it is a perfect Babel, and would turn the head of a man who has spent his life with people who love sitting better than running, silence better than speaking, who never eat but when they are hungry, never drink but when thirsty, never sleep without a jest, and never speak but when they have something to say. But here, it is all run, ride, and drive—froth, foam, and flippancy—no steadiness—no character."

"I'll lay the burden of my life," said Dame Dods, looking towards her friend Bindloose, "that the gentleman has been at the new Spaw-waal yonder!"

"Spaw do you call it, madam?—If you mean the new establishment that has been spawned down yonder at St. Ronan's, it is the very fountain-head of folly and coxcombry—a Babel for noise, and a Vanity-fair for nonsense—no well in your swamps tainted by such a conceited colony of clamorous frogs."

"Sir, sir!" exclaimed Dame Dods, delighted with the unqualified sentence passed upon her fashionable rivals, and eager to testify her respect for the judicious stranger who had pronounced it,—“will you let me have the pleasure of pouring you out a dish of tea?” And so saying, she took bustling possession of the administration which had hitherto remained in the hands of Mr. Bindloose himself. "I hope it is to your taste, sir," she continued, when the traveller had accepted her courtesy with the grateful acknowledgment, which men addicted to speak a great deal usually show to a willing auditor.

"It is as good as we have any right to expect, ma'am," answered Mr. Touchwood; "not quite like what I have drunk at Canton with old Fong Qua—but the Celestial empire does not send its best tea to Leadenhall Street, nor does Leadenhall Street send its best to Marchthorn."

"That may be very true, sir," replied the dame; "but I will venture to say that Mr. Bindloose's tea is muckle better than you had at the Spaw-waal yonder."

"Tea, madam!—I saw none—Ash leaves and black-thorn leaves were brought in in painted canisters, and handed about by powder-monkeys in livery, and consumed by those who liked it, amidst the chattering of parrots and the squalling of kittens. I longed for the days of the Spectator, when I might have laid my penny on the bar, and retired without ceremony—But no—this blessed decoction was circulated under the auspices of some half-crazed blue-stocking or other, and we were saddled with all the formality of an entertainment, for this miserable allowance of a cockle-shell full of cat-lap per head."

"Weel, sir" answered Dame Dods, "all I can say is, that if it had been my luck to have served you at the Cleikum Inn, which our folk have kept for these two generations, I canna pretend to say ye should have had such tea as ye have been used to in foreign parts where it grows, but the best I had I wad have gien it to a gentleman of your appearance, and I never charged mair than sixpence in all my time, and my father's before me."

"I wish I had known the Old Inn was still standing, madam," said the traveller; "I should certainly have been your guest, and sent down for the water every morning—the doctors insist I must use Cheltenham, or some substitute for the bile—though, damn them, I believe it's only to hide their own ignorance. And I thought this Spaw would have been the least evil of the two; but I have been fairly overreached—one might as well live in the inside of a bell. I think young St. Ronan's must be mad, to have established such a Vanity-fair upon his father's old property."

"Do you ken this St. Ronan's that now is?" inquired the dame.

"By report only," said Mr. Touchwood; "but I have heard of the family, and I think I have read of them, too, in Scottish history. I am sorry to understand they are lower in the world than they have been. This young man does not seem to take the best way to mend matters, spending his time among gamblers and black-legs."

"I should be sorry if it were so," said honest Meg Dods, whose hereditary respect for the family always kept her from joining in any scandal affecting the character of the young Laird—"My forbears, sir have had kindness frae his; and although maybe he may have forgotten all about it, it wad ill become me to say ony thing of him that should not be said of his father's son."

Mr. Bindloose had not the same motive for forbearance; he declaimed against Mowbray as a thoughtless dissipater of his own fortune, and that of others. "I have some reason to speak," he said, "having two of his notes for L.100 each, which I discounted out of mere kindness and respect for his ancient family, and which he thinks nae mair of retiring, than he does of paying the national debt—And here has he been raking every shop in Marchthorn, to fit out an entertainment for all the fine folk at the Well yonder; and tradesfolk are obliged to take his acceptances for their furnishings. But they may cash his bills that will; I ken ane that will never advance a bawbee on ony paper that has John Mowbray either on the back or front of it. He had mair need to be paying the debts which he has made already, than making new anes, that he may feed fules and flatterers."

"I believe he is likely to lose his preparations, too," said Mr. Touchwood, "for the entertainment has been put off, as I heard, in consequence of Miss Mowbray's illness."

"Ay, ay, puir thing!" said Dame Margaret Dods; "her health has been unsettled for this mony a day."

"Something wrong here, they tell me," said the traveller, pointing to his own forehead significantly.

"God only kena," replied Mrs. Dods; "but I rather suspect the heart than the head—the puir thing is hurried here and there, and down to the Waal, and up again, and nae society or quiet at hame; and a thing ganging this unthrifty gait—nae wonder she is no that weel settled."

"Well," replied Touchwood, "she is worse they say than she has been, and that has occasioned the party at Shaws-Castle having been put off. Besides, now this fine young lord has come down to the Well, undoubtedly they will wait her recovery."

"A lord?" ejaculated the astonished Mrs. Dods; "a lord come down to the Waal—they will be neither to haud nor to bind now—ance wud and aye waur—a lord!—set them up and shute them forward—a lord!—the Lord have a care o' us!—a lord at the hottle!—Maister Touchwood, it's my mind he will only prove to be a Lord o' Session."

"Nay, not so, my good lady," replied the traveller. "he is an English lord, and, as they say, a lord of Parliament—but some folks pretend to say there is a flaw in the title."

"I'll warrant is there—a dozen of them?" said Meg, with alacrity—for she could by no means endure to think on the accumulation of dignity likely to accrue to the rival establishment, from its becoming the residence of an actual nobleman. "I'll warrant he'll prove a landlouping lord on their hand, and they will be e'en cheap o' the loss—And he has come down out of order it's like, and nae doubt he'll no be lang there before he will recover his health, for the credit of the Spaw."

"Faith, madam, his present disorder is one which the Spaw will hardly cure—he is shot in the shoulder with a pistol-bullet—a robbery attempted, it seems—that is one of your new accomplishments—no such thing happened in Scotland in my time—men would have sooner expected to meet with the phoenix than with a highwayman."

"And where did this happen, if you please, sir?" asked the man of bills.

"Somewhere near the old village," replied the stranger; "and if I am rightly informed, on Wednesday last."

"This explains your twa shots, I am thinking, Mrs. Dods," said Mr. Bindloose; "your groom heard them on the Wednesday—it must have been this attack on the stranger nobleman."

"Maybe it was, and maybe it was not," said Mrs. Dods; "but I'll see gude reason before I give up my ain judgment in that case.—I would like to ken if this gentleman," she added, returning to the subject from which Mr. Touchwood's interesting conversation had for a few minutes diverted her thoughts, "has heard aught of Mr. Tirl?"

"If you mean the person to whom this paper relates, said the stranger, taking a printed handbill from his pocket, "I heard of little else—the whole place rang of him, till I was almost as sick of Tyrrel as William Rufus was. Some idiotical quarrel which he had engaged in, and which he had not fought out, as their wisdom thought he should have done, was the principle cause of censure. That is another folly now, which has gained ground among you. Formerly two old proud lairds, or cadets of good family, perhaps, quarrelled, and had a rencontre, or fought a duel after the fashion of their old Gothic ancestors; but men who had no grandfathers never dreamt of such folly—And here the folk denounce a trimmery dauber of canvass, for such I understand to be this hero's occupation, as if he were a field-officer, who made valour his profession; and who, if you deprived him of his honour, was like to be deprived of his bread at the same time.—Ha, ha, ha! it reminds one of Don Quixote, who took his neighbour, Samson Carrasco, for a knight-errant."

The perusal of this paper, which contained the notes formerly laid before the reader, containing the statement of Sir Bingo, and the censure which the company at the Well had thought fit to pass upon his affair with Mr. Tyrrel, induced Mr. Bindloose to say to Mrs. Dods, with as little exultation on the superiority of his own judgment as human nature would permit,—

"Ye see now that I was right, Mrs. Dods, and that there was nae earthly use in your fashing yourself with this lang journey—The lad had just ta'en the bait rather than face Sir Bingo; and troth, I think him the wiser of the twa for sae doing—There ye hae pit for it."

Meg answered somewhat sullenly, "Ye may be mista'en, for a' that, your ainsell, for as wise as ye are, Mr. Bindloose; I shall hae that matter mair strictly inquired into."

This led to a renewal of the altercation concerning the probable fate of Tyrrel, in the course of which the stranger was induced to take some interest in the subject.

At length Mrs. Dods, receiving no countenance from the experienced lawyer for the hypothesis she had formed, rose, in something like displeasure, to order her whiskey to be prepared. But hostess as she was herself, when in her own dominions, she reckoned without her host in the present instance; for the humpbacked postilion, as absolute in his department as Mrs. Dods herself, declared that the cattle would not be fit for the road these two hours yet. The good lady was therefore obliged to wait his pleasure, bemoaning all the while the loss which a house of public entertainment was sure to sustain by the absence of the landlord or landlady, and anticipating a long list of broken dishes, miscalculated reckonings, unarranged chambers, and other disasters, which she was to expect at her return. Mr. Bindloose, zealous to recover the regard of his good friend and client, which he had in some degree forfeited by contradicting her on a favourite subject, did not choose to offer the unpleasing, though obvious topic of consolation that an unfrequented inn is little exposed to the accidents she apprehended. On the contrary, he consoled with her very cordially, and went so far as to hint that if Mr. Touchwood had come to Marchthorn with post-horses, as he supposed from his dress, she could have the advantage of them to return with more despatch to St. Ronan's.

"I am not sure," said Mr. Touchwood, suddenly; "but I may return there myself. In that case I will be glad to set this good lady down, and to stay a few days at her house if she will receive me.—I respect a woman like you, ma'am, who pursue the occupation of your father—I have been in countries, ma'am, where people have followed the same trade, from father to son, for thousands of years—And I like the fashion—it shows a steadiness and sobriety of character."

Mrs. Dods put on a joyous countenance at this proposal, protesting that all should be done in her power to make things agreeable; and while her good friend Mr. Bindloose, expatiating upon the comfort her new guest would experience at the Cleikum, she already contemplated with delight the prospect of a speedy and dazzling triumph, by carrying off a creditable customer from her showy and successful rival at the Well.

"I shall be easily accommodated, ma'am," said the stranger; "I have travelled too much and too far to be troublesome. A Spanish venta, a Persian khan, or a Turkish caravanserail, is all the same to me—only, as I have no servant—indeed, never can be plagued with one of these idle loiterers,—I must beg you will send to the Well for a bottle of the water on such mornings as I cannot walk there myself—I find it is really of some service to me."

Mrs. Dods readily promised compliance with this reasonable request; graciously conceding, that there "could be nae ill in the water itself, but may be some gude—it was only the New Inn, and the daft haverils that they caa'd the Company, that she disliked. Folk had a jest that St. Ronan dookit the Deevil in the Waal, which garr'd it taste aye since of brimstane—but she dared to say that was a' papist nonsense, for she was tell't by him that kend weel, and that was the minister himsell, that St. Ronan was nane of your idolatrous Roman saunts, but a Chaldee," (meaning probably a Culdee,) "whilk was doubtless a very different story."

Matters being thus arranged to the satisfaction of both parties, the post-chaise was ordered, and speedily appeared at the door of Mr. Bindloose's mansion. It was not without a private feeling of reluctance, that honest Meg mounted the step of a vehicle, on the door of which was painted, "FOX INN AND HOTEL, ST. RONAN'S WELL;" but it was too late to start such scruples.

"I never thought to have entered ane o' their hurley-hackets," she said, as she seated herself; "and sic a like thing as it is—scarce room for twa folk!—Weel I wot, Mr. Touchwood, when I was in the hiring line, our twa chaises wad hae carried, ilk ane o' them, four grown folk and as mony bairns. I trust that loited creature Anthony will come awa back wi' my whiskey and the cattle, as soon as they have had their feed.—Are ye sure ye hae room eneugh, sir?—I wad fain hotch mysell farther yont."

"O, ma'am," answered the Oriental, "I am accustomed to all sorts of conveyances—a dooly, a litter, a cart, a palanquin, or a post-chaise, are all alike to me—I think I could be an inside with Queen Mab in a rutshell, rather than not get forward.—Begging you many pardons, if you have no particular objections, I will light my sheroot," &c. &c. &c.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CLERGYMAN.

A man he was to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a-year.

GOLDSMITH'S Deserted Village.

Mrs. Dods's conviction, that her friend Tyrrel had been murdered by the sanguinary Captain MacTurk, remained firm and unshaken; but some researches for the supposed body having been found fruitless, as well as expensive, she began to give up the matter in despair. "She had done her duty"—"she left the matter to them that had a charge anent such things"—and "Providence would bring the mystery to light in his own fitting time"—such were the motives with which the good dame consoled herself; and, with less obstinacy than Mr. Bindloose had expected, she retained her opinion without changing for banker and man of business.

Perhaps Meg's acquiescent inactivity in a matter which she had threatened to probe so deeply, was partly owing to the place of poor Tyrrel being supplied in her blue chamber, and in her daily thoughts and cares, by her new guest, Mr. Touchwood; in assessing whom, a deserter as he was from the Well, she obtained, according to her view of the matter, a decided triumph over her rivals. It sometimes required, however, the full force of this reflection, to induce Meg, old and crabbed as she was, to submit to the various caprices and exactions of attention which were displayed by her new lodger. Never any man liked so much as Touchwood, of his habitual indifference to food, and accommodation in travelling; and probably there never was any traveller who gave more trouble in a house of entertainment. He had his own whims about cookery; and when these were contradicted, especially if he felt at the same time a twinge of incipient gout, one would have thought he had taken his lessons in the pastry-shop of Bedreddin Hassan, and was ready to renew the scene of the unhappy cream-tart, which was compounded without pepper. Every now and then he started some new doctrine in culinary matters, which Mrs. Dods deemed a heresy; and then the very house rang with their disputes. Again, his bed must necessarily be made at a certain angle from the pillow to the footposts; and the slightest deviation from this disturbed, he said, his nocturnal rest, and did certainly ruffle his temper. He was equally whimsical about the brushing of his clothes, the arrangement of the furniture of his apartment, and a thousand minutiae, which, in conversation, he seemed totally to contemn.

It may seem singular, but such is the inconsistency of human nature, that a guest of this fanciful and capricious disposition gave much more satisfaction to Mrs. Dods, than her quiet and indifferent friend, Mr. Tyrrel. If her present lodger could blame, he could also applaud; and no artist, conscious of such skill as Mrs. Dods possessed, is indifferent to the praises of such a connoisseur as Mr. Touchwood. The pride of art comforted her for the additional labour; nor was it a matter unworthy of this most honest publican's consideration, that the guests who give most trouble, are usually those who incur the largest bills, and pay them with the best grace. On this point Touchwood was a jewel of a customer. He never denied himself the gratification of the slightest whim, whatever expense he might himself incur, or whatever trouble he might give to those about him; and all was done under protestation, that the matter in question was the most indifferent thing to him in the world. "What the devil did he care for Burgess's sauces, he that had eat his kouscousou, spiced with nothing but the sand of the desert? only it was a shame for Mrs. Dods to be without what every decent house, above the rank of an alehouse, ought to be largely provided with."

In short, he fussed, fretted, commanded, and was obeyed; kept the house in hot water, and yet was so truly good-natured when essential matters were in discussion, that it was impossible to bear him the least ill-will; so that Mrs. Dods, though in a moment of spleen she sometimes wished him at the top of Tintock, always ended by singing forth his praises. She could not, indeed, help suspecting that he was a Nabob, as well from his conversation about foreign parts, as from his freaks of indulgence to himself, and generosity to others,—attributes which she understood to be proper to most "Men of Ind." But although the reader has heard her testify a general dislike to this species of Fortune's favourites, Mrs. Dods had sense enough to know, that a Nabob living in the neighbourhood, who raises the price of eggs and poultry upon the good housewives around, was very different from a Nabob residing within her own gates, drawing all his supplies from her own larder, and paying, without hesitation or question, whatever bills her conscience permitted her to send in. In short, to come back to the point at which we perhaps might have stopped some time since, landlady and guest were very much pleased with each other.

But Ennui finds entrance into every scene, when the gloss of novelty is over; and the fiend began to seize upon Mr. Touchwood just when he had got all matters to his mind in the Cleikum Inn—had instructed Dame Dods in the mysteries of curry and mullegatawny—drilled the chambermaid into the habit of making his bed at the angle recommended by Sir John Sinclair—and made some progress in instructing the humpbacked postilion in the Arabian mode of grooming. Pamphlets and newspapers, sent from London and Edinburgh by loads, proved inadequate to rout this invader of Mr. Touchwood's comfort; and, at last, he bethought himself of company. The natural resource would have been the Well—but the traveller had a holy shivering of awe, which crossed him at the very recollection of Lady Penelope, who had worked him rather hard during his former brief residence; and although Lady Binks's beauty might have charmed an Asiatic, by the plump graces of its contour, our senior was past the thoughts of a Sultana and a harem. At length a bright idea crossed his mind, and he suddenly demanded of Mrs. Dods, who was pouring out his tea for breakfast, into a large cup of a very particular species of china, of which he had presented her with a service on condition of her rendering him this personal good office,—

"Pray, Mrs. Dods, what sort of a man is your minister?"

"He's just a man like other men, Maister Touchwood," replied Meg; "what sort of a man should he be?"

"A man like other men?—ay—that is to say, he has the usual complement of legs and arms, eyes and ears—but is he a sensible man?"

"No muckle o' that, sir," answered Dame Dods; "for if he was drinking this very tea that ye gat down from London wi' the mail, he wad mistake it for common bohea."

"Then he has not all his organs—wants a nose, or the use of one at least," said Mr. Touchwood; "the tea is right gunpowder—a perfect nosegay."

"Aweel, that may be," said the landlady; "but I have gi'en the minister a dram frae my ain best bottle of real Coniac brandy, and may I never stir frae the bit, if he didna commend my whisky when he set down the glass! There is no ane o' them in the Presbytery but himsell—ay, or in the Synod either—but wad hae kend whisky frae brandy."

"But what sort of man is he?—Has he learning?" demanded Touchwood.

"Learning?—eneugh o' that," answered Meg; "just dung donnart wi' learning—lets a' things about the Manse gang whilk gate they will, sae they dinna plague him upon the score. An awfu' thing it is to see sic an ill-red-up house!—If I had the twa tawpies that sorn upon the honest man ae week under my drilling, I think I wad show them how to sort a lodging!"

"Does he preach well?" asked the guest.

"Oh, weel eneugh, weel eneugh—sometimes he will fling in a lang word or a bit of learning that our farmers and bannet lairds canna sae weel follow—But what of that, as I am aye telling them?—them that pay stipend get aye the mair for their siller."

"Does he attend to his parish?—Is he kind to the poor?"

"Ower muckle o' that, Maister Touchwood—I am sure he makes the Word gude, and turns not away from those that ask o' him—his very pocket is picked by a wheen ne'er-do-weel blackguards, that gae sorn-ing through the country."

"Sorn-ing through the country, Mrs. Dods?—what would you think if you had seen the Fakirs, the Dervises, the Bonzes, the Imams, the monks, and the mendicants, that I have seen?—But go on, never mind—Does this minister of yours come much into company?"

"Company?—gae wa'," replied Meg, "he keeps nae company at a', neither in his ain house or ony gate else. He comes down in the morning in a lang ragged nightgown, like a potato bogie, and down he sits amang his books; and if they dinna bring him something to eat, the puir demented body has never the heart to cry for aught, and he has been kend to sit for ten hours together, black fasting, whilk is a mere papistrie, though he does it just out o' forget."

"Why, landlady, in that case, your parson is any thing but the ordinary kind of man you described him—Forget his dinner!—the man must be mad—he shall dine with me to-day—he shall have such a dinner as I'll be bound he won't forget in a hurry."

"Ye'll maybe find that casier said than dunc," said Mrs. Dods; "the honest man hasna, in a sense, the taste of his mouth—sorb, he never dines out of his ain house—that is, when he dines at a'—A drink of milk and a bit of bread serves his turn, or maybe a cauld potato.—It's a heathenish fashion of him, for as good a man as he is, for surely there is nae Christian man but loves his own bowels."

"Why, that may be," answered Touchwood; "but I have known many who took so much care of their own bowels, my good dame, as to have none for any one else.—But come—bustle to the work—get us as good a dinner for two as you can set out—have it ready at three to an instant—get the old hock I had sent me from Cockburn—a bottle of the particular Indian Sherry—and another of your own old claret—fourth bin, you know, Meg.—And stay, he is a priest, and must have port—have all ready, but don't bring the wine into the sun, as that silly fool Beck did the other day.—I can't go down to the larder myself, but let us have no blunders."

"Nae fear, nae fear," said Meg, with a toss of the head, "I need naebody to look into my larder but myself, I trow—but it's an unco order of wine for twa folk, and ane o' them a minister."

"Why, you foolish person, is there not the woman up the village that has just brought another fool into the world, and will she not need sack and caudle, if we leave some of our wine?"

"A gude ale-posset wad set her better," said Meg; "however, if it's your will, it shall be my pleasure.—But the like of sic a gentleman as yoursel never entered my doors!"

The traveller was gone before she had completed the sentence; and, leaving Meg to bustle and mander at her leisure, away he marched, with the haste that characterized all his motions when he had any new project in his head, to form an acquaintance with the minister of St. Ronan's, whom, while he walks down the street to the Manse, we will endeavour to introduce to the reader.

The Rev. Josiah Cargill was the son of a small farmer in the south of Scotland; and a weak constitution, joined to the disposition for study which frequently accompanies infirm health, induced his parents, though at the expense of some sacrifices, to educate him for the ministry. They were the rather led to submit to the privations which were necessary to support this expense, because they conceived, from their family traditions, that he had in his veins some portion of the blood of that celebrated Boanepes of the Covenant, Donald Cargill, who was slain by the persecutors at the town of Queensferry, in the melancholy days of Charles II., merely because, in the plenitude of his sacerdotal power, he had cast out of the church, and delivered over to Satan by a formal excommunication, the King and Royal Family, with all the ministers and courtiers thereunto belonging. But if Josiah was really derived from this uncompromising champion, the heat of the family spirit which he might have inherited was qualified by the sweetness of his own disposition, and the quiet temper of the times in which he had the good fortune to live. He was characterized by all who knew him as a mild, gentle, and studious lover of learning, who, in the quiet prosecution of his own sole object, the acquisition of knowledge, and especially of that connected with his profession, had the utmost indulgence for all whose pursuits were different from his own. His sole relaxations were those of a retiring, mild, and pensive temper, and were limited to a ramble, almost always solitary, among the woods and hills, in praise of which he was sometimes guilty of a sonnet, but rather because he could not help the attempt, than as proposing to himself the fame or the rewards which attend the successful poet. Indeed, far from seeking to insinuate his fugitive pieces into magazines and newspapers, he blushed at his poetical attempts even while alone, and, in fact, was rarely so indulgent to his vein as to commit them to paper.

From the same maid-like modesty of disposition, our student suppressed a strong natural turn towards drawing, although he was repeatedly complimented upon the few sketches which he made, by some whose judgment was generally admitted. It was, however, this neglected talent, which, like the swift feet of the stag in the fable, was fated to render him a service which he might in vain have expected from his worth and learning.

My Lord Bidmore, a distinguished connoisseur, chanced to be in search of a private tutor for his son and heir, the Honourable Augustus Bidmore, and for this purpose had consulted the Professor of Theology.

passed before him in review several favourable ones, any of whom he conceived well suited for tuition, but still he came to the important question, "Did the candidate understand drawing?" was answered in the negative. The candidate, indeed, added his opinion, that such an appointment was neither to be desired nor as a student of theology, but pressed hard the condition as a sine qua non he at length member a drawing had about the Hall, who could be got to speak above his breath even delivering his course, but was unable to have a turn for drawing. This was enough for my father, who conceived to obtain a sight of our young Cargill's sketches, and was astonished under such a tutor his own could not fail to gain that character for inventing taste which other and grandfathers had acquired at the cost of a considerable estate, the representative of which was now the painted canvas in the gallery at Belmore House.

On following up the report concerning the young character, he was bound to pursue all the other necessary qualifications of learning and talents, in a degree than perhaps Lord Belmore might require, and to the acquaintance of his fellow pupils, but more especially to his own. Joseph did was promoted to the desired and desirable position of private tutor to the Honourable Mr. Moore.

Cargill did his duty ably and conscientiously, equalled though good humoured lack of wealth and very ordinary parts. He could not indeed, afford him any portion of the deep and noble science which characterise the youth of genius; a pupil made such progress in each branch of tuition as his capacity enabled him to obtain; understood the learned languages, and could be professed on the subject of various readings, his aid and source, and could draw marble, park, mountain, strange minerals, he drew without taste, but much accuracy, and although he attained no standing height in any pursuit, he knew enough of studies, literary and scientific, to fill up his and direct from temptation a broad, which was of the strongest in point of remembrance.

As Augusta Belmore, his lordship's only other, received also the instructions of Cargill in such degree of science as her father chose she should see, and her tutor was capable to teach. But her was as different from that of her brother, as of heaven differs from that of ground; although the present place upon his amiable heart, ornaments in Italian and Spanish literature, story in drawing, and in all (great learning, such as to enhance her teacher while at the time it kept him on the stretch, but, in her case, the scholar should outstrip the master; all such improvement brought as it is with drawing out of the best and hands, as well as the natural feelings on either side proved in the end, as in many other instances, fatal to the process of precept. Every feeling heart will create a lesson which we shall presently find correct with given severe punishment. Cargill, indeed, believed who will, has assured us that, in such a case, he himself he himself preserved the limits he were unhappily transgressed by the unfortunate man, his more disappointed pupil.

- The student's delight he took
To see the virgin stand her book,
Who had the dagger's point at play
To wound the heart the heart day -

Joseph Cargill was less fortunate, or less cautious, offered his last pupil to become acceptably dear to him, before he discovered the prospect towards which he was moving, and the direction of a blind employed passion. He was indeed utterly incapable of availing himself of the opportunities afforded to him, to involve his pupil in the train of a all passion. Honour and gratitude alike forbade a line of conduct, even had it been consistent with his natural bashfulness, simplicity, and modest disposition. To sigh and sulk in secret, to draw resolutions of separating himself from a situation so fraught with danger, and to postpone from day to day the accomplishment of a resolution as student, was all to which the tutor found himself equal, and it is not improbable, that the separation with which he regarded his patron's daughter, with the other disappointments of the passion which he nourished, tended to render his love yet more pure and disinterested.

At length, the line of conduct which reason had long more recommended, could no longer be the subject of procrastination. Mr. Belmore was destined to foreign travel for a twelvemonth, and Mr. Cargill severed from his patron the alternative of accompanying his pupil, or retiring upon a suitable provision, the reward of his past instructions. It can hardly be doubted which he preferred, for while he was with young Belmore, he did not even entirely separate from his master. He was sure to hear of Augusta frequently, and to see some part, at least, of the letters which she was to write to her brother; he might also hope to be remembered in these letters as her good friend and tutor; and to these consolations his quiet, contemplative and yet enthusiastic disposition clung as to a secret source of pleasure, the only one which it is worthy to open to him.

But fate had a blow in store, which he had not anticipated. The chance of Augusta's changing her master's condition for that of a wife, probably as his rank, beauty, and fortune rendered such an event, had never once occurred to him; and although he had imposed upon himself the unwelcome belief that she could never be his, he was irretrievably affected by the intelligence that she had become the property of another.

The Honourable Mr. Belmore's letters to his father soon after announced that poor Mr. Cargill had been seized with a nervous fever, and again, that his recuperative was attended with so much difficulty, it seemed both of mind and body, so entirely to destroy his ability as a travelling companion. Shortly after this the travellers separated, and Cargill returned to his native country alone, indulging upon the road in a melancholy abstraction of mind, which he had suffered to grow upon him since the mental shock which he had sustained, and which in time became the most characteristic feature in his demeanour. His meditations were not even disturbed by any anxiety about his future subsistence, although the cessation of his employment seemed to render that necessary. For this, however, Lord Belmore had made provision for, though a coxcomb where the fine arts were concerned, he was in other particulars a just and honorable man, who felt a sincere pride in having drawn the talents of Cargill from obscurity, and encouraging due gratitude for the measure, in which he had achieved the important task intrusted to him in his family.

His lordship had previously purchased from the Monastery house the patronage or advowson of the living of St. Ronan's, then held by a very old incumbent, who died shortly afterwards, so that upon arriving in England Cargill found himself named to the vacant living. No accident, however, did he feel himself towards the performance, that he might possibly not have taken the trouble to go through the necessary steps previous to his ordination, had it not been on account of his mother now a widow and unprotected for unless by the support which he afforded her. He visited her in her small retreat in the suburbs of Marchtown, heard her pour out her gratitude to Heaven, that she should have been granted life long enough to witness her son's promotion to a charge, which in her eyes was more honourable and desirable than an Episcopal one; heard her thank him for the life which they were so long together in the humble independence which had thus fallen on him - he heard all this, and had no power to crush her hopes and her triumph by the indulgence of his own romantic feelings. He passed almost mechanically through the usual forms, and was introduced into the living of St. Ronan's.

Although faithful and sincere, it was not in Joseph Cargill's nature to yield to unwelcome melancholy, yet he sought relief not in society, but in

CHAPTER XVI.

THE ACQUAINTANCE.

Twixt us thus the difference trim :—
Using head instead of limb,
You have read what I have seen;
Using limb instead of head,
I have seen what you have read—
Which way does the balance lean? BUTLER.

Our traveller, rapid in all his resolutions and motions, strode stoutly down the street, and arrived at the Manse, which was, as we have already described it, all but absolutely ruinous. The total desolation and want of order about the door, would have argued the place uninhabited, had it not been for two or three miserable tubs with suds, or such like sluttish contents, which were left there, that those who broke their shins among them might receive a sensible proof, that "here the hand of woman had been." The door being half off its hinges, the entrance was for the time protected by a broken harrow, which must necessarily be removed before entry could be obtained. The little garden, which might have given an air of comfort to the old house had it been kept in any order, was abandoned to a desolation, of which that of the sluggard was only a type; and the minister's man, an attendant always proverbial for doing half work, and who seemed in the present instance to do none, was seen among docks and nettles, solacing himself with the few gooseberries which remained on some moss-grown bushes. To him Mr. Touchwood called loudly, inquiring after his master; but the clown, conscious of being taken in flagrant delict, as the law says, fled from him like a guilty thing, instead of obeying his summons, and was soon heard hup-ping and geeing to the cart, which he had left on the other side of the broken wall.

Disappointed in his application to the man-servant, Mr. Touchwood knocked with his cane, at first gently, then harder, hollowed, bellowed, and shouted, in the hope of calling the attention of some one within doors, but received not a word in reply. At length, thinking that no trespass could be committed upon so forlorn and deserted an establishment, he removed the obstacles to entrance with such a noise as he thought must necessarily have alarmed some one, if there was any live person about the house at all. All was still silent; and, entering a passage where the damp walls and broken flags corresponded to the appearance of things out of doors, he opened a door to the left, which, wonderful to say, still had a latch remaining, and found himself in the parlour, and in the presence of the person whom he came to visit.

Amid a heap of books and other literary lumber, which had accumulated around him, sat, in his well-worn leather elbow chair, the learned minister of St. Ronan's; a thin, spare man, beyond the middle age, of a dark complexion, but with eyes which, though now obscured and vacant, had been once bright, soft, and expressive, and whose features seemed interesting, the rather that, notwithstanding the carelessness of his dress, he was, in the habit of performing his ablutions with Eastern precision; for he had forgot neatness, but not cleanliness. His hair might have appeared much more disorderly, had it not been thinned by time, and disposed chiefly around the sides of his countenance and the back part of his head; black stockings, ungartered, marked his professional dress, and his feet were thrust into the old slipshod shoes, which served him instead of slippers. The rest of his garments, as far as visible, consisted in a plain night-gown wrapt in long folds round his stooping and emaciated length of body, and reaching down to the slippers aforesaid. He was so intently engaged in studying the book before him, a folio of no ordinary bulk, that he totally disregarded the noise which Mr. Touchwood made in entering the room, as well as the coughs and hems with which he thought it proper to announce his presence.

No notice being taken of these inarticulate signals, Mr. Touchwood, however great an enemy he was to ceremony, saw the necessity of introducing his business, as an apology for his intrusion.

"Hem! sir—Ha, hem!—You see before you a person in some distress for want of society, who has taken the liberty to call on you as a good pastor, who may be, in Christian charity, willing to afford him a little of your company, since he is tired of his own."

Of this speech Mr. Cargill only understood the words "distress" and "charity," sounds with which he was well acquainted, and which never failed to produce some effect on him. He looked at his visiter with lack-lustre eye, and, without correcting the first opinion which he had formed, although the stranger's plump and sturdy frame, as well as his nicely-brushed coat, glancing cane, and, above all, his upright and self-satisfied manner, resembled in no respect the dress, form, or bearing of a mendicant, he quietly thrust a shilling into his hand, and relapsed into the studious contemplation which the entrance of Touchwood had interrupted.

"Upon my word, my good sir," said his visiter, surprised at a degree of absence of mind which he could hardly have conceived possible, "you have entirely mistaken my object."

"I am sorry my mite is insufficient, my friend," said the clergyman, without again raising his eyes, "it is all I have at present to bestow."

"If you will have the kindness to look up for a moment, my good sir," said the traveller, "you may possibly perceive that you labour under a considerable mistake."

Mr. Cargill raised his head, recalled his attention, and, seeing that he had a well-dressed, respectable looking person before him, he exclaimed in much confusion, "Ha!—yes—on my word, I was so immersed in my book—I believe—I think I have the pleasure to see my worthy friend, Mr. Lavender?"

"No such thing, Mr. Cargill," replied Mr. Touchwood. "I will save you the trouble of trying to recollect me—you never saw me before.—But do not let me disturb your studies—I am in no hurry, and my business can wait your leisure."

"I am much obliged," said Mr. Cargill; "have the goodness to take a chair, if you can find one—I have a train of thought to recover—a slight calculation to finish—and then I am at your command."

The visiter found among the broken furniture, not without difficulty, a seat strong enough to support his weight, and sat down, resting upon his cane, and looking attentively at his host, who very soon became totally insensible of his presence. A long pause of total silence ensued, only disturbed by the rustling leaves of the folio from which Mr. Cargill seemed to be making extracts, and now and then by a little exclamation of surprise and impatience, when he dipped his pen, as happened once or twice, into his snuff-box, instead of the inkstandish which stood beside it. At length, just as Mr. Touchwood began to think the scene as tedious as it was singular, the abstracted student raised his head, and spoke as if in soliloquy, "From Acon, Accor, or St. John d'Acre, to Jerusalem, how far?"

"Twenty-three miles north north-west," answered his visiter, without hesitation.

Mr. Cargill expressed no more surprise at a question which he had put to himself being answered by the voice of another, than if he had found the distance on the map, and indeed, was not probably aware of the medium through which his question had been solved; and it was the tenor of the answer alone which he attended to in his reply.—"Twenty-three miles—Ingulphus," laying his hand on the volume, "and Jeffrey Winesauf, do not agree in this."

"They may both be d—d, then, for lying block-heads," answered the traveller.

"You might have contradicted their authority, sir, without using such an expression," said the divine, gravely.

"I cry you mercy, Doctor," said Mr. Touchwood; "but would you compare these parchment fellows with me, that have made my legs my compasses over great part of the inhabited world?"

"You have been in Palestine, then?" said Mr. Cargill, drawing himself upright in his chair, and speaking with eagerness and with interest.

"You may swear that, Doctor, and at Acre too. Why, I was there the month after Boney had found it too hard a nut to crack.—I dined with Sir Sydney's chum, old Djezzar Pacha, and an excellent dinner we had, but for a dessert of noses and ears brought on after the last remove, which spoiled my digestion. Old Djezzar thought it so good a joke, that you hardly saw a man in Acire whose face was not so flat as the palm of my hand—Gad, I respect my olfactory organ, and set off the next morning as fast as the most cursed hard-trotting dromedary that ever fell to poor pilgrim's lot could contrive to tramp."

"If you have really been in the Holy Land, sir," said Mr. Cargill, whom the reckless gayety of Touchwood's manner rendered somewhat suspicious of a trick, "you will be able materially to enlighten me on the subject of the Crusades."

"They happened before my time, Doctor," replied the traveller.

"You are to understand that my curiosity refers to the geography of the countries where these events took place," answered Mr. Cargill.

"O! as to that matter, you are lighted on your feet," said Mr. Touchwood; "for the time present I can fit you. Turk, Arab, Copt, and Druse, I know every one of them, and can make you as well acquainted with them as myself. Without stirring a step beyond your threshold, you shall know Syria as well as I do.—But one good turn deserves another—in that case, you must have the goodness to dine with me."

"I go seldom abroad, sir," said the minister, with a good deal of hesitation, for his habits of solitude and seclusion could not be entirely overcome, even by the expectation raised by the traveller's discourse; "yet I cannot deny myself the pleasure of waiting on a gentleman possessed of so much experience."

"Well then," said Mr. Touchwood, "three be the hour—I never dine later, and always to a minute—and the place, the Cleikum Inn, up the way; where Mrs. Dods is at this moment busy in making ready such a dinner as your learning has seldom seen. Doctor, for I brought the receipts from the four different quarters of the globe."

Upon this treaty they parted; and Mr. Cargill, after musing for a short while upon the singular chance which had sent a living man to answer those doubts for which he was in vain consulting ancient authorities, at length resumed, by degrees, the train of reflection and investigation which Mr. Touchwood's visit had interrupted, and in a short time lost all recollection of his episodical visiter, and of the engagement which he had formed.

Not so Mr. Touchwood, who, when not occupied with business of real importance, had the art, as the reader may have observed, to make a prodigious fuss about nothing at all. Upon the present occasion, he bustled in and out of the kitchen, till Mrs. Dods lost patience, and threatened to pin the dishelout to his tail; a menace which he pardoned, in consideration, that in all the countries which he had visited, which are sufficiently civilized to boast of cooks, these artists, toiling in their fiery element, have a privilege to be testy and impatient. He therefore retreated from the torrid region of Mrs. Dod's microcosm, and employed his time in the usual devices of loiterers, partly by walking for an appetite, partly by observing the progress of his watch towards three o'clock, when he had happily succeeded in getting an employment more serious. His table, in the blue parlour, was displayed with two covers, after the fairest fashion of the Cleikum Inn; yet the landlady, with a look "civil but sly," contrived to insinuate a doubt whether the clergyman would come, "when a' was dune."

Mr. Touchwood scorned to listen to such an insinuation until the fated hour arrived, and brought with it no Mr. Cargill. The impatient entertainer allowed five minutes for difference of clocks, and variation of time, and other five for the procrastination of one who went little into society. But no sooner were the last five minutes expended, than he darted off for the Manse, not, indeed, much like a greyhound or a deer, but with the momentum of a corpulent and well-appetized elderly gentleman, who is in haste to secure his dinner. He bounced without ceremony into the parlour, where he found the worthy divine clothed in the same plaid night-gown, and seated in the very elbow-chair, in which he had left him five hours before. His sudden entrance recalled to Mr. Cargill, not an accurate, but something of a general recollection, of what had passed in the morning, and he hastened to apologize with "Ha!—indeed—already!—upon my word, Mr. A—a—, I mean my dear friend—I am afraid I have used you ill—I forgot to order any dinner—but we will do our best.—Eppie—Eppie!"

Not at the first, second, nor third call, but ex interuallo, as the lawyers express it, Eppie, a bare-legged, shock-headed, thick-ankled, red-armed wench, entered, and announced her presence by an emphatic "What's your wull?"

"Have you got any thing in the house for dinner, Eppie?"

"Naething but bread and milk, plenty o't—what should I have?"

"You see, sir," said Mr. Cargill, you are like to have a Pythagorean entertainment; but you are a traveller, and have doubtless been in your time thankful for bread and milk."

"But never when there was any thing better to be had," said Mr. Touchwood. "Come, Doctor, I beg your pardon, but your wits are fairly gone a wad-gathering; it was I invited you to dinner, up at the inn yonder, and not you me."

"On my word, and so it was," said Mr. Cargill; "I knew I was quite right—I knew there was a dinner engagement betwixt us, I was sure of that, and that is the main point.—Come, sir, I wait upon you."

"Will you not first change your dress?" said the visiter, seeing with astonishment that the divine proposed to attend him in his plaid nightgown; "why we shall have all the boys in the village after us—they will look like an owl in sunshine, and they will flock round you like so many hedge-sparrows."

"I will get my clothes instantly," said the worthy clergyman; "I will get ready directly—I am really ashamed to keep you waiting, my dear Mr. — et—ch—your name has this instant escaped me."

"It is Touchwood, sir, at your service; I do not believe you ever heard it before," answered the traveller.

"True—right—no more I have—well, my good Mr. Touchstone, will you sit down an instant until we see what we can do?—strange slaves we make ourselves to these bodies of ours, Mr. Touchstone—the clothing and the sustaining of them costs us much thought and leisure, which might be better employed in catering for the wants of our immortal spirits."

Mr. Touchwood thought in his heart that never had Bramin or Gymnosophist less reason to reproach himself with excess in the indulgence of the table, or of the toilet, than the sage before him; but he assented to the doctrine, as he would have done to any minor heresy, rather than protract matters by farther discussing the point at present. In a short time the minister was dressed in his Sunday's suit, without any farther mistake than turning one of his black stockings inside out; and Mr. Touchwood, happy as was Boswell when he carried off Dr. Johnson in triumph to dine with Strahan and John Wilkes, had the pleasure of escorting him to the Cleikum Inn.

In the course of the afternoon they became more familiar, and the familiarity led to their forming a considerable estimate of each other's powers and acquirements. It is true, the traveller thought the student too pedantic, too much attached to systems, which, formed in solitude, he was unwilling to renounce, even when contradicted by the voice and testimony of experience; and, moreover, considered his utter inattention to the quality of what he eat and drank, as unworthy of a rational, that is, of a cooking creature, or of a being who, as defined by Johnson, holds his dinner as the most important business of the day. Cargill did not act up to this definition, and was therefore, in the eyes of his new acquaintance, so far ignorant and uncivilized. What then? He was still a sensible, intelligent man, however abstemious and bookish.

On the other hand, the divine could not help regarding his new friend as something of an epicure, or at least, god, nor could he observe in him either the perfect education, or the polished bearing, which mark the gentleman of rank, and of which, while he mingled with the world, he had become a competent judge. Neither did it escape him, that in the catalogue of Mr. Touchwood's defects, occurred that of many travellers, a slight disposition to exaggerate his own personal adventures, and to prose concerning his own exploits. But then, his acquaintance with Eastern manners, existing now in the same state in which they were found during the time of the Crusades, formed a living commentary on the works of William of Tyre, Raymund of Saint Giles, the Moslem annals of Abulfaragi, and other historians of the dark period, with which his studies were at present occupied.

A friendship, a companionship at least, was therefore struck up hastily betwixt these two originals; and to the astonishment of the whole parish of St. Ronan's, the minister thereof was seen once more leagued and united with an individual of his species, generally called among them the Cleikum Nabob. Their intercourse sometimes consisted in long walks, which they took in company, traversing, however, as limited a space of ground, as if it had been actually roped in for their pedestrian exercise. Their parade was, according to circumstances, a low haugh at the nether end of the rumous hamlet, or the esplanade in the front of the old castle; and, in either case, the direct longitude of their promenade never exceeded a hundred yards. Sometimes, but rarely, the divine took share of Mr. Touchwood's meal, though less splendidly set forth than when he was first invited to partake of it; for, like the owner of the gold cup in Parnell's Hermit, when cured of his ostentation, ——" Still he welcomed, but with less of cost."

On these occasions, the conversation was not of the regular and compacted nature, which passes betwixt men, as they are ordinarily termed, of this world. On the contrary, the one party was often thinking of Saladin and Coeur de Lion, when the other was haranguing on Hyder Ali and Sir Eyre Coote. Still, however, the one spoke, and the other seemed to listen; and, perhaps, the lighter intercourse of society, where amusement is the sole object, can scarcely rest on a safer and more secure basis.

It was on one of the evenings when the learned divine had taken his place at Mr. Touchwood's social board, or rather at Mrs. Dodd's, - for a cup of excellent tea, the only luxury which Mr. Cargill continued to partake of with some complacency, was the regale before them, - that a card was delivered to the Nabob.

"Mr. and Miss Mowbray see company at Shaws-Castle on the two-o'clock current, at two o'clock—a déjeuner—dresses in character admitted—A dramatic picture."—"See company! the more fools they," he continued by way of comment. "See company!—choice phrases are ever commendable—and this pace of pasteboard is to intimate that one may go and meet all the fools of the parish, if they have a mind—in my time they asked the honour, or the pleasure, of a stranger's company. I suppose, by and by, we shall have in this country the entrance of a Bedouin's tent, where every razzed Hadgi, with his green turban, comes in slap without leave asked, and puts his black paw among the ears, with no other apology than Salam, Alecum.—Dresses in character—Dramatic picture—what new foolfodery can that be?—but it does not signify.—Doctor! I say Doctor!—but he is in the seventh heaven—I say, Mother Dods, you who know all the news—Is this the feast that was put off until Miss Mowbray should be better?"

"Truth is it, Master Touchwood—they are no in the way of giving two entertainments in one season—no very wise to gie one maybe—but they be a be—"

"I say, Doctor, Doctor! Bless his soul, he is charging the Moslemah, with stout King Richard—I say, Doctor, do you know any thing of these Know-brays?"

"Nothing extremely particular," answered Mr. Cargill, after a pause; "it is an ordinary tale of greatness, which blazes in one century, and is extinguished in the next. I think Camden says, that Thomas Mowbray, who was Grand-Marshal of England, succeeded to that high office, as well as to the Dukedom of Norfolk, as grandson of Roger Bigot, in 1301."

"Pshaw, man, you are back into the 14th century—I mean these Mowbrays of St. Ronan's—now, don't fall asleep again until you have answered my question—and don't look so like a startled hare—I am speaking no treason."

The clergyman floundered a moment, as is usual with an absent man who is recovering the train of his ideas, or a somnambulist when he is suddenly awakened, and then answered, still with hesitation,—

"Mowbray of St. Ronan's?—ha—eh—I know—that is—I did know the family."

"Here they are going to give a masquerade, a bal paré, private theatricals, I think, and what not," handing him the card.

"I saw something of this a fortnight ago," said Mr. Cargill; "indeed, I either had a ticket myself, or I saw such a one as that."

"Are you sure you did not attend the party, Doctor?" said the Nabob.

"Who attend? I? you are jesting, Mr. Touchwood."

"But are you quite positive?" demanded Mr. Touchwood, who had observed, to his infinite amusement, that the learned and abstracted scholar was so conscious of his own peculiarities, as never to be very sure on any such subject.

"Positive!" he repeated with embarrassment; "my memory is so wretched that I never like to be positive—but had I done any thing so far out of my usual way, I must have remembered it, one would think—and—I am positive I was not there."

"Neither could you, Doctor," said the Nabob, laughing at the process by which his friend reasoned himself into confidence. "for it did not take place—it was adjourned, and this is the second invitation—there will be one for you, as you had a card to the former.—Come, Doctor, you must go—you and I will go together—I as an Infidel—I can say my Bismillah with any Hadgi of them all—You as a cardinal, or what you like best."

"Who, I!—it is unbecoming my station, Mr. Touchwood," said the clergyman—"a folly altogether inconsistent with my habits."

"All the better—you shall change your habits."

"You had better gang up and see them, Mr. Cargill," said Mrs. Dods; "for it's maybe the last sight ye may see of Miss Mowbray—they say she is to be married and off to England and of thae odd-come-shorthes, wi' some of the gowks about the Waul down-by."

"Married!" said the clergyman. "it is impossible!"

"But wadna's the impossibility, Mr. Cargill, when ye see folk marry every one, and buckle them yoursel into the bargain? Mayb' ye think the purfession has a bannier on her bonnet; but ye ken yoursel if naebody but wise folk were to marry, the world wad be ill peopled. I think it's the wise folk that keep single, like yourself and me, Mr. Cargill. Good-bye to us!—are ye weel?—will you be to a drop o' something?"

"So that ray of star of hope," said Mr. Tolchwood; "the recent world revival, the dead - say, what in the dead's name is the meaning of this? - you were quite well just now."

"A sudden quake," said Mr. Carroll, recovering

"Oh! Mr. Carzli," said Dana. De la, "this comes of your lang fists."

"Right, damn," said Mr. Treadwell; "and of breaking their water-trunk and peeling bark—the best mark of Christian love is evinced by the stoutheadedness and gentleness in robes—the visit of a couple of people desiring to see the nakedness of the dead and half-dead."

"And there is a talk of Miss Murray of St. Louis."

"I am a grade case," said Mr. Carter.

"It's most be look like" and Mr. Carter said in a lesson he may be the better of as long as he can—but I wad not, as an honest man, wish you to be deeper—you should spare the lad, Mr Mowbray.” “Who spared me, Meiklewham?” said Mowbray with a look and tone of deep emphasis. “No, no—must go through the mill—money and money’s worth—his seat is called Oakendale—think of it, Mick—Oakendale! Oh, name of thrice happy gory!—Speak not of mercy Mick—the squirrels of Oakendale must be dismounted, and learn to go fast.—What mercy can the wandering lord of Troy pent among the Greeks? The Greeks—I am a ry Salute—the harvest of Greeks.”

“I think out of pity I think out of fear, the selfish must know who would serve the Vicer.”

of necessity, Mick,” he concluded, with a tone nothing altered, “necessity is an unrelenting a slar as any Vizier or Pacha, whom Scanderbag ever fight with, or Byron has sung.” Meiklewham echoed his patron’s ejaculation with a and betwixt a whine, a chuckle, and a groan, the a being designed to express his pretended pity for a distressed victim, the second his sympathy with his friend’s prospects of success, and the third being a subtle edmonitory of the dangerous course through which his object was to be pursued. So apt as he boasted himself, Mowbray had soon of this conversation, none remain to admit that,

Light skirmishing betwixt the parties was ended, and the serious battle commenced with some caution either side; each perhaps desirous of being master his opponent’s system of tactics, before exposing own. Fiquet, the most beautiful game at which can make sacrifice of his fortune, was one with Mowbray had, for his misfortune perhaps, been adopted, from an early age, a great proficient, and which the Earl of Etherington, with less experience, proved no novice. They now played for such as Mowbray’s state of fortune rendered considerable to him, though his antagonist appeared not to find the amount. And they played with various aims, for, though Mowbray at times returned with airs of confidence the inquiring looks of his friend Meiklewham, there were other occasions on which he used to evade them, as if his own had a sad con- to make to reply.

Some alterations, though frequent, did not occupy, or all, many days, for Mowbray, a friend of all on, spent much of his time in Lord Etherington’s stinut, and those few days were days of battle. In mean time, as his lordship was now sufficiently over to join the party at Shaw-Castle, and Mowbray’s health being announced as restored, that point was renewed, with the addition of a dra in entertainment, the nature of which we shall rewards have occasion to explain. Cards were of issued to all those who had been formerly inclu- in the invitation, and of course to Mr Touch- as formerly a resident at the Well, and now in neighbourhood; it being previously agreed among ladies, that a Nobob, though sometimes a dingy arranged commodity, was not to be rashly or un- nearly neglected. As to the person, he had been of, of course, as an old acquaintance of the Mow- house, not to be left out when the friends of the ly were invited on a great scale, but his habits, well known, and it was no more expected that could leave his money on such an occasion, than the bank should loosen itself from its foundations. After these arrangements had been made, the Lord of St Roman’s suddenly entered Meiklewham’s private apartment with looks of ex- ing. The worthy scribe turned his spectacled eyes to his patron, and holding in one hand the of of papers which he had been just perusing, in the other the tape with which he was about to come up again, suspended that operation to wait open eyes and ears the communication of Mow-

“I have done him!” he said, exultingly, yet in a of voice lowered almost to a whisper; “capital his lordship for this bout—doubled my capital, Mick, and something more.—Hush, don’t interrupt me—we must think of Clara now—she must share the same share, should it prove but a blink before a storm.—You know Mick, these two—two women, Lady Penelope and the Binka, have settled that they will have something like a bal’ pord on this occasion, a sort of theatrical exhibition, and that those who like it shall be dressed in character.—I know their meaning—they think Clara has no dress fit for such foolery, and so they hope to eclipse her, Lady Pen, with her old-fashioned, all-set diamonds, and my Lady Binka, with the new-fashioned finery which she swept her character for. But Clara shan’t be borne down by—! I got that affected slut, Lady Binka’s maid, to tell me what her mistress had set her mind on, and she shd wear a French habit, smooth, like one at Welf’s—then a Eastern costume.—But here’s the rub—there’s a only one shawl for sale in Edinburgh that is worth showing off, and that is at the Gallery of Pacha’s. Now Mick, my friend, that shawl must be had, for it is with the other trankums of muslin and cambric, as farth which you will find marked in the paper there.—Send instantly and secure it, for, as Lady Binka writes by to-morrow’s post your order can’t be brought to me. There’s a note for L. 100.”

From a long habit of never refusing any thing, Meiklewham readily took the note, but having looked at it through his spectacles, he continued to hold it in his hand as he remonstrated with his patron. “This is a very kind request, St Roman’s—very kindly meant, and I wad be the last to say that Miss Clara does not merit respect and kindness at your hand; but I doubt mickle if she wad care a bodle for these braw things. Ye ken yourself, she seldom alters her fashions. Od, she thinks her riding habit dress enough for any company; and if you were ganging by good looks, as it is—if she had a thought mair colour, poor dear.”

“Well, well,” said Mowbray, impatiently, “let me alone to reconcile a woman and a fine dress.”

“To be sure, ye ken best,” said the writer; “but after a’ now, wad it no be better to lay by this hundred pound in Tam Turnpenay’s, in case the young lady should want it afterhand, just for a sair foot?”

“You are a fool, Mick; what signifies hoarding a sore foot, when there will be a broken heart in the case?—No, no—get the things as I desire you—we will blame them down for one day at least; perhaps it will be the beginning of a proper dash.”

“Well, well, I wish it may be so,” answered Meiklewham; “but this young Earl—has ye found the weak point?—Can ye get a decreture against him, with exprobes?—that is the question.”

“I wish I could answer it,” said Mowbray, thoughtfully.—“Confound the fellow—he is a cut above me in rank and in society too—belongs to the great clubs, and is in with the Superlatives and Incomparables, and all that sort of folk.—My training has been a peg lower—but, hang it, there are better dogs here in the kennel than in the parlour. I am up to him, I think—or least I will soon know, Mick, whether I am or no, and that is always one comfort. Never mind—do you execute my commission, and take care you name no names—I must save my little Abigail’s reputation.”

They parted, Meiklewham to execute his patron’s commission—his patron to bring to the test those hopes, the uncertainty of which he could not disguise from his own sagacity.

Trusting to the continuance of his run of luck, Mowbray resolved to bring affairs to a crisis that same evening. Every thing seemed in the outset to favour his purpose. They had dined together in Lord Etherington’s apartments—his state of health interfered with the circulation of the bottle, and a drizzly autumnal evening rendered walking disagreeable, even had they gone no farther than the private stable where Lord Etherington’s horses were kept, under the care of a groom of superior skill. Cards were naturally, almost necessarily, resorted to, as the only alternative for helping away the evening, and piquet was, as formerly, chosen for the game.

Lord Etherington seemed at first indolently con-less and indifferent about his play, suffering advantages to escape him, of which, in a more attentive state of mind, he could not have failed to avail himself. Mowbray upbraided him with his inattention, and proposed a deeper stake, in order to interest him in the game. The young nobleman complied; and in the course of a few hands, the gamesters became both deeply engaged in watching and profiting by the changes of fortune. These were so many, so varied, and so unexpected, that the very souls of the players seemed at length centred in the event of the struggle; and, by dint of doubling stakes, the accumulated sum of a thousand pounds and upwards, upon each side, came to be staked in the issue of the game.—So large a risk included all those funds which Mowbray commanded by his sister's kindness, and nearly all his previous winnings, so to him the alternative was victory or ruin. He could not hide his agitation, however desirous to do so. He drank wine to supply himself with courage—he drank water to cool his agitation; and at length bent himself to play with as much care and attention as he felt himself enabled to command.

In the first part of the game their luck appeared tolerably equal, and the play of both befitting gamesters who had dared to place such a sum on the cast. But, as it drew towards a conclusion, fortune altogether deserted him who stood most in need of her favour, and Mowbray, with silent despair, saw his fate depend on a single trick, and that with every odds against him, for Lord Etherington was elder hand. But how can fortune's favour secure any one who is not true to himself?—By an infraction of the laws of the game, which could only have been expected from the veriest bungler that ever touched a card, Lord Etherington called a point without showing it, and, by the ordinary rule, Mowbray was entitled to count his own—and in the course of that and the next hand, gained the game and swept the stakes. Lord Etherington showed chagrin and displeasure, and seemed to think that the rigour of the game had been more insisted upon than in courtesy it ought to have been, when men were playing for so small a stake. Mowbray did not understand this logic. A thousand pounds, he said, were in his eyes no nutshells; the rules of piquet were insisted on by all but boys and women; and for his part, he had rather not play at all than not play the game.

"So it would seem, my dear Mowbray," said the Earl; "for on my soul, I never saw so disconsolate a visage as thine during that unlucky game—it withdrew all my attention from my hand; and I may safely say, your rueful countenance has stood me in a thousand pounds. If I could transfer thy long visage to canvass, I should have both my revenge and my money; for a correct resemblance would be worth not a penny less than the original has cost me."

"You are welcome to your jest, my lord," said Mowbray; "it has been well paid for; and I will serve you in ten thousand at the same rate. What say you?" he proceeded, taking up and shuffling the cards, "will you do yourself more justice in another game?—Revenge, they say, is sweet."

"I have no appetite for it this evening," said the Earl, gravely; "if I had, Mowbray, you might come by the worse. I do not always call a point without showing it."

"Your lordship is out of humour with yourself for a blunder that might happen to any man—it was as much my good luck as a good hand would have been, and so fortune be praised."

"But what if with this Fortune had naught to do?" replied Lord Etherington.—"What if, sitting down with an honest fellow and a friend like yourself, Mowbray, a man should rather choose to lose his own money, which he could afford, than to win what it might distress his friend to part with?"

"Supposing a case so far out of supposition, my lord," answered Mowbray, who felt the question ticklish—"for, with submission, the allegation is easily made, and is totally incapable of proof—I should say, no one had a right to think for me in such a particular, or to suppose that I played for a higher stake than was convenient."

"And thus your friend, poor devil," replied Lord Etherington, "would lose his money, and run the risk of a quarrel into the boot!—We will try it another way—Suppose this good-humoured and simple-minded gamester had a favour of the deepest import to ask of his friend, and judged it better to prefer his request to a winner than to a loser?"

"If this applies to me, my lord," replied Mowbray, "it is necessary I should learn how I can oblige your lordship."

"That is a word soon spoken, but so difficult to be recalled, that I am almost tempted to pause—but yet it must be said.—Mowbray, you have a sister."

Mowbray started.—"I have indeed a sister, my lord; but I can conceive no case in which her name can enter with propriety into our present discussion."

"Again in the menacing mood!" said Lord Etherington, in his former tone; "now, here is a pretty fellow—he would first cut my throat for having won a thousand pounds from me, and then for offering to make his sister a countess!"

"A countess, my lord?" said Mowbray; "you are but jesting—you have never even seen Clara Mowbray."

"Perhaps not—but what then?—I may have seen her picture, as Puff says in the Critic, or fallen in love with her from rumour—or, to save farther suppositions, as I see they render you impatient, I may be satisfied with knowing that she is a beautiful and accomplished young lady, with a large fortune."

"What fortune do you mean, my lord?" said Mowbray, recollecting with alarm some claims, which according to Mickleham's view of the subject his sister might form upon his property.—"What estate?—there is nothing belongs to our family, save the lands of St. Ronan's, or what is left of them; and these I am, my lord, an undoubted heir of entail in possession."

"Be it so," said the Earl, "for I have no claim on your mountain realms here, which are, doubtless,

—renown'd of old
For knights, and squires, and barons bold;

my views respect a much richer, though less romantic domain—a large manor, height Nettlewood House old, but standing in the midst of such glorious oaks—three thousand acres of land, arable, pasture, and woodland, exclusive of the two closes, occupied by Widow Hodge and Goodman Trampelod—manorial rights—mines and minerals—and the devil knows how many good things besides, all lying in the vale of Bever."

"And what has my sister to do with all this?" asked Mowbray, in great surprise.

"Nothing; but that it belongs to her when she becomes Countess of Etherington."

"It is, then, your lordship's property already?"

"No, by Jove! nor can it, unless your sister honours me with her approbation of my suit," replied the Earl.

"This is a sorer puzzle than one of Lady Penelope's charades, my lord," said Mr. Mowbray; "I must call in the assistance of the Reverend Mr. Chatterly."

"You shall not need," said Lord Etherington; "I will give you the key, but listen to me with patience.—You know that we nobles of England, less jealous of our sixteen quarters than those on the continent, do not take scorn to line our decayed ermines with a little cloth of gold from the city; and my grandfather was lucky enough to get a wealthy wife, with a halting pedigree,—rather a singular circumstance, considering that her father was a countryman of yours. She had a brother, however, still more wealthy than herself, and who increased his fortune by continuing to carry on the trade which had first enriched his family. At length he summed up his business, washed his hands of commerce, and retired to Nettlewood, to become a gentleman; and here my much-respected granduncle was seized with the rage of making himself a man of consequence. He tried what marrying a woman of family would do; but he soon found that whatever advantage his family might derive from his doing so, his own condition was but little illustrated. He next resolved to become a man of family himself. His father had left Scotland when very young, and bore, I blush to say, the vulgar name of Scrogie. This hapless dissyllable my uncle carried in person to the herald office in Scotland; but neither Lyon, nor Marchmont, nor Islay, nor Snadoun, neither herald nor pursuivant, would patronise Scrogie.—Scrogie!—there could nothing be made out of it—so that my worthy relative had recourse to the surer side of the house, and began to found his dignity on his mother's name of Mowbray. In this he was much more successful, and I believe some sly fellow stole for him a slip from your own family tree, Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's, which, I daresay, you have never missed. At any rate, for his argent and or, he got a handsome piece of parchment, blazoned with a white lion for Mowbray, to be borne quarterly, with three stunted or scrog-bushes for Scrogie, and became thenceforth Mr. Scrogie Mowbray, or rather, as he subscribed himself, Reginald (his former Christian name was Ronald) S. Mowbray. He had a son who most undutifully laughed at all this, refused the honours of the high name of Mowbray, and insisted on retaining his father's original appellative of Scrogie, to the great annoyance of his said father's ears, and damage of his temper."

"Why, faith, betwixt the two," said Mowbray, "I own I should have preferred my own name, and I think the old gentleman's taste rather better than the young one's."

"True; but both were wilful, absurd originals, with a happy obstinacy of temper, whether derived from Mowbray or Scrogie I know not, but which led them so often into opposition, that the offended father, Reginald S. Mowbray, turned his reculant son Scrogie fairly out of doors; and the fellow would have paid for his plebeian spirit with a vengeance, had he not found refuge with a surviving partner of the original Scrogie of all, who still carried on the lucrative branch of traffic by which the family had been first enriched. I mention these particulars to account, in so far as I can, for the singular predicament in which I now find myself placed."

"Proceed, my lord," said Mr. Mowbray; "there is no denying the singularity of your story, and I presume you are quite serious in giving me such an extraordinary detail."

"Entirely so, upon my honour—and a most serious matter it is, you will presently find. When my worthy uncle, Mr. S. Mowbray, (for I will not call him Scrogie even in the grave,) paid his debt to nature, every body concluded he would be found to have disinherited his son, the unfilial Scrogie, and so far every body was right—But it was also generally believed that he would settle the estate on my father, Lord Etherington, the son of his sister, and therein every one was wrong. For my excellent grand-uncle had pondered with himself, that the favoured name of Mowbray would take no advantage, and attain no additional elevation, if his estate of Nettlewood (otherwise called Mowbray-Park) should descend to our family without any condition; and with the assistance of a sharp attorney, he settled it on me, then a schoolboy, on condition that I should, before attaining the age of twenty-five complete, take unto myself in holy wedlock a young lady of good fame, of the name of Mowbray, and, by preference, of the house of St. Ronan's should a damsel of that house exist.—Now my riddle is read."

"And a very extraordinary one it is," replied Mowbray, thoughtfully.

"Confess the truth," said Lord Etherington, laying his hand on his shoulder; "you think the story will bear a grain of a scruple of doubt, if not a whole scruple itself?"

"At least, my lord," answered Mowbray, "your lordship will allow, that, being Miss Mowbray's only near relation, and sole guardian, I may, without offence, pause upon a suit for her hand, made under such odd circumstances."

"If you have the least doubt either respecting my rank or fortune, I can give, of course, the most satisfactory references," said the Earl of Etherington.

"That I can easily believe, my lord," said Mowbray; "nor do I in the least fear deception, where detection would be so easy. Your lordship's proceedings towards me, too," (with a conscious glance at the bills he still held in his hand,) "have, I admit, been such as to intimate some such deep cause of interest as you have been pleased to state. But it seems strange that your lordship should have permitted years to glide away, without so much as inquiring after the young lady, who, I believe, is the only person qualified as your grand-uncle's will requires, with whom you can form an alliance. It appears to me, that long before now, this matter ought to have been investigated; and that, even now, it would have been more natural and more decorous to have at least seen my sister before proposing for her hand."

"On the first point, my dear Mowbray," said Lord Etherington, "I am free to own to you, that, without meaning your sister the least affront, I would have got rid of this clause if I could; for every man would fain choose a wife for himself, and feel I no hurry to marry at all. But the rogue-lawyers, after taking fees, and keeping me in hand for years, have at length roundly told me the clause must be complied with, or Nettlewood must have another master. So I thought it best to come down here in person, in order to address the fair lady; but as accident has hitherto prevented my seeing her, and as I found in her brother a man who understands the world, I hope you will not think the worse of me, that I have endeavoured in the outset to make you my friend. Truth is, I shall be twenty-five in the course of a month; and without your favour, and the opportunities which only you can afford me, that seems a short time to woo and win a lady of Miss Mowbray's merit."

"And what is the alternative if you do not form this proposed alliance, my lord?" said Mowbray.

"The bequest of my grand-uncle lapses," said the Earl, "and fair Nettlewood, with its old house, and older oaks, manorial rights, Hodge Trampelod, and all, devolves on a certain cousin-german of mine, whom Heaven of his mercy confound!"

"You have left yourself little time to prevent such an event, my lord," said Mowbray; "but things being as I now see them, you shall have what interest I can give you in the affair.—We must stand, however, on more equal terms, my lord—I will condescend so far as to allow it would have been inconvenient for me at this moment to have lost that game, but I cannot in the circumstances think of acting as if I had fairly won it. We must draw stakes, my lord."

"Not a word of that, if you really mean me kindly, my dear Mowbray. The blunder was a real one, for I was indeed thinking, as you may suppose, on other things than the showing my point—All was fairly lost and won.—I hope I shall have opportunities of offering real services, which may perhaps give me some right to your partial regard—at present we are on equal footing on all sides—perfectly so."

"If your lordship think so," said Mowbray,—and then passing rapidly to what he felt he could say with more confidence,—"Indeed, at any rate, no personal obligation to myself could prevent my doing my full duty as guardian to my sister."

"Unquestionably, I desire nothing else," replied the Earl of Etherington.

"I must therefore understand that your lordship is quite serious in your proposal; and that it is not to be withdrawn, even if upon acquaintance with Miss Mowbray, you should not perhaps think her so deserving of your lordship's attentions, as report may have spoken her."

"Mr. Mowbray," replied the Earl, "the treaty between you and me shall be as definite as if I were a sovereign prince, demanding in marriage the sister of a neighbouring monarch, whom, according to royal etiquette, he neither has seen nor could see. I have been quite frank with you, and I have stated to you that my present motives for entering upon negotiation are not personal, but territorial; when I know Miss Mowbray, I have no doubt they will be otherwise. I have heard she is beautiful."

"Something of the palcat, my lord," answered Mowbray.

"A fine complexion is the first attraction which is lost in the world of fashion, and that which it is easiest to replace."

"Dispositions, my lord, may differ," said Mowbray, "without faults on either side. I presume your lordship has inquired into my sister's. She is amiable, accomplished, sensible, and high-spirited; but yet"—

"I understand you, Mr. Mowbray, and will spare you the pain of speaking out. I have heard Miss Mowbray is in some respects—particular; to use a broader word—a little whimsical.—No matter. She will have the less to learn when she becomes a countess, and a woman of fashion."

"Are you serious, my lord?" said Mowbray.

"I am—and I will speak my mind still more plainly. I have good temper, and excellent spirits, and can endure a good deal of singularity in those I live with. I have no doubt your sister and I will live happily together—But in case it should prove otherwise, arrangements may be made previously, which will enable us in certain circumstances to live happily apart. My own estate is large, and Nettlewood will bear dividing."

"Nay, then," said Mowbray, "I have little more to say—nothing indeed remains for inquiry, so far as your lordship is concerned. But my sister must have free liberty of choice—so far as I am concerned, your lordship's suit has my interest."

"And I trust we may consider it as a done thing?"

"With Clara's approbation—certainly," answered Mowbray.

"I trust there is no chance of personal repugnance on the young lady's part?" said the young peer.

"I anticipate nothing of the kind, my lord," answered Mowbray, "as I presume there is no reason for any; but young ladies will be capricious, and if Clara, after I have done and said all that a brother ought to do, should remain repugnant, there is a point in the exertion of my influence which it would be cruelty to pass."

The Earl of Etherington walked a turn through the apartment, then paused, and said, in a grave and doubtful tone, "In the mean while, I am bound, and the young lady is free, Mowbray. Is this quite fair?"

"It is what happens in every case, my lord, where a gentleman proposes for a lady," answered Mowbray; "he must remain, of course, bound by his offer, until, within a reasonable time, it is accepted or rejected. It is not my fault that your lordship has declared your wishes to me, before ascertaining Clara's inclination. But while as yet the matter is between ourselves—I make you welcome to draw back if you think proper. Clara Mowbray needs not push for a catch-match."

"Nor do I desire," said the young nobleman, "any time to reconsider the resolution which I have confided to you. I am not in the least fearful that I shall change my mind on seeing your sister, and I am ready to stand by the proposal which I have made to you.—If, however, you feel so extremely delicately on my account," he continued, "I can see and even converse with Miss Mowbray at this fête of yours, without the necessity of being at all presented to her—The character which I have assumed in a manner obliges me to wear a mask."

"Certainly," said the Laird of St. Ronan's, "and I am glad, for both our sakes, your lordship thinks of taking a little law upon this occasion."

"I shall profit nothing by it," said the Earl; "my doom is fixed before I start—but if this mode of managing the matter will save your conscience, I have no objection to it—it cannot consume much time, which is what I have to look to."

They then shook hands and parted, without any farther discourse which could interest the reader.

Mowbray was glad to find himself alone, in order to think over what had happened, and to ascertain the state of his own mind, which at present was puzzling even to himself. He could not but feel that much greater advantages of every kind might accrue to himself and his family from the alliance of the wealthy young Earl, than could have been derived from any share of his spoils which he had proposed to gain by superior address in play, or greater skill on the turf. But his pride was hurt when he recollected that he had placed himself entirely in Lord Etherington's power; and the escape from absolute ruin which he had made, solely by the sufferance of his opponent, had nothing in it consolatory to his wounded feelings. He was lowered in his own eyes, when he recollected how completely the proposed victim of his ingenuity had seen through his schemes, and only abstained from baffling them entirely, because to do so suited best with his own. There was a shade of suspicion, too, which he could not entirely eradicate from his mind.—What occasion had this young nobleman to preface, by the voluntary loss of a brace of thousands, a proposal which must have been acceptable in itself, without any such sacrifice? And why should he, after all, have been so eager to secure his accession to the proposed alliance, before he had even seen the lady who was the object of it? However hurried for time, he might have waited the event at least of the entertainment at Shaws-Castle, at which Clara was necessarily obliged to make her appearance.—Yet such conduct, however unusual, was equally inconsistent with any sinister intentions; since the sacrifice of a large sum of money, and the declaration of his views upon a portionless young lady of family, could scarcely be the preface to any unfair practice. So that, upon the whole, Mowbray settled, that what was uncommon in the Earl's conduct arose from the hasty and eager disposition of a rich young Englishman, to whom money is of little consequence, and who is too headlong in pursuit of the favourite plan of the moment, to proceed in the most rational or most ordinary manner. If, however, there should prove any thing further in the matter than he could at present discover, Mowbray promised himself that the utmost circumspection on his part could not fail to discover it, and that in full time to prevent any ill consequences to his sister or himself.

Immersed in such cogitations, he avoided the inquisitive presence of Mr. Maiklewham, who, as usual had been watching for him to learn how matters were going on; and although it was now late, he mounted his horse, and rode hastily to Shaws-Castle. On the way, he deliberated with himself whether to mention to his sister the application which had been made to him, in order to prepare her to receive the young Earl as a suitor, favoured with her brother's approbation. "But no, no, no;" such was the result of his contemplation. "She might take it into her head that his thoughts were bent less upon having her for a countess, than on obtaining possession of his grand-uncle's estate.—We must keep quiet," concluded he, "until her personal appearance and accomplishments may appear at least to have some influence upon his choice.—We must say nothing till this blessed entertainment has been given and received."

CHAPTER XIX.

A LETTER.

"Has he so long held out with me untired,
And stops he now for breath?—Well—Be it so."

Richard III.

MOWBRAY had no sooner left the Earl's apartment, than the latter commenced an epistle to a friend and associate, which we lay before the reader, as best calculated to illustrate the views and motives of the writer. It was addressed to Captain Jekyl, of the—regiment of Guards, at the Green Dragon, Harrogate, and was of the following tenor:—

"DEAR HARRY,

"I have expected you here these ten days past, anxiously as ever man was looked for; and have now to charge your absence as high treason to your sworn allegiance. Surely you do not presume, like one of Napoleon's new-made monarchs, to grumble for independence, as if your greatness were of your own making, or as if I had picked you out of the whole of St. James's coffee-house to hold my back-hand, for your sake, forsooth, not for my own? Wherefore, lay aside all your own proper business, be it the pursuit of dowagers, or the plucking of pigeons, and instantly repair to this place, where I may speedily want your assistance.—May want it, said I? Why, most negligent of friends and allies, I have wanted it already.

and that when it might have done me yeoman's service. Know that I have had an affair since I came hither—have got hurt myself, and have nearly shot my friend; and if I had, I might have been hanged for it, for want of Harry Jekyl to bear witness in my favour. I was so far on my road to this place, when, not choosing, for certain reasons, to pass through the old village, I struck by a footpath into the woods which separate it from the new Spa, leaving my carriage and people to go the carriage-way. I had not walked half a mile when I heard the footsteps of some one behind, and, looking round, what should I behold but the face in the world which I most cordially hate and abhor—I mean that which stands on the shoulders of my right trusty and well beloved cousin and counsellor, Saint Francis. He seemed as much confounded as I was at our unexpected meeting; and it was a minute ere he found breath to demand what I did in Scotland, contrary to my promise, as he was pleased to express it. —I retaliated, and charged him with being here, in contradiction to his. —He justified, and said he had only come down upon the express information that I was upon my road to St. Ronan's. Now, Harry, how the devil should he have known this hadst thou been quite faithful? for I am sure, to no ear but thine own did I breathe a whisper of my purpose. —Next, with the insolent assumption of superiority, which he founds on what he calls the rectitude of his purpose, he proposed we should both withdraw from a neighbourhood into which we could bring nothing but wretchedness. —I have told you how difficult it is to cope with the calm and resolute manner that the devil gifts him with on such occasions; but I was determined he should not carry the day this time. I saw no chance for it, however, but to put myself into a towering passion, which, thank Heaven, I can always do on short notice. —I charged him with having imposed formerly on my youth, and made himself judge of my rights; and I accompanied my defiance with the strongest terms of irony and contempt, as well as with demand of instant satisfaction. I had my travelling pistols with me, (et pour cause;) and, to my surprise, my gentleman was equally provided. —For fair play's sake, I made him take one of my pistols—right Kuchenritters—a brace of balls in each, but that circumstance I forgot. —I would fain have argued the matter a little longer; but I thought at the time, and think still, that the best arguments which he and I can exchange, must come from the point of the sword, or the muzzle of the pistol. —We fired nearly together, and I think both dropped. —I am sure I did, but recovered in a minute, with a damaged arm and a scratch on the temple—it was the last which stunned me—so much for double-loaded pistols. —My friend was invisible, and I had nothing for it but to walk to the Spa, bleeding all the way like a calf, and tell a raw-head-and-bloody-bone story about a footpad, which, but for my earldom, and my gory locks, no living soul would have believed.

Shortly after, when I had been installed in a sick room, I had the mortification to learn, that my own impatience had brought all this mischief upon me, at a moment when I had every chance of getting rid of my friend without trouble, had I but let him go on his own errand: for it seems he had an appointment that morning with a booby Baronet, who is said to be a bullet-slitter, and would perhaps have rid me of Saint Francis without any trouble or risk on my part. Mean time, his non-appearance at this rendezvous has placed Master Francis Tyrrel, as he chooses to call himself, in the worst odour possible with the gentry at the Spring, who have denounced him as a coward and no gentleman. —What to think of the business myself, I know not; and I much want your assistance to see what can have become of this fellow, who, like a spectre of ill omen, has so often thwarted and baffled my best plans. My own confinement renders me inactive, though my wound is fast healing. Dead he cannot be; for had he been mortally wounded, we should have heard of him somewhere or other—he could not have vanished from the earth like a bubble of the elements. Well and sound he cannot be; for, besides that I am sure I saw him stagger and drop, firing his pistol as he fell, I know him well enough to swear that, had he not been severely wounded, he would have first pestered me with his accursed presence and assistance, and then walked forward with his usual composure to settle matters with Sir Bingo Binka. No—no—Saint Francis is none of those who leave such jobs half finished—it is but doing him justice to say, he has the devil's courage to back his own deliberate impertinence. But then, if wounded severely, he must be still in this neighbourhood, and probably in concealment—this is what I must discover, and I want your assistance in my inquiries among the natives.—Haste hither, Harry, as ever you look for good at my hand.

"A good player, Harry, always studies to make the best of bad cards—and so I have endeavoured to turn my wound to some account; and it has given me the opportunity to secure Monsieur le Frere in my interests. You say very truly, that it is of consequence to me to know the character of this new actor on the disordered scene of my adventures.—Know, then, he is that most incongruous of all monsters—a Scotch Buck—how far from being buck of the season you may easily judge. Every point of national character is opposed to the pretensions of this luckless race, when they attempt to take on them a personage which is assumed with so much facility by their brethren of the Isle of Saints. They are a shrewd people, indeed, but so destitute of ease, grace, pliability of manners, and insinuation of address, that they eternally seem to suffer actual misery in their attempts to look gay and careless. Then their pride heads them back at one turn, their poverty at another, their pedantry at a third, their mauvaise honte at a fourth; and with so many obstacles to make them bolt off the course, it is positively impossible they should win the plate. No, Harry, it is the grave folk in Old England who have to fear a Caledonian invasion—they will make no conquests in the world of fashion. Excellent bankers the Scots may be, for they are eternally calculating how to add interest to principal;—good soldiers, for they are, if not such heroes as they would be thought, as brave, I suppose, as their neighbours, and much more amenable to discipline;—lawyers they are born; indeed every country gentleman is bred one, and their patient and crafty disposition enables them in other lines, to submit to hardships which other natives could not bear, and avail themselves of advantages which others would let pass under their noses unavailingly. But assuredly Heaven did not form the Caledonian for the gay world; and his efforts at ease, grace, and gayety, resemble only the clumsy gambols of the ass in the fable. Yet the Scot has his sphere too, (in his own country only,) where the character which he assumes is allowed to pass current. This Mowbray, now—this brother-in-law of mine—might do pretty well at a Northern Meeting, or the Leith races, where he could give five minutes to the sport of the day, and the next half hour to country politics, or to farming; but it is scarce necessary to tell you, Harry, that this half-fellowship will not pass on the better side of the Tweed.

"Yet, for all I have told you, this trout was not easily tickled; nor should I have made much of him, had he not, in the plenitude of his northern conceit, entertained that notion of my being a good subject of plunder, which you had contrived (blessings on your contriving brain!) to insinuate into him by means of Wolverine. He commenced this hopeful experiment, and, as you must have anticipated, caught a Tartar with a vengeance. Of course, I used my victory only so far as to secure his interest in accomplishing my principal object; and yet, I could see my gentleman's pride was so much injured in the course of the negotiation, that not all the advantages which the match offered to his damaged family, were able entirely to subdue the chagrin arising from his defeat. He did gulp it down, though, and we are friends and allies, for the present at least;—not so cordially so, however, as to induce me to trust him with the whole of the strange and complicated tale. The circumstance of the will was necessary to communicate, as affording a sufficiently strong reason for urging my suit; and this partial disclosure enabled me for the present to dispense with farther confidence.

"You will observe, that I stand by no means secure; and besides the chance of my cousin's re-appearance—a certain event, unless he is worse than I dare hope for—I have perhaps to expect the fantastic repugnance of Clara herself, or some sulky freak on her brother's part.—In a word—and let it be such a one as conjurers raise the devil with—Harry Jekyl, I want you.

"As well knowing the nature of my friend, I can assure you that his own interest, as well as mine, may be advanced by his coming hither on duty. Here is a blockhead, whom I already mentioned, Sir Bingo Binks, with whom something may be done worth your while, though scarce worth mine. The Baronet is a perfect buzzard, and when I came here he was under Mowbray's training. But the awkward Scot had plucked half-a-dozen penfeathers from his wig with so little precaution, that the Baronet has become frightened and shy, and is now in the act of rebelling against Mowbray, whom he both hates and fears—the least backing from a knowing hand like you, and the bird becomes your own, feathers and all.—Moreover,

— 'by my life,
This Bingo hath a mighty pretty wife.'

A lovely woman, Harry—rather plump, and above the middle size—quite your taste—A Juno in beauty, looking with such scorn on her husband, whom she despises and hates, and seeming, as if she could look so differently on any whom she might like better, that, on my faith, 'twere sin not to give her occasion. If you please to venture your luck, either with the knight or the lady, you shall have fair play, and no interference—that is, provided you appear upon this summons; for, otherwise, I may be so placed, that the affairs of the knight and the lady may fall under my own immediate cognizance. And so, Harry, if you wish to profit by these hints, you had best make haste, as well for your own concerns, as to assist me in mine.—Yours, Harry, as you behave yourself,

"ETHERINGTON."

Having finished this eloquent and instructive epistle, the young Earl demanded the attendance of his own valet Solmes, whom he charged to put it into the post-office without delay, and with his own hand.

CHAPTER XX.

THEATRICALS.

— The play's the thing.—Hamlet.

THE important day had now arrived, the arrangement for which had for some time occupied all the conversation and thoughts of the good company at the Well of St. Ronan's. To give it, at the same time, a degree of novelty and consequence, Lady Penelope Penfeather had long since suggested to Mr. Mowbray, that the more gifted and accomplished part of the guests might contribute to furnish out entertainment for the rest, by acting a few scenes of some popular drama; an accomplishment in which her self-conceit assured her that she was peculiarly qualified to excel. Mr. Mowbray, who seemed on this occasion to have thrown the reins entirely into her ladyship's hands, made no objection to the plan which she proposed, excepting that the old-fashioned hedges and walks of the garden at Shaws-Castle must necessarily serve for stage and scenery, as there was no time to fit up the old hall for the exhibition of the proposed theatricals.* But upon inquiry among the company, this plan was wrecked upon the ordinary shelf, to wit, the difficulty of finding performers who would consent to assume the lower characters of the drama. For the first parts there were candidates more than enough; but most of these were greatly too high-spirited to play the fool, except they were permitted to top the part. Then amongst the few unambitious underlings, who could be coaxed or cajoled to undertake subordinate characters, there were so many bad memories, and short memories, and treacherous memories, that at length the plan was resigned in despair.

* At Kilruddery, the noble seat of Lord Meath, in the county of Wicklow, there is a situation for private theatrical exhibitions in the open air, planted out with the evergreens which arise there in the most luxuriant magnificence. It has a wild and romantic effect, reminding one of the scene in which Bottom rehearsed his pageant, with a green plot for a stage, and a hawthorn brake for a tiringroom.

A substitute, proposed by Lady Penelope, was next considered. It was proposed to act what the Italians call a Comedy of Character; that is, not an exact drama, in which the actors deliver what is set down for them by the author; but one, in which the plot having been previously fixed upon, and a few striking scenes adjusted, the actors are expected to supply the dialogue extempore, or, as Petruchio says, from their mother wit. This is an amusement which affords much entertainment in Italy, particularly in the state of Venice, where the characters of their drama have been long since all previously fixed, and are handed down by tradition; and this species of drama, though rather belonging to the mask than the theatre, is distinguished by the name of Commedia dell'Arte. But the shame-faced character of Britons is still more alien from a species of display, where there is a constant and extemporaneous demand for wit, or the sort of ready small-talk which supplies its place, than from the regular exhibitions of the drama, where the author, standing responsible for language and sentiment, leaves to the personators of the scenes only the trouble of finding enunciation and action.

But the ardent and active spirit of Lady Penelope still athirst after novelty, though baffled in her two first projects, brought forward a third, in which she was more successful. This was the proposal to combine a certain number, at least, of the guests, properly dressed for the occasion, as representing some well-known historical or dramatic characters, in a group, having reference to history, or to a scene of the drama. In this representation, which may be called playing a picture, action, even pantomimical action, was not expected; and all that was required of the performers, was to throw themselves into such a group as might express a marked and striking point of an early remembered scene, but where the actors are at a pause, and without either speech or motion. In this species of representation there was no tax, either on the invention or memory of those who might undertake parts; and, what recommended it still farther to the good company, there was no marked difference betwixt the hero and heroine of the group, and the less distinguished characters by whom they were attended on the stage; and every one who had confidence in a handsome shape and a becoming dress, might hope, though standing in not quite so broad and favourable a light as the principal personages, to draw, nevertheless, a considerable portion of attention and applause. This notion, therefore, that the company, or such of them as might choose to appear properly dressed for the occasion, should form themselves into one or more groups, which might be renewed and varied as often as they pleased, was hailed and accepted as a bright idea, which assigned to every one a share of the importance attached to its probable success.

Mowbray, on his side, promised to contrive some arrangement which should separate the actors in the mute drama from the spectators, and enable the former to vary the amusement, by withdrawing themselves from the scene, and again appearing upon it under a different and new combination. This plan of exhibition, where fine clothes and affected attitudes, supplied all draughts upon fancy or talent, was highly agreeable to most of the ladies present; and even Lady Binks, whose discontent seemed proof against every effort that could be proposed to soothe it, acquiesced in the project, with perfect indifference indeed, but with something less of sullenness than usual.

* See Mr. William Stewart Rose's very interesting Letter from the North of Italy, Vol. I. Letter XXX., where the curious subject is treated with the information and precision which distinguish that accomplished author.

It now only remained to rummage the circulating library, for some piece of sufficient celebrity to command attention, and which should be at the same time suited to the execution of their project. Bell's British Theatre, Miller's Modern and Ancient Drama, and about twenty odd volumes, in which stray tragedies and comedies were associated, like the passengers in a mail-coach, without the least attempt at selection or arrangement, were all examined in the course of their researches. But Lady Penelope declared loftily and decidedly for Shakspeare, as the author whose immortal works were fresh in every one's recollection. Shakspeare was therefore chosen, and from his works the Midsummer Night's Dream was selected, as the play which afforded the greatest variety of characters, and most scope of course for the intended representation. An active competition presently occurred among the greater part of the company, for such copies of the Midsummer Night's Dream, or the volume of Shakspeare containing it, as could be got in the neighbourhood; for, notwithstanding Lady Penelope's declaration, that every one who could read had Shakspeare's plays by heart, it appeared that such of his dramas as have not kept possession of the stage were very little known at St. Ronan's, save among those people who are emphatically called readers.

The adjustment of the parts was the first subject of consideration, so soon as those who intended to assume characters had refreshed their recollection on the subject of the piece. Theseus was unanimously assigned to Mowbray, the giver of the entertainment, and therefore justly entitled to represent the Duke of Athens. The costume of an Amazonian crest and plume, a tucked-up vest, and a tight buskin of sky-blue silk, buckled with diamonds, reconciled Lady Binks to the part of Hippolyta. The superior stature of Miss Mowbray to Lady Penelope, made it necessary that the former should perform the part of Helena, and her ladyship rest contented with the shrewish character of Herminia. It was resolved to compliment the young Earl of Etherington with the part of Lysander, which, however, his lordship declined, and, preferring comedy to tragedy, refused to appear in any other character than that of the magnanimous Bottom; and he gave them such a humorous specimen of his quality in that part, that all were delighted at once with his condescension in assuming, and his skill in performing, the presenter of Pyramus.

The part of Egeus was voted to Captain MacTurk, whose obstinacy in refusing to appear in any other than the full Highland garb, had nearly disconcerted the whole affair. At length this obstacle was got over, on the authority of Childe Harold, who remarks the similarity betwixt the Highland and Grecian costume,* and the company, dispensing with the difference of colour, voted the Captain's variegated kilt, of the MacTurk tartan, to be the kirtle of a Grecian mountaineer,—Egeus to be an Arnout, and the Captain to be Egeus. Chatterly and the painter, walking gentlemen by profession, agreed to walk through the parts of Demetrius and Lysander, the two Athenian lovers; and Mr. Winterblossom, loath and lazy, after many excuses, was bribed by Lady Penelope with an antique, or supposed antique cameo, to play the part of Philostatus, master of the revels, provided his gout would permit him to remain so long upon the turf, which was to be their stage.

Muslin trowsers, adorned with spangles, a voluminous turban of silver gauze, and wings of the same, together with an embroidered slipper, converted at once Miss Digges into Oberon, the King of Shadows, whose sovereign gravity, however, was somewhat indifferently represented by the silly gayety of Miss in her Teens, and the uncontrolled delight which she felt in her fine clothes. A younger sister represented Titania; and two or three subordinate elves were selected, among families attending the salutiferous fountain, who were easily persuaded to let their children figure in fine clothes at so juvenile an age, though they shook their head at Miss Digges and her pantaloons, and no less at the liberal display of Lady Binks's right leg, with which the Amazonian garb gratified the public of St. Ronan's.

Dr. Quackleben was applied to to play Wall, by the assistance of such a wooden horse, or screen, as clothes are usually dried upon; the old Attorney stood for Lion; and the other characters of Bottom's drama were easily found among the unnamed frequenters of the Spring. Dressed rehearsals, and so forth, went merrily on—all voted there was a play fitted.

But even the Doctor's eloquence could not press Mrs. Blower into the scheme, although she was particularly wanted to represent Thisbe.

"Truth is," she replied, "I dinna greatly like stage-plays. John Blower, honest man, as sailors are aye for some spree or another, wad take me ance to see ane Mrs. Siddons—I thought we should hae been crushed to death before we gat in—a' my things riven aff my back, forby the four lily-white shillings that it cost us—and then in came three frightsome carlines wi' besoms, and they wad bewitch a sailor's wife—I was lang enough there—and out I wad be, and out John Blower gat me, but wi' nae sma' fight and fend. My Lady Penelope Penfitter, and the great folk, may just take it as they like; but in my mind, Dr. Cacklehen, it's a mere blasphemy for folk to gar themselves look otherwise than their Maker made them; and then the changing the name which was given them at baptism, is, I think, an awful falling away from our vows; and though Thisby, which I take to be Greek for Tibbie, may be a very good name, yet Margaret was I christened, and Margaret will I die."

"You mistake the matter entirely, my dear Mrs. Blower," said the Doctor; "there is nothing serious intended—a mere placebo—just a divertimento to cheer the spirits, and assist the effect of the waters—cheerfulness is a great promoter of health."

"Dinna tell me o' health, Dr. Kittlepin!—Can it be for the puir body M'Durk's health to major about in the tartans like a tobacconist's sign in a frosty morning, wi' his poor wizzened houghs as blue as a blawort?—weel I wot he is a humbling spectacle. Or can it gie ony body health or pleasure either to see your ainself, Doctor, gunging about wi' a claiss screen tied to your back, covered wi' paper, and painted like a stane and lime wa'?—I'll gang to see nane o' their vanities, Dr. Kittlehen; and if there is nae other decent body to take care o' me, as I dinna like to sit a hault afternoon by myself, I'll e'en gae down to Mr. Sowerbrowst the maltster's—he is a pleasant, sensible man, and a sponsible man in the world, and his sister's a very decent woman."

"Confound Sowerbrowst," thought the Doctor; "if I had guessed he was to come across me thus, he should not have got the better of his dyspepsy so early.—My dear Mrs. Blower," he continued, but aloud, "it is a foolish affair enough, I must confess; but every person of style and fashion at the Well has settled to attend this exhibition; there has been nothing else talked of for this month through the whole country, and it will be a year before it is forgot'en. And I would have you consider how ill it will look, my dear Mrs. Blower, to stay away—nobody will believe you had a card—no, not though you were to hang it round your neck like a label round a vial of tincture, Mrs. Blower."

"If ye thought that, Doctor Kickherben," said the widow, alarmed at the idea of losing cast, "I wad e'en gang to the show, like other folk; sinful and shameful if it be, let them that make the sin bear the shame. But then I will put on nane of their Popish disguises—me that has lived in North Leith, baith wife and lass, for I shanna say how many years, and has a character to keep r' baith with saint and sinner.—And then, wha's to take care of me, since you are gaun to make a lime-and-stane wa' of yourself, Dr. Kickinben?"

"My dear Mrs. Blower if such is your determination, I will not make a wall of myself. Her ladyship must consider my profession—she must understand it is my function to look after my patients, in preference to all the stage-plays in this world—and to attend on a case like yours, Mrs. Blower, it is my duty to sacrifice, were it called for, the whole drama from Shakspeare to O'Keefe."

* "The Arnouts or Albanese," (says Lord Byron,) "struck me forcibly by their resemblance to the Highlanders of Scotland, in dress, figure, and manner of living. Their very mountains seem Caledonian, with a kinder climate. The kilt, though white, the spare, active form; their dialect Celtic, in the sound, and their hardy habits, all carried me back to Morven."—Notes to the Second Chapter of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage.

On hearing this magnanimous resolution, the widow's heart was greatly cheered; for, in fact, she might probably have considered the Doctor's perseverance in the plan, of which she had expressed such high disapprobation, as little less than a symptom of absolute defection from his allegiance. By an accommodation, therefore, which suited both parties, it was settled that the Doctor should attend his loving widow to Shaws-Castle, without mask or mantle; and that the painted screen should be transferred from Quackleben's back to the broad shoulders of a briefless barrister, well qualified for the part of Wall, since the composition of his skull might have rivalled in solidity the mortar and stone of the most approved builder.

We must not pause to dilate upon the various labours of body and spirit which preceded the intervening space, betwixt the settlement of this gay scheme, and the time appointed to carry it into execution. We will not attempt to describe how the wealthy, by letter and by commissioners, urged their researches through the stores of the Gallery of Fashion for specimens of Oriental finery—how they that were scant of diamonds supplied their place with paste and Bristol stones—how the country dealers were driven out of patience by the demand for goods of which they had never before heard the name—and, lastly, how the busy fingers of the more economical damsels twisted handkerchiefs into turbans, and converted petticoats into pantaloons, shaped and sewed, cut and clipped, and spoiled many a decent gown and petticoat, to produce something like a Grecian habit. Who can describe the wonders wrought by active needles and scissors, aided by thimbles and thread, upon silver gauze, and sprigged muslin? or who can show how, if the fair nymphs of the Spring did not entirely succeed in attaining the desired resemblance to heathen Greeks, they at least contrived to get rid of all similitude to sober Christians?

Neither is it necessary to dwell upon the various schemes of conveyance which were resorted to, in order to transfer the beau monde of the Spa to the scene of revelry at Shaws-Castle. These were as various as the fortunes and pretensions of the owners; from the lordly curricule, with its outriders, to the humble taxed cart, nay, untaxed cart, which conveyed the personages of lesser rank. For the latter, indeed, the two post-chaises at the Inn seemed converted into hourly stages, so often did they come and go between the Hotel and the Castle—a glad day for the postillions, and a day of martyrdom for the poor post-horses; so seldom is it that every department of any society, however constituted, can be injured or benefited by the same occurrence.

Such, indeed, was the penury of vehicular conveyance, that applications were made in manner most humble, even to Meg Dods herself, entreating she would permit her old whiskey to ply (for such might have been the phrase) at St. Ronan's Well, for that day only, and that upon good cause shown. But not for sordid lucre would the undaunted spirit of Meg compound her feud with her neighbours of the detested Well. "Her carriage," she briefly replied, "was engaged for her ain guest and the minister, and deil anither body's fit should gang intill't. Let every herring hing by its ain head." And, accordingly, at the duly appointed hour, creaked forth the leathern convenience, in which, carefully screened by the curtain from the gaze of the fry of the village, sat Nabob Touchwood, in the costume of an Indian merchant, or Shroff, as they are termed. The clergyman would not, perhaps, have been so punctual, had not a set of notes and messages from his friend at the Cleikum, ever following each other as thick as the papers which decorate the tail of a schoolboy's kite, kept him so continually on the alert from daybreak till noon, that Mr. Touchwood found him completely dressed; and the whiskey was only delayed for about ten minutes before the door of the manse, a space employed by Mr. Cargill in searching for the spectacles, which at last were happily discovered upon his own nose.

At length seated by the side of his new friend, Mr. Cargill arrived safe at Shaws-Castle, the gate of which mansion was surrounded by a screaming group of children, so extravagantly delighted at seeing the strange figures to whom each successive carriage gave birth, that even the stern brow and well-known voice of Johnie Tirlsneck, the beadle, though stationed in the court on express purpose, was not equal to the task of controlling them. These noisy intruders, however, who, it was believed, were somewhat favoured by Clara Mowbray, were excluded from the court which opened before the house, by a couple of grooms or helpers armed with their whips, and could not only salute, with their shrill and wondering hailing, the various personages, as they passed down a short avenue leading from the exterior gate.

The Cleikum nabob and the minister were greeted with shouts not the least clamorous; which the former merited by the ease with which he wore the white turban, and the latter, by the infrequency of his appearance in public, and both, by the singular association of a decent clergyman of the church of Scotland, in a dress more old-fashioned than could now be produced in the General Assembly, walking arm in arm, and seemingly in the most familiar terms, with a Parsee merchant. They stopped a moment at the gate of the court-yard to admire the front of the old mansion, which had been disturbed with so unusual a scene of gayety.

Shaws-Castle, though so named, presented no appearance of defence; and the present edifice had never been designed for more than the accommodation of a peaceful family, having a low, heavy front, loaded with some of that ineretricious ornament, which uniting, or rather confounding, the Gothic and Grecian architecture, was much used during the reigns of James VI. of Scotland, and his unfortunate son. The court formed a small square, two sides of which were occupied by such buildings as were required for the family, and the third by the stables, the only part in which much attention had been paid, the present Mr. Mowbray having put them into excellent order. The fourth side of the square was shut up by a screen wall, through which a door opened to the avenue; the whole being a kind of structure, which may be still found on those old Scottish properties, where a rage to render their place Parkish, as was at one time the prevailing phrase, has not induced the owners to pull down the venerable and sheltering appendages with which their wiser fathers had screened their mansion, and to lay the whole open to the keen north-east; much after the fashion of a spinster of fifty, who chills herself to gratify the public by an exposure of her thin red elbows, and shrivelled neck and bosom.

A double door, thrown hospitably open on the present occasion, admitted the company into a dark and low hall, where Mowbray himself, wearing the undress of Theseus, but not having yet assumed his ducal cap and robes, stood to receive his guests with due courtesy, and to indicate to each the road allotted to him. Those who were to take a share in the representation of the morning, were conducted to an old saloon, destined for a green-room, and which communicated with a series of apartments on the right, hastily fitted with accommodations for arranging and completing their toilet; while others, who took no part in the intended drama, were ushered to the left, into a large, unfurnished, and long disused drawing parlour, where a sashed door opened into the gardens, crossed with yew and holly hedges, still trimmed and clipped by the old gray-headed gardener, upon those principles which a Dutchman thought worthy of commemorating in a didactic poem upon the Art Topiaria.

A little wilderness, surrounding a beautiful piece of the smoothest turf, and itself bounded by such high hedges as we have described, had been selected as the stage most proper for the exhibition of the intended dramatic picture. It afforded many facilities; for a rising bank exactly in front was accommodated with seats for the spectators, who had a complete view of the silver theatre, the bushes and shrubs having been cleared away, and the place supplied with a temporary screen, which, being withdrawn by the domestics appointed for that purpose, was to serve for the rising of the curtain. A covered walk, which passed through another part of the garden, and terminated with a private door opening from the right wing of the building, seemed as if it had been planted on purpose for the proposed exhibition, as it served to give the personages of the drama a convenient and secret access from the green-room to the place of representation. Indeed, the dramatic personage, at least those who adopted the management of the matter, were, induced, by so much convenience, to extend, as some measure, their original plan, and, instead of one group, as had been at first proposed, they now found themselves able to exhibit in the good company a succession of three or four, selected and arranged from different parts of the drama, thus giving some duration, as well as some variety to the entertainment, besides the advantage of separating and contrasting the tragic and the comic scenes.

After wandering about a moment in the garden, which contained little to interest any one, and endeavouring to recognise some characters who were accommodating themselves to the humours of the day, he ventured to appear in the various disguises of baid singers, potters, shepherds, Highlanders, and so forth, the company began to draw together towards the spot where the seats prepared for them, and the screen drawn in front of the bosky stage, induced them to assemble, and excited expectation, especially as a scroll in front of the platform, set forth, in the words of the play, "This green plot shall be our stage, the hawthorn brake our firing house, and we will go to action." A delay of about ten minutes began to excite some suppressed murmurs of impatience among the audience, when the trumpet blow, which he suddenly burst from a neighbouring hedge, behind which he had established his little orchestra. All were of course silent.

"As through his dear staff-eyes he bore with Highland rage."

And when he changed his strain to an air, and suffered his music to die away in the plaintive notes of Roslin Castle, the echoes of the old walls were after a long slumber, awakened by that ethereal burst of applause, with which the Scots usually received and rewarded their country's gifted minstrel.

"He is his father's own son," said Touchwood to the clergyman, for both had gotten seats near about the centre of the place of audience. "It is many a long year since I listened to old Ned at Inver, and, to my truth, spent a night with him over panekakes and Athole brose; and I never expected to hear his snatch again in my lifetime. But stop—the curtain rises."

The screen was indeed withdrawn, and displayed Hermia, Helena, and their lovers, in attitudes corresponding to the scene of confusion occasioned by the error of Puck.

Messrs. Chatterly and the Painter played their parts neither better nor worse than amateur actors in general; and the best that could be said of them was, that they seemed more than half ashamed of their exotic dresses, and of the public gaze.

But against this untimely weakness Lady Penelope was guarded, by the strong shield of self-conceit. She minced, ambled, and notwithstanding the slight appearance of her person, and the depredations which time had made on a countenance that had never been very much distinguished for beauty, seemed devious in top the part of the beautiful daughter of Vergina. The silliness which was proper to the character of Hermia, was much augmented by the discovery that Miss Mowbray was so much better dressed than herself—a discovery which she had but recently made, as that young lady had not attended on the regular rehearsals at the Well, but once, and then without her stage habit. Her ladyship, however, did not permit this painful sense of inferiority, where she had expected triumph, so far to prevail over her desire of showing, as to interrupt materially the manner in which she had settled to represent her portion of the scene. The nature of the exhibition precluded much action, but Lady Penelope made amends by such a succession of grimaces, as might rival, in variety at least, the angular display which Garrick used to call "going his rounds." She twisted her poor features into looks of most desperate love towards Lyander; into those of wonder and offended pride, when she turned them upon Demetrius; and finally settled them on Helena, with the happiest possible imitation of an incensed rival, who feels the impossibility of relieving her swollen heart by tears alone, and is just about to have recourse to her nails.

No contrast could be stronger in looks, demeanour, and figure, than that between Hermia and Helena. In the latter character, the beautiful form and foreign dress of Miss Mowbray attracted all eyes. She kept her place on the stage, as a sentinel does that which his charge assigns him; for she had previously told her brother, that though she consented, at his importunity, to make part of the exhibition, it was as a piece of the scene, not as an actor, and accordingly a painted figure could scarce be more immovable. The expression of her countenance seemed to be that of deep sorrow and perplexity, belonging to her part, over which wandered at times an air of irony or ridicule, as if she were secretly mocking the whole exhibition, and even herself for condescending to become part of it. Above all, a sense of bashfulness had cast upon her cheek a colour, which, though sufficiently slight, was more than her countenance was used to display; and when the spectators beheld, in the splendour and grace of a rich Oriental dress, her whom they had hitherto been accustomed to see attired only in the most careless manner, they felt the additional charms of surprise and contrast; so that the bursts of applause which were vollied towards the stage, might be said to be addressed to her alone, and to vie in sincerity with those which have been forced from an audience by the most accomplished performer.

"Oh, that poor Lady Penelope!" said honest Mrs. Blower, who, when her scruples against the exhibition were once got over, began to look upon it with particular interest.—"I am really sorry for her poor face, for she gave it work like the sails of John Blower's vessel in a stiff breeze—Oh, Doctor Cacklhen, dinna ye think she wad need, if it were possible, to rin ower her face wi' a gunging iron, just to take the wrinkles out o't?"

"Hush, hush! my good dear Mrs. Blower," said the Doctor; "Lady Penelope is a woman of quality, and my patient, and such people always act charmingly—you must understand there is no hieeing at a private theatre—Hem!"

"Ye may say what ye like, Doctor, but there is nae fule like an auld fule—To be sure, if she was as young and beautiful as Miss Mowbray—heh me, and I didna use to think her see bonny neither—but dress—dress makes an unco difference—That shawl o' hers—I daur say the like o't was ne'er seen in braid Scotland—it will be real Indian, I ac warrant."

"Real Indian!" said Mr. Touchwood, in an accent of disdain, which rather disturbed Mrs. Blower's equanimity.—"why, what do you suppose it should be, madam?"

"I didna ken, sir," said she, edging somewhat nearer the Doctor, not being altogether pleased, as she afterwards allowed, with the outlandish appearance and sharp tone of the traveller; then pulling her own drapery round her shoulders, she added, courageously. "There are braw shawls made at Paisley, that ye will scarce ken frae foreign."

"Not know Paisley shawls from Indian, madam?" said Touchwood; "why, a blind man could tell by the slightest touch of his little finger. Yon shawl, now, is the handsomest I have seen in Britain—and at this distance I can tell it to be a real Turk."

"Cuzie may she weel be that wears it," said Mrs. Blower. "I declare, now I look on't again, it's a perfect beauty."

"It is called Tuzee, ma'am, not cuzie," continued the traveller; "the Shroffs at Surat told me in 1801, that it is made out of the inner coat of a goat."

"Of a sheep, or, I am thinking you mean, for goats has no wool."

"Not much of it, indeed, madam; but you are to understand they use only the inmost coat; and then they dye—that Tarn now will keep its colour while there is a rag of it left—now beneath them in legend to their grandchildren."

"And a very bonny colour it is," said the dame; "something like a snow's back, only a thought sadder—I wonder what they call that colour."

"The colour is much admired, madam," said Touchwood, who was now on a favourite topic; "the Mussulmans say the colour is better than that of an elephant and the breast of the saughie."

"Is troth, I am as wise as I was," said Mrs. Mowbray.

"The saughie, madam, as called by the Moors, (for the Hindoos call it hollak), is a sort of pygmy, half saved among the Moors of India, because they think it dyed its breast in the blood of Ah—But I am they are closing the scene—Mr. Cargill, are you composing your sermon, my good friend, or what can you be thinking of?"

Mr. Cargill had, during the whole scene, remained with his eyes fixed, in silent and anxious, although almost unconscious gaze upon Clara Mowbray; and when the voice of his companion started him out of his reverie, he exclaimed, "Most lovely—most unhappy—yes—I must and will see her!"

"See her?" replied Touchwood, too much accustomed to his friend's singularities to look for much reason or connexion in any thing he said or did. "Why, you shall see her and talk to her too, if that will give you pleasure.—They say now," he continued, lowering his voice to a whisper, "that this Mowbray is ruined—I see nothing like it, since he can dress out his sister like a queen. Did you ever see such a splendid show?"

"Dearly purchased splendor," said Mr. Cargill, with a deep sigh; "I wish that the price be yet fully paid!"

"Very likely not," said the traveller; "very likely it's gone to the bank; and for the price, I have known a thousand rapiers given for such a show in the country.—But hush, hush, we are to have another run from Nathaniel, faith, and they are withdrawing the scene—well, they have some more—they do not let us wait long between the acts of their follies at least—I love a quick and rattling fire in these ventures—Folly walking a funeral pace, and clinking her bells to the time of a passing knell, makes sad work indeed."

A strain of music, beginning slowly and becoming in a light and wild allegro, introduced on the stage those delightful creatures of the richest imagination that ever testified with wonders, the Oberon and Titania of Shakespeare. The pugny majesty of the captain of the fairy band had no unapt representative in Miss Digges, whose modesty was not so great an intruder as to prevent her desire to prevent him in all his dignity, and she moved, conscious of the graceful turn of a pretty ankle, which, encased with a string of pearls, and clothed in flesh-coloured silk, of the most cobweb texture, rose above the crimson sandal. Her jewelled tate, was given dignity to the frown with which the offender King of Shadows greeted her entrance, as each entered upon the scene at the head of their several attendants.

The resemblance of the children had been duly considered; and, therefore, their part of the exhibition had been contrived to represent dumb show rather than a stationary picture. The little Queen of Elves was not inferior in action to her haughty lord, and typed, with a look of female impatience and scorn, the haughty air which seemed to express his sulky growing.

"O men by moonlight, good Titania."

The other children were, as usual, some clever and forward, some listless and awkward enough, but the gambols of childhood are sure to receive applause, good, perhaps, with a mixture of pity and envy, by those in advanced life; and besides, there were in the company several fond papas and mamas, whose clamorous approbation, though given apparently to the whole performance, was especially bestowed in their hearts to their own little Jackson and Maria—for Mary, though the pretence and main essence of Scottish scenes, is now unknown in the land. The elves, therefore, played their flimsy danced a measure, and vanished with good satisfaction.

The anti-mask, as it may be called, of Bottom, and his company of actors, next appeared on the stage, and a thunder of applause received the young Earl, who had, with infinite taste and dexterity transformed himself into the similitude of an Athenian clown, observing the Grecian costume, yet so judiciously discriminated from the dress of the higher characters, as at once to fix the character of a thick-skinned mechanic on the wearer. Touchwood, in particular, was loud in his approbation, from which the correctness of the costume must be inferred; for that honest gentleman, like many other critics, was indeed not very much distinguished for good taste, but had a capital memory for petty matters of fact, and while the most impressive look or gesture of an actor might have failed to interest him, would have reported most severely the fashion of a sleeve, or the cut of a shoe—

But the Earl of Esherington's merits were not confined to his external appearance; for, had his lordship failed him, his deserts, like those of Hamlet, might have got him a fellowship in a cry of play. He presented, though in dumb show, the pragmatic concept of Bottom, to the infinite amusement of all present, especially of those who were well acquainted with the original; and when he was "ironed" by Puck he bore the ass's head, his newly acquired dignity with an appearance of conscious gravity which made the metamorphosis, though in itself of formerly farcical, irresistibly comic. He afterwards displayed the same humour in his frolics with the fairies, and the intercourse which he held with them, of which, Mustard-seed, Pease-blossom, and the rest of Titania's cavaliers, who lost all command of their manners at the gravity with which he dealt them, afforded him the luxury of scratching his head. Mowbray had also found a fitting representative for Puck in a queer looking, small-eyed boy of the house of St. Ronan's, with large ears protruding from his head like turrets from a Gothic building. The actor animal personified the merry and mischievous spirit of Holypoken with considerable power, so that the group bore some resemblance to the well-known and exquisite delineation of Puck by Mr. Joshua in the select collection of the Lord of Memory. It was, however, the ruin of the St. Ronan's Robin Goodfellow, who did no good afterwards—good as ill goes," as Meg Dods said, and "such as" was a party of strolling players.

The entertainment closed with a grand parade of all the characters that had appeared, during which Mowbray concluded that the young lord himself, remarked, might have time enough to examine the outward form at least, of his sister Clara, whom, a thought of his heart, he could not help considering superior in beauty, dressed as she now was, and every advantage of art, even to the brilliant Amazon Lady Banks. It is true Mowbray was not a man of reference to the intellectual expression of features, Clara's features over the Italian like beauty of the haughty dame, which promised to an admirer all its vicissitudes that can be expressed by a countenance losing a every change, and changing so often as to render and impetuous disposition, ungod to restrain and deepening admonition, should prove a dictate. Yet, to do him justice, though his performance was perhaps dictated more by fraternal partiality than by purity of taste, he certainly, on the present occasion, felt the full extent of Clara's superiority, and there was a proud smile on his lip, as, at the conclusion of the divertimento, he asked the Earl how he had been pleased. The rest of the performance had occurred, and the young lord remained on the stage employed in disembarassing himself of his awkward vices, when Mowbray put this question, in which, though general in terms, he naturally gave a particular meaning.

"I will wear my ass's head for ever," he said, "in addition my eyes were to be so delightfully emerald as they have been during the last scene.—Ay, your sister is an angel!" "Be a care that that headpiece of yours has not lost your taste, my lord," said Mowbray. "But will you wear that disguise on your last appearance? You should, I think, have been uncovered." "I am ashamed to answer you," said the Earl; "but first impressions are of consequence, and I thought I might do as wisely not to appear before your sister, for the first time, in the character of a Scot." "When you change your dress, my lord, for dinner, will our luncheon by that name?" said Mowbray.

"I am going to my room this instant for that very reason," replied the Earl. "I," said Mowbray, "must step in front, and address the audience; for I see they are sitting gaping, waiting for another scene." "I parted upon this; and Mowbray, as Duke of Albany, stepped before the screen, and announcing the conclusion of the dramatic pictures which they had the honour to present before the worshipful company, thanked the spectators for the very favourable reception which they had afforded; and intimated that, if they could amuse themselves by waiting for an hour among the gardens, a bell would be rung to the house at the expiry of that time, when some refreshments would wait their acceptance. This announcement was received with the applause to the Amphitryon ou l'on dine; and the actors arising from before the temporary theatre, dispersed through the gardens, which were of some extent, to seek for or create amusement to themselves. Music greatly aided them in this last purpose, and not long ere a dozen of couples and upwards, tripping it on the light fantastic toe," (I love a dance that is not hackneyed,) to the tune of Monywas strolled through the grounds, meeting some in disguise at the end of every verdant alley, and communicating to others the surprise and amusement they themselves were receiving. The scene, the variety of dresses, the freedom which it allowed the display of humour amongst such as possessed any, and the general disposition to give and receive pleasure, rendered the little masquerade more interesting than others of the kind for which more splendid and magnificent preparations have been made. There was also a singular and pleasing contrast between the fantastic figures who wandered through the gardens, and the quiet scene itself, to which the old-fashioned, antiquated appearance of one or two fountains and artificial cascades, in which the naiads had for the nonce compelled to resume their ancient guise, gave an appearance of unusual simplicity and interest, and which seemed rather to belong to the times than to the present generation.

Ibidem.

Touchwood, and his inseparable friend, Mr. Cargill, wandered on amidst the gay groups we have just described, the former censuring with great scorn the attempts which he observed towards an imitation of the costume of the East, and appealing with complacency to his own superior representation, dressed, in Moorish and in Persian, the several fantastic figures who passed his way; while the clergyman, whose mind seemed to labour with some great and important project, looked in every direction for the fair representative of Helena, but in vain. At length he caught a glimpse of the memorable girl, which had drawn forth so learned a discussion from his companion; and, starting from Touchwood's side with a degree of anxious alertness totally foreign to his usual habits, he endeavoured to join the person by whom it was worn.

"By the Lord," said his companion, "the Doctor is beside himself!—the parson is mad!—the divine is out of his senses, that is clear; and how the devil can he, who scarce can find his road from the Cleikum to his own manse, venture himself unprotected into such a scene of confusion?—he might as well pretend to cross the Atlantic without a pilot—I must push off in chase of him, lest worse come of it."

But the traveller was prevented from executing his friendly purpose by a sort of crowd which came rushing down the alley, the centre of which was occupied by Captain MacTurk, in the very act of bullying two pseudo Highlanders, for having presumed to lay aside their breeches before they had acquired the Gaelic language. The sounds of contempt and insult with which the genuine Celt was overwhelming the unfortunate impostors, were not, indeed, intelligible otherwise than from the tone and manner of the speaker; but these intimated so much displeasure, that the plaided forms whose unadvised choice of a disguise had provoked it—two raw lads from a certain great manufacturing town—heartily repented their temerity, and were in the act of seeking for the speediest exit from the gardens; rather choosing to resign their share of the dinner, than to abide the farther consequences that might follow from the displeasure of this highland Termagant.

Touchwood had scarcely extricated himself from this impediment, and again commenced his researches after the clergyman, when his course was once more interrupted by a sort of pressgang, headed by Sir Bingo Binks, who, in order to play his character of a drunken boatswain to the life, seemed certainly drunk enough, however little of a seaman. His cheer sounded more like a view-halloo than a hail, when, with a volley of such oaths as would have blown a whole fleet of the Bethel union out of the water, he ordered Touchwood "to come under his lee, and be d-d; for, smash his old timbers, he must go to sea again, for as weatherbeaten a hulk as he was."

Touchwood answered instantly, "To sea with all my heart, but not with a land-lubber for commander.—Harkye, brother, do you know how much of a horse's furniture belongs to a ship?"

"Come, none of your quizzing, my old buck," said Sir Bingo—"What the devil has a ship to do with horse's furniture?—Do you think we belong to the horse-marines?—ha! ha! I think you're matched, brother."

"Why, you son of a fresh-water gudgeon," replied the traveller, "that never in your life sailed farther than the Isle of Dogs, do you pretend to play a sailor, and not know the bridle of the bowline, and the saddle of the boltsprit, and the bit for the cable, and the girth to hoist the rigging, and the whip to serve for small tackle?—There is a trick for you to find out an Abram-man, and save sixpence when he begs of you as a disbanded seaman.—Get along with you! or the constable shall be charged with the whole pressgang to man the workhouse."

A general laugh arose at the detection of the swaggering boatswain; and all that the Baronet had for it was to sneak off, saying, "D—n the old quiz, who the devil thought to have heard so much slang from an old muslin nightcap!"

Touchwood being now an object of some attention, was followed by two or three stragglers, whom he endeavoured to rid himself of the best way he could, testifying an impatience a little inconsistent with the decorum of his Oriental demeanour, but which arose from his desire to rejoin his companion, and some apprehension of inconvenience which he feared Cargill might sustain during his absence. For, being in fact as good-natured a man as any in the world, Mr. Touchwood was at the same time one of the most conceited, and was very apt to suppose, that his presence, advice, and assistance, were of the most indispensable consequence to those with whom he lived; and that not only on great emergencies, but even in the most ordinary occurrences of life.

Mean time, Mr. Cargill, whom he sought in vain, was, on his part, anxiously keeping in sight of the beautiful Indian shawl, which served as a flag to announce to him the vessel which he held in chase. At length he approached so close as to say, in an anxious whisper, "Miss Mowbray—Miss Mowbray—I must speak with you."

"And what would you have with Miss Mowbray?" said the fair wearer of the beautiful shawl, but without turning round her head.

"I have a secret—an important secret, of which to make you aware; but it is not for this place.—Do not turn from me!—Your happiness in this, and perhaps in the next life, depends on your listening to me."

The lady led the way, as if to give him an opportunity of speaking with her more privately, to one of those old-fashioned and deeply-embowered recesses, which are commonly found in such gardens as that of Shaws-Castle; and, with her shawl wrapped around her head, so as in some degree to conceal her features, she stood before Mr. Cargill in the doubtful light and shadow of a huge platanus tree, which formed the canopy of the arbour, and seemed to await the communication he had promised.

"Report says," said the clergyman, speaking in an eager and hurried manner, yet with a low voice, and like one desirous of being heard by her whom he addressed, and by no one else,—"Report says that you are about to be married."

"And is report kind enough to say to whom?" answered the lady, with a tone of indifference which seemed to astound her interrogator.

"Young lady," he answered, with a solemn voice, "had this levity been sworn to me, I could never have believed it! Have you forgot the circumstances in which you stand?—Have you forgotten that my promise of secrecy, sinful perhaps even in that degree, was but a conditional promise?—or did you think that a being so sequestered as I am was already dead to the world, even while he was walking upon its surface?—Know, young lady, that I am indeed dead to the pleasures and the ordinary business of life, but I am even therefore the more alive to its duties."

"Upon my honour, sir, unless you are pleased to be more explicit, it is impossible for me either to answer or understand you," said the lady; "you speak too seriously for a masquerade pleasantry, and yet not clearly enough to make your earnest comprehensible."

"Is this sullenness, Miss Mowbray?" said the clergyman, with increased animation; "Is it levity?—Or is it alienation of mind?—Even after a fever of the brain, we retain a recollection of the causes of our illness.—Come, you must and do understand me, when I say, that I will not consent to your committing a great crime to attain temporal wealth and rank, no, not to make you an empress. My path is a clear one; and should I hear a whisper breathed of your alliance with this Earl, or whatever he may be, rely upon it, that I will withdraw the veil, and make your brother, your bridegroom, and the whole world, acquainted with the situation in which you stand, and the impossibility of your forming the alliance which you propose to yourself, I am compelled to say, against the laws of God and man."

"But, sir—sir," answered the lady, rather eagerly than anxiously, "you have not yet told me what business you have with my marriage, or what arguments you can bring against it."

"Madam," replied Mr. Cargill, "in your present state of mind, and in such a scene as this, I cannot enter upon a topic for which the season is unfit, and you, I am sorry to say, are totally unprepared. It is enough that you know the grounds on which you stand. At a fitter opportunity, I will, as it is my duty, lay before you the enormity of what you are said to have meditated, with the freedom which becomes one, who, however humble, is appointed to explain to his fellow-creatures the laws of his Maker. In the mean time, I am not afraid that you will take any hasty step, after such a warning as this."

So saying, he turned from the lady with that dignity which a conscious discharge of duty confers, yet, at the same time, with a sense of deep pain, inflicted by the careless levity of her whom he addressed. She did not any longer attempt to detain him, but made her escape from the arbour by one alley, as she heard voices which seemed to approach it from another. The clergyman, who took the opposite direction, met in full encounter a whispering and tittering pair, who seemed, at his sudden appearance, to check their tone of familiarity, and assume an appearance of greater distance towards each other. The lady was no other than the fair Queen of the Amazons, who seemed to have adopted the recent partiality of Titania towards Bully Bottom, being in conference such and so close as we have described, with the late representative of the Athenian weaver, whom his recent visit to his chamber had metamorphosed into the more gallant disguise of an ancient Spanish cavalier. He now appeared with cloak and drooping plume, sword, poniard, and guitar, richly dressed at all points, as for a serenade beneath his mistress's window; a silk mask at the breast of his embroidered doublet hung ready to be assumed in case of intrusion, as an appropriate part of the national dress.

It sometimes happened to Mr. Cargill, as we believe it may chance to other men much subject to absence of mind, that, contrary to their wont, and much after the manner of a sunbeam suddenly piercing a deep mist, and illuminating one particular object in the landscape, some sudden recollection rushes upon them, and seems to compel them to act under it, as under the influence of complete certainty and conviction. Mr. Cargill had no sooner set eyes on the Spanish cavalier, in whom he neither knew the Earl of Etherington, nor recognised Bully Bottom, than with hasty emotion he seized on his reluctant hand, and exclaimed, with a mixture of eagerness and solemnity, "I rejoice to see you!—Heaven has sent you here in its own good time."

"I thank you, sir," replied Lord Etherington, very coldly, "I believe you have the joy of the meeting entirely on your side, as I cannot remember having seen you before."

"Is not your name Bulmer?" said the clergyman. "I—I know—I am sometimes apt to make mistakes—But I am sure your name is Bulmer?"

"Not that ever I or my godfathers heard of—my name was Bottom half an hour ago—perhaps that makes the confusion," answered the Earl, with very cold and distant politeness;—"Permit me to pass, sir, that I may attend the lady."

"Quite unnecessary," answered Lady Binks; "I leave you to adjust your mutual recollections with your new old friend, my lord—he seems to have something to say." So saying, the lady walked on, not perhaps sorry of an opportunity to show apparent indifference for his lordship's society in the presence of one who had surprised them in what might seem a moment of exuberant intimacy.

"You detain me, sir," said the Earl of Etherington to Mr. Cargill, who, bewildered and uncertain, still kept himself placed so directly before the young nobleman, as to make it impossible for him to pass without absolutely pushing him to one side. "I must really attend the lady," he added, making another effort to walk on.

"Young man," said Mr. Cargill, you cannot disguise yourself from me. I am sure—my mind assures me, that you are that very Bulmer whom Heaven hath sent here to prevent crime."

"And you," said Lord Etherington, "whom my mind assures me I never saw in my life, are sent hither by the devil, I think, to create confusion."

"I beg pardon, sir," said the clergyman, staggered by the calm and pertinacious denial of the Earl—"I beg pardon if I am in a mistake—that is, if I am really in a mistake—but I am not—I am sure I am not!—That look—that smile—I am not mistaken. You are Valentine Bulmer—the very Valentine Bulmer whom I—but I will not make your private affairs any part of this exposition—enough, you are Valentine Bulmer."

"Valentine?—Valentine?" answered Lord Etherington, impatiently,—“I am neither Valentine nor Orson—I wish you good-morning, sir.”

“Stay, sir, stay, I charge you,” said the clergyman; “if you are unwilling to be known yourself, it may be because you have forgotten who I am—Let me name myself as the Reverend Josiah Cargill, minister of St. Ronan’s.”

“If you bear a character so venerable, sir,” replied the young nobleman,—“in which, however, I am not in the least interested—I think when you make your morning draught a little too potent, it might be as well for you to stay at home and sleep it off, before coming into company.”

“In the name of Heaven, young gentleman,” said Mr. Cargill, “lay aside this untimely and unseemly jesting! and tell me if you be not—as I cannot but still believe you to be—that same youth, who, seven years since, left in my deposit a solemn secret, which, if I should unfold to the wrong person, would be by my own heart, and evil the consequences which might ensue!”

“You are very pressing with me, sir,” said the Earl; and, in exchange, I will be equally frank with you. I am not the man whom you mistake me for, and you may go seek him where you will. It will be still more lucky for you if you chance to find your own arts in the course of your researches; for I must tell you plainly, I think they are gone some what astray.”

So saying, with a gesture expressive of a determined purpose to pass on, Mr. Cargill had no alternative but to make way, and suffer him to proceed.

The worthy clergyman stood as if rooted to the ground, and, with his usual habit of thinking aloud, exclaimed to himself, “My fancy has played me many bewildering tricks, but this is the most extraordinary of them all!—What can this young man think of me?”

“Must have been my conversation with that unhappy young lady that has made such an impression upon me as to deceive my very eye-sight, and causes me to connect with her history the face of the next person at I met—What must the stranger think of me?”

“Why, what every one thinks of thee that knows thee, prophet,” said the friendly voice of Touchwood, accompanying his speech with an awakening slap on the clergyman’s shoulder; “and that is, that thou art an unfortunate philosopher of Laputa, who has lost his flapper in the throng. Come along—having me once more by your side, you need fear nothing. Why, now I look at you closer, you look as if you had been a basilisk—not that there is any such thing, however I must have seen it myself, in the course of my travels—but you seem pale and frightened—what the devil is the matter?”

“Nothing,” answered the clergyman, “except that have even this very moment made an egregious fool of myself.”

“Pooh, pooh, that is nothing to sigh over, prophet. Every man does so at least twice in the four-and-twenty hours,” said Touchwood.

“But I had nearly betrayed to a stranger, a secret reply concerning the honour of an ancient family.”

“That was wrong, Doctor,” said Touchwood; “take care of that in future; and, indeed, I would advise you not to speak even to your beadle, Johnie Risneck, until you have assured yourself by at least three pertinent questions and answers, that you have said Johnie corporeally and substantially in presence before you, and that your fancy has not invested the stranger with honest Johnie’s singed periwig and threadbare brown Joseph—Come along—come along.”

So saying, he hurried forward the perplexed clergyman, who in vain made all the excuses he could think in order to effect his escape from the scene of gayety, which he was so unexpectedly involved. He pleaded headache; and his friend assured him that a mouthful of food, and a glass of wine, would mend it. He stated he had business; and Touchwood replied that he could have none but composing his next sermon, and reminded him that it was two days till Sunday length. Mr. Cargill confessed that he had some reluctance again to see the stranger, on whom he had deavoured with such pertinacity to fix an acquaintance, which he was now well assured existed only in his own imagination. The traveller treated his scruples with scorn, and said, that guests meeting in this general manner, had no more to do with each other than if they were assembled in a caravansary.

“So that you need not say a word to him in the way of apology or otherwise—or, what will be still better, I, who have seen so much of the world, will make the pretty speech for you.” As they spoke, he dragged the divine towards the house, where they were now summoned by the appointed signal, and where the company were assembling in the old saloon already noticed, previous to passing into the dining-room, where the refreshments were prepared. “Now, Doctor,” continued the busy friend of Mr. Cargill, “let us see which of all these people has been the subject of your blunder. Is it yon animal of a Highlandman?—or the impertinent brute that wants to be thought a boatswain?—or which of them all is it?—Ay, here they come, two and two. Newgate fashion—the young Lord of the Manor with old Lady Penelope—does he set up for Ulysses, I wonder?—The Earl of Etherington with Lady Bingo—methinks it should have been with Miss Mowbray.”

“The Earl of what, did you say?” quoth the clergyman, anxiously. “How is it you titled that young man in the Spanish dress?”

“Oh!” said the traveller; “what, I have discovered the goblin that has scared you?—Come along—come along—I will make you acquainted with him.” So saying, he dragged him towards Lord Etherington; and before the divine could make his negative intelligible, the ceremony of introduction had taken place.

“My Lord Etherington, allow me to present Mr. Cargill, minister of this parish—a learned gentleman, whose head is often in the Holy Land, when his person seems present among his friends. He suffers extremely, my lord, under the sense of mistaking your lordship for the Lord knows who; but when you are acquainted with him, you will find that he can make a hundred stranger mistakes than that, so we hope that your lordship will take no prejudice or offence.”

“There can be no offence taken where no offence is intended,” said Lord Etherington, with much urbanity. “It is I who ought to beg the reverend gentleman’s pardon, for hurrying from him without allowing him to make a complete eclaircissement. I beg his pardon for an abruptness which the place and the time—for I was immediately engaged in a lady’s service—rendered unavoidable.”

Mr. Cargill gazed on the young nobleman as he pronounced these words, with the easy indifference of one who apologizes to an inferior in order to maintain his own character for politeness, but with perfect indifference whether his excuses are or are not held satisfactory. And as the clergyman gazed, the belief which had so strongly clung to him that the Earl of Etherington and young Valentine Bulmer were the same individual person, melted away like frostwork before the morning sun, and that so completely, that he marvelled at himself for having ever entertained it. Some strong resemblance of features there must have been to have led him into such a delusion; but the person, the tone the manner of expression, were absolutely different; and his attention being now especially directed towards these particulars, Mr. Cargill was inclined to think the two personages almost totally dissimilar.

The clergyman had now only to make his apology, and fall back from the head of the table to some lower seat, which his modesty would have preferred, when he was suddenly seized upon by the Lady Penelope Penfeather, who, detaining him in the most elegant and persuasive manner possible, insisted that they should be introduced to each other by Mr. Mowbray, and that Mr. Cargill should sit beside her at table.—She had heard so much of his learning—so much of his excellent character—desired so much to make his acquaintance, that she could not think of losing an opportunity, which Mr. Cargill’s learned seclusion rendered so very rare. In a word, catching the Black Lion was the order of the day; and her ladyship having trapped her prey, soon sat triumphant with him by her side.

A second separation was thus effected between Touchwood and his friend ; for the former, not being included in the invitation, or, indeed, at all noticed by Lady Penelope, was obliged to find room at a lower part of the table, where he excited much surprise by the dexterity with which he despatched boiled rice with chop-sticks.

Mr. Cargill being thus exposed, without a consort, to the fire of Lady Penelope, speedily found it so brisk and incessant, as to drive his complaisance, little tried as it had been for many years by small talk, almost to extremity. She began by begging him to draw his chair close, for an instinctive terror of fine ladies had made him keep his distance. At the same time, she hoped "he was not afraid of her as an Episcopalian ; her father had belonged to that communion ; for," she added, with what was intended for an arch smile, "we were somewhat naughty in the forty-five, as you may have heard ; but all that was over, and she was sure Mr. Cargill was too liberal to entertain any dislike or shyness on that score.—She could assure him she was far from disliking the Presbyterian form—indeed she had often wished to hear it, where she was sure to be both delighted and edified" (here a gracious smile) "in the church of St. Ronan's—and hoped to do so whenever Mr. Mowbray had got a stove, which he had ordered from Edinburgh, on purpose to air his pew for her accommodation."

All this, which was spoken with wreathed smiles and nods, and so much civility as to remind the clergyman of a cup of tea over-sweetened to conceal its want of strength and flavour, required and received no farther answer than an accommodating look and acquiescent bow.

"Ah, Mr. Cargill," continued the inexhaustible Lady Penelope, "your profession has so many demands on the heart as well as the understanding—is so much connected with the kindnesses and charities of our nature—with our best and purest feelings, Mr. Cargill ! You know what Goldsmith says :—

—' to his duty prompt at every call,
He watch'd, and wept, and felt, and pray'd for all.'

And then Dryden has such a picture of a parish priest, so inimitable, one would think, did we not hear now and then of some living mortal presuming to emulate its features," (here another insinuating nod and expressive smile.)

" ' Refined himself to soul to curb the sense,
And almost made a sin of abstinence,
Yet had his aspect nothing of severe,
But such a face as promised him sincere ;
Nothing reserved or sullen was to see,
But sweet regard and pleasing sanctity.' "

While her ladyship declaimed, the clergyman's wandering eye confessed his absent mind ; his thoughts travelling, perhaps, to accomplish a truce betwixt Saladin and Conrade of Mountserratt, unless they chanced to be occupied with some occurrences of that very day, so that the lady was obliged to recall her indocile auditor with the leading question, "You are well acquainted with Dryden, of course, Mr. Cargill ?"

"I have not the honour, madam," said Mr. Cargill, starting from his reverie, and but half understanding the question he replied to.

"Sir !" said the lady in surprise.

"Madam !—my lady !" answered Mr. Cargill, in embarrassment.

"I asked you if you admired Dryden ; but you learned men are so absent—perhaps you thought I said Leyden."

"A lamp too early quenched, madam," said Mr. Cargill ; "I knew him well."

"And so did I," eagerly replied the lady of the cerulean buskin ; "he spoke ten languages—how mortifying to poor me, Mr. Cargill, who could only boast of five !—but I have studied a little since that time—I must have you to help me in my studies, Mr. Cargill—it will be charitable—but perhaps you are afraid of a female pupil ?"

A thrill, arising from former recollections, passed through poor Cargill's mind, with as much acuteness as the pass of a rapier might have done through his body ; and we cannot help remarking, that a forward prater in society, like a busy hustler in a crowd, besides all other general points of annoyance, is eternally rubbing upon some tender point, and galling men's feelings, without knowing or regarding it.

"You must assist me, besides, in my little charities, Mr. Cargill, now that you and I are become so well acquainted.—There is that Anne Heggie—I sent her a trifle yesterday, but I am told—I should not mention it, but only one would not have the little they have to bestow lavished on an improper object—I am told she is not quite proper—an unwedded mother, in short, Mr. Cargill—and it would be especially unbecoming in me to encourage profligacy."

"I believe, madam," said the clergyman, gravely, "the poor woman's distress may justify your ladyship's bounty, even if her conduct has been faulty."

"O, I am no prude, neither, I assure you, Mr. Cargill," answered the Lady Penelope. "I never withdraw my countenance from any one but on the most irrefragable grounds. I could tell you of an intimate friend of my own, whom I have supported against the whole clamour of the people at the Well, because I believe, from the bottom of my soul, she is only thoughtless—nothing in the world but thoughtless—O Mr. Cargill, how can you look across the table so intelligently ?—who would have thought it of you ?—Oh fie, to make such personal applications !"

"Upon my word, madam, I am quite at a loss to comprehend"—

"Oh fie, fie, Mr. Cargill," throwing in as much censure and surprise as a confidential whisper can convey—"you looked at my Lady Binks—I know what you think, but you are quite wrong, I assure you ; you are entirely wrong.—I wish she would not flirt quite so much with that young Lord Etherington though, Mr. Cargill—her situation is particular.—Indeed, I believe she wears out his patience ; for see he is leaving the room before we sit down—how singular !—And then, do you not think it very odd, too, that Miss Mowbray has not come down to us ?"

"Miss Mowbray !—what of Miss Mowbray—is she not here ?" said Mr. Cargill, starting, and with an expression of interest which he had not yet bestowed on any of her ladyship's liberal communications.

"Ay, poor Miss Mowbray," said Lady Penelope lowering her voice, and shaking her head ; "she has not appeared—her brother went up stairs a few minutes since, I believe, to bring her down, and so we are all left here to look at each other.—How very awkward !—But you know Clara Mowbray."

"I, madam ?" said Mr. Cargill, who was now sufficiently attentive ; "I really—I know Miss Mowbray—that is, I knew her some years since—but your ladyship knows she has been long in bad health—uncertain health, at least, and I have seen nothing of the young lady for a very long time."

"I know it, my dear Mr. Cargill—I know it," continued the Lady Penelope, in the same tone of deep sympathy, "I know it ; and most unhappy surely have been the circumstances that have separated her from your advice and friendly counsel.—All this I am aware of—and to say truth, it has been chiefly on poor Clara's account that I have been giving you the trouble of fixing an acquaintance upon you.—You and I together, Mr. Cargill, might do wonders to cure her unhappy state of mind—I am sure we might—that is if you could bring your mind to repose absolute confidence in me."

"Has Miss Mowbray desired your ladyship to converse with me upon any subject which interests her ?" said the clergyman, with more cautious shrewdness than Lady Penelope had suspected him of possessing. "I will in that case be happy to hear the nature of her communication ; and whatever my poor services can perform, your ladyship may command them."

"I—I—I cannot just assert," said her ladyship with hesitation, "that I have Miss Mowbray's direct instructions to speak to you, Mr. Cargill, upon the present subject. But my affection for the dear girl was very great—and then, you know, the inconveniences which may arise from this match."

"From which match, Lady Penelope ?" said Mr. Cargill.

"Nay, now, Mr. Cargill, you really carry the pri-of Scotland too far—I have not put a single question to you, but what you have answered by another at me converse intelligibly for five minutes, if you but condescend so far."

"For any length of time which your ladyship may see to command," said Mr. Cargill, "provided the subject regard your ladyship's own affairs or mine,—and I suppose these last for a moment likely to interest you."

"Out upon you," said the lady, laughing affectedly; "you should really have been a Catholic priest instead of a Presbyterian. What an invaluable father-confessor have the fair sex lost in you, Mr. Cargill, and wretchedly you would have evaded any cross-examinations which might have committed your persons?"

"Your ladyship's railery is far too severe for me to withstand or reply to," said Mr. Cargill, bowing with as much ease than her ladyship expected; and, retreating idly backward, he extricated himself from a conversation which he began to find somewhat embarrassing.

At that moment a murmur of surprise took place in the apartment, which was just entered by Miss Mowbray, leaning on her brother's arm. The cause this murmur will be best understood, by narrating as had passed betwixt the brother and sister.

CHAPTER XXII.

EXPOSTULATION.

Seek not the fault in them in your own robes,
Go to my chamber—put on clothes of mine.

The Tempting of the Sinner.

It was with a mixture of anxiety, vexation, and excitement, that Mowbray, just when he had handed Lady Penelope into the apartment where the tables were covered, observed that his sister was absent, and that Lady Binks was hanging on the arm of Lord Eberington, to whose rank it would properly be fallen to escort the lady of the house. An anxious and hasty glance cast through the room, ascertained that she was absent, nor could the ladies present give any account of her after she had quitted the scene, except that Lady Penelope had spoken a few words with her in her own apartment, immediately after the scenic entertainment was concluded. Further Mowbray hurried, complaining aloud of his sister's laziness in dressing, but internally hoping that the delay was occasioned by nothing of a more important character.

He hastened up stairs, entered her sitting-room without ceremony, and knocking at the door of her dressing-room, begged her to make haste.

"Here is the whole company impatient," he said, assuming a tone of pleasantry; "and Sir Bingo Binks clamouring for your presence, that he may be let loose from the cold meat."

"Paddock calls," said Clara from within; "anon—anon?"

"Nay, it is no jest, Clara," continued her brother; "here is Lady Penelope mauling like a starved cat."

"I come—I come, grey-malkin," answered Clara, the same ven as before, and entered the parlour, she spoke, her finery entirely thrown aside, and moved in the riding-habit which was her usual and favorite attire.

"Her brother was both surprised and offended. In my soul," he said, "Clara, this is behaving very

I indulge you in every freak upon ordinary occasions, but you might surely on this day, of all others, have condescended to appear something like my sister, and a gentlewoman receiving company in her own room."

"Why, dearest John," said Clara, "so that the men have enough to eat and drink, I cannot conceive why I should concern myself about their finery, they trouble themselves about my plain clothes."

"Come, come, Clara, this will not do," answered Mowbray; "you must positively go back into your dressing-room, and huddle your things on as fast as you can. You cannot go down to the company thus as you are."

"I certainly can, and I certainly will, John—I have made a fool of myself once this morning to oblige you, and for the rest of the day I am determined to appear in my own dress; that is, in one which shows I neither belong to the world, nor wish to have any thing to do with its fashions."

"By my soul, Clara, I will make you repent this," said Mowbray with more violence than he usually exhibited where his sister was concerned.

"You cannot, dear John," she coolly replied, "unless by beating me; and that I think you would repent of yourself."

"I do not know but what it were the best way of managing you," said Mowbray, muttering between his teeth, but commanding his violence, he only said aloud: "I am sure, from long experience, Clara, that your obstinacy will at the long run beat my anger. Do let us compound the point for once—keep your old habit, since you are so fond of making a sight of yourself, and only throw the shawl round your shoulders—it has been exceedingly admired, and every woman in the house longs to see it close—they can hardly believe it genuine."

"Do be a man, Mowbray," answered his sister; "meddle with your horse-shoos, and leave shawls alone."

"Do you be a woman, Clara, and think a little on them, when custom and decency render it necessary.—Nay, is it possible?—Will you not stir—not oblige me in such a trifle as this?"

"I would indeed if I could," said Clara; "but since you must know the truth—do not be angry—I have not the shawl. I have given it away—given it up, perhaps I should say, to the rightful owner.—She has promised me something or other in exchange for it, however—I have given it to Lady Penelope."

"Yes," answered Mowbray, "some of the work of her own fair hands, I suppose, or a couple of her ladyship's drawings, made up into fire-screens.—On my word—on my soul, this is too bad!—It is using me too ill, Clara—far too ill. If the thing had been of no value, my giving it to you should have fixed some upon it. Good-even to you; we will do as well as we can without you."

"Nay, but my dear John—stay but a moment," said Clara, taking his arm as he sullenly turned towards the door, "there are but two of us on the earth—do not let us quarrel about a trumpery shawl."

"Trumpery!" said Mowbray; "it cost fifty guineas, by G—, which I can but ill spare—trumpery!"

"O, never think of the cost," said Clara; "it was your gift, and that should, I own, have been enough to have made me keep to my death's day the poorest rag of it. But really Lady Penelope looked so very miserable, and twisted her poor face into so many odd expressions of anger and chagrin, that I resigned it to her, and agreed to say she had lent it to me for the performance. I believe she was afraid that I would change my mind, or that you would resume it as a sentimental wail; for, after she had walked a few turns with it wrapped around her, merely by way of taking possession, she despatched it by a special messenger to her apartment at the Well."

"She may go to the devil," said Mowbray, "for a greedy, unaccountable jade, who has varnished over a selfish, spiteful heart, that is as hard as a flint, with a fine glossing of taste and sensibility!"

"Nay, but John," replied his sister, "she really had something to complain of in the present case. The shawl had been bespoken on her account, or very nearly so; she showed me the tradesman's letter—only some agent of yours had come in between with the ready money, which no tradesman can resist.—Ah, John! I suspect half of your anger is owing to the failure of a plan to mortify poor Lady Penelope, and that she has more to complain of than you have.—Come, come, you have had the advantage of her in the first display of this fatal piece of finery, if wearing it on my poor shoulders can be called a display—'twill make her welcome to the rest for peace's sake, and let us go down to these good folks, and you shall see how pretty and civil I shall behave."

Mowbray, a spoiled child, and with all the petted habits of indulgence, was exceedingly fretted at the issue of the scheme which he had formed for mortifying Lady Penelope; but he saw at once the necessity of saying nothing more to his sister on the subject. Vengeance he privately muttered against Lady Penelope, whom he termed an absolute harpy in blue-stockings; unkindly forgetting, that in the very important affair at issue, he himself had been the first to interfere with and defeat her ladyship's designs on the garment in question.

"But I will blow her," he said, "I will blow her ladyship's conduct in the business! She shall not outwit a poor whimsical girl like Clara, without hearing it on more sides than one."

With this Christian and gentlemanlike feeling towards Lady Penelope, he escorted his sister into the dining-room, and led her to her proper place at the head of the table. It was the negligence displayed in her dress, which occasioned the murmur of surprise that greeted Clara on her entrance. Mowbray, as he placed his sister in her chair, made her general apology for her late appearance, and her riding-habit. "Some fumes," he supposed, "Puck, or such like tracky goblin, had been in her wardrobe, and carried off whatever was fit for wearing."

There were answers from every quarter—that it would have been too much to expect Miss Mowbray to dress for their amusement a second time—that nothing she chose to wear could misbecome Miss Mowbray—that she had set like the sun, in her splendid scenic dress, and now rose like the full moon in her ordinary attire; (this flight was by the Reverend Mr. Chatterly,)—and that "Miss Mowbray being at home, had an unco-gude right to please herself;" which last piece of politeness, being at least as much to the purpose as any that had preceded it, was the contribution of honest Mrs. Blower; and was replied to by Miss Mowbray with a particular and most gracious bow.

Mrs. Blower ought to have rested her colloquial faith, as Dr. Johnson would have said, upon a compliment so evidently acceptable, but no one knows where to stop. She thrust her broad, good-natured, delighted countenance forward, and sending her voice from the bottom to the top of the table, like her unquiet husband when calling to his mate during a breeze, wondered "why Miss Clara Mowbray delna wear that grand shawl she had on at the play-making, and her just sitting upon the wind of a door. Nae doubt it was for fear of the soup, and the butter-boats, and the like;—but she had three shawls, which she really fand was aw ower munny if Miss Mowbray wad like to wear ane of them—it was but imitation, to be sure—but it wad keep her shoulters as warm as if it were real Indian, and if it were dirtied it was the less matter."

"Much obliged, Mrs. Blower," said Mowbray unable to resist the temptation which this speech offered; "but my sister is not yet of quality sufficient, to entitle her to rob her friends of their shawls."

Lady Penelope coloured to the eyes, and bitter was the retort that arose to her tongue; but she suppressed it, and nodding to Miss Mowbray in the most friendly way in the world, yet with a very particular expression, she only said, "So you have told your brother of the little transaction which we have had this morning?—Tha melle pàrte—I give you for warning, take care none of your secrets come into my keeping—that's all."

Upon what mere trifles do the important events of human life sometimes depend! If Lady Penelope had given way to her first movements of resentment, the probable issue would have been some such half-comic half-serious skirmish, as her ladyship and Mr. Mowbray had often amused the company withal. But revenge which is suppressed and deferred, is always most to be dreaded; and to the effects of the deliberate sentiment which Lady Penelope cherished upon this trifling occasion, must be traced the events which our history has to record. Secretly did she determine to return the shawl, which she had entertained hopes of making her own upon very reasonable terms; and as secretly did she resolve to be revenged both upon brother and sister, conceiving herself already possessed, to a certain degree, of a clew to some part of their family history, which might serve for a foundation on which to raise her projected battery. The ancient offences and emulation of importance of the Laird of St. Ronan's, and the superiority which had been given to Clara in the exhibition of the day, combined with the immediate cause of resentment; and it only remained for her to consider how her revenge could be most signally accomplished.

Whilst such thoughts were passing through Lady Penelope's mind, Mowbray was searching with his eyes for the Earl of Etherington, judging that it might be proper, in the course of the entertainment, or before the guests had separated, to make him formally acquainted with his sister, as a preface to the more intimate connexion which must, in prosecution of the plan agreed upon, take place between them. Greatly to his surprise, the young Earl was now visible, and the place which he had occupied by the side of Lady Binks had been quietly appropriated by Winterblossom, as the best and softest chair in the room, and nearest to the head of the table, where the choicest of the entertainment is usually arranged. This honest gentleman, after a few insincere compliments to her ladyship upon her performance as Queen of the Amazons, had betaken himself to the more interesting occupation of ogling the dishes through the glass which hung suspended at his back by a gold chain of Maltese workmanship. After looking and wondering for a few seconds, Mowbray addressed himself to the old beau-garçon, and asked him what had become of Etherington.

"Retreated," said Winterblossom, "and left his compliments to you behind him—a comical little think, in his wounded arm. Upon my word, the soup has a most appetizing flavour!—Lady Penelope, shall I have the honour to help you?—no!—never!—Lady Binks?—you are too cruel!—I must content myself, like a heathen priest of old, by eating the sacrifice which the deities have scorned to accept."

Here he helped himself to the plate of soup which he had in vain offered to the ladies, and transferred the further duty of dispensing it to Mr. Chatterly, "is your profession, sir, to propitiate the deities?"

"I did not think Lord Etherington would have left us so soon," said Mowbray; "but we must do the best we can without his countenance."

So saying, he assumed his place at the foot of the table, and did his best to support the character of a hospitable and joyous landlord, while conversing with much natural grace and delicacy of address calculated to suit every body at their ease. He presided at the upper end of the board. But the wish of Lord Etherington in a manner so secret and unaccountable—the obvious ill-timed arrival of Lady Penelope—and the steady, though passive, smiles of Lady Binks, spread among the company a gloom like that produced by an autumnal mist upon a morning landscape. The women were low-spirited, nay, peevish; they did not well know why; the men could not be joyous, though the ready supply of old hoc and champagne made some of them lively. Lady Penelope broke up the party by well-forged apprehensions of the difficulties, nay, danger of returning by so rough a road. Lady Binks took a seat with her ladyship, as Sir Fergus, she said, judging from his devotion to the green flask, was likely to need their carriage home. From the moment of their departure, it became bad news to remain behind; and all, as in a retreating army, were eager to be foremost, excepting MacTusk and a few staunch toppers, who, unused to meet with such good cheer every day of their lives, prudently determined to make the most of the opportunity.

We will not dwell on the difficulties attending the transportation of a large company by few carriages, though the delay and disputes thereby occasioned were of course more intolerable than in the morning, for the parties had no longer the hopes of a happy day before them, as a bribe to submit to temporary inconvenience. The impatience of many was so great, that, though the evening was raw, they chose to go on foot rather than await the dull routine of the turning carriages; and as they retired they agreed in great measure removed by the arrival of one of Lord Etherington's grooms with the following letter:

"MY DEAR MOWBRAY,

"You would naturally be surprised at my escape from the table yesterday before you returned to it, or your lovely sister had graced it with her presence. I must confess my folly; and I may do so the more boldly, for, as the footing on which I first opened this treaty was not a very romantic one, you will scarce suspect me of wishing to render it such. But I did in reality feel, during the whole of yesterday, a reluctance which I cannot express, to be presented to the lady on whose favour the happiness of my future life is to depend, upon such a public occasion, and in the presence of so promiscuous a company. I had my mask, indeed, to wear while in the promenade, but, of course, that was to be laid aside at table, and, consequently,
I must have gone through the ceremony of introduction; a most interesting moment, which I was desireous to defer till a fitter season. I trust you will permit me to call upon you at Shaws-Castle this morning, in the hope—the anxious hope—of being allowed to pay my duty to Miss Mowbray, and apologize for not waiting upon her yesterday. I expect your answer with the utmost impatience, being always yours, &c. &c. &c.

"ETHERINGTON."

"This," said St. Ronan's to himself, as he folded up the letter deliberately, after having twice read it over, "seems all fair and above board; I could not wish any thing more explicit; and, moreover, it puts into black and white, as old Mick would say, what only rested before on our private conversation. An especial cure for the headache, such a billet as this in a morning."

So saying, he sat him down and wrote an answer, expressing the pleasure he should have in seeing his lordship as soon as he thought proper. He watched even the departure of the groom, and beheld him gallop off, with the speed of one who knows that his quick return was expected by an impatient master.

Mowbray remained for a few minutes by himself, and reflected with delight upon the probable consequences of this match;—the advancement of his sister —and, above all, the various advantages which must necessarily accrue to himself, by so close an alliance with one whom he had good reason to think deep in the secret, and capable of rendering him the most material assistance in his speculations on the turf and in the sporting world. He then sent a servant to let Miss Mowbray know that he intended to breakfast with her.

"I suppose, John," said Clara, as her brother entered the apartment, "you are glad of a weaker cup this morning than those you were drinking last night
—you were carousing till after the first cock."

"Yes," said Mowbray, "that sandbed, old Mac-Turk, upon whom whole hogsheads make no impression, did make a bad boy of me—but the day is over, and they will scarce catch me in such another scrape.
—What did you think of the masks?"

"Supported as well," said Clara, "as such folk support the disguise of gentlemen and ladies during life; and that is, with a great deal of bustle, and very little propriety."

"I saw only one good mask there, and that was a Spaniard," said her brother.

"O, I saw him too," answered Clara; "but he wore his visor on. An old Indian merchant, or some such thing seemed to me a better character—the Spaniard did nothing but stalk about and twangle his guitar, for the amusement of my Lady Binks, as I think."

"He is a very clever fellow, though, that same Spaniard," rejoined Mowbray—"Can you guess who he is?"

"No, indeed; nor shall I take the trouble of trying.
To set to guessing about it, were as bad as seeing the whole mummery over again."

"Well," replied her brother, "you will allow one thing at least—Bottom was well acted—you cannot deny that."

"Yes," replied Clara, "that worthy really deserved to wear his ass's head to the end of the chapter—but what of him?"

"Only conceive that he should be the very same person with that handsome Spaniard," replied Mowbray.

"Then there is one fool fewer than I thought there was," replied Clara, with the greatest indifference.

Her brother bit his lip.

"Clara," he said, "I believe you are an excellent good girl, and clever to boot, but pray do not set up for wit and oddity; there is nothing in life so intolerable as pretending to think differently from other people. That gentleman was the Earl of Etherington."

This annunciation, though made in what was meant to be an imposing tone, had no impression on Clara.

"I hope he plays the peer better than the Fidalgo," she replied carelessly.

"Yes," answered Mowbray, "he is one of the handsomest men of the time, and decidedly fashionable—you will like him much when you see him in private."

"It is of little consequence whether I do or no," answered Clara.

"You mistake the matter," said Mowbray, gravely; "it may be of considerable consequence."

"Indeed!" said Clara, with a smile; "I must suppose myself, then, too important a person not to make my approbation necessary to one of your first-rates? He cannot pretend to pass muster at St. Ronan's without it?—Well, I will depute my authority to Lady Binks, and she shall pass your new recruits instead of me."

"This is all nonsense, Clara," said Mowbray. "Lord Etherington calls here this very morning, and wishes to be made known to you. I expect you will receive him as a particular friend of mine."

"With all my heart—so you will engage, after this visit, to keep him down with your other particular friends at the Well—you know it is a bargain that you bring neither buck nor pointer into my parlour—the one worries my cat, and the other my temper."

"You mistake me entirely, Clara—this is a very different visiter from any I have ever introduced to you—I expect to see him often here, and I hope you and he will be better friends than you think of. I have more reasons for wishing this, than I have now time to tell you."

Clara remained silent for an instant, then looked at her brother with an anxious and scrutinizing glance, as if she wished to penetrate into his inmost purpose.

"If I thought,"—she said, after a minute's consideration, and with an altered and disturbed tone; "but no—I will not think that Heaven intends me such a blow—least of all, that it should come from your hands." She walked hastily to the window, and threw it open—then shut it again, and returned to her seat, saying, with a constrained smile, "May Heaven forgive you, brother, but you frightened me heartily."

"I did not mean to do so, Clara," said Mowbray, who saw the necessity of soothing her; "I only alluded in joke to those chances that are never out of other girls' heads, though you never seem to calculate on them."

"I wish you, my dear John," said Clara, struggling to regain entire composure, "I wish you would profit by my example, and give up the science of chance also—it will not avail you."

"How do you know that?—I'll show you the contrary, you silly wench," answered Mowbray—"Here is a banker's bill, payable to your own order, for the cash you lent me, and something over—don't let old Mick have the fingering, but let Bindloose manage it for you—he is the honestest man between two d—d knaves."

"Will not you, brother, send it to the man Bindloose yourself?"

"No,—no," replied Mowbray—"he might confuse it with some of my transactions, and so you forfeit your stake."

"Well, I am glad you are able to pay me, for I want to buy Campbell's new work."

"I wish you joy of your purchase—but don't scratch me for not caring about it—I know as little of books as you of the long odds. And come now, be serious, and tell me if you will be a good girl—lay aside your whims, and receive this English young nobleman like a lady as you are?"

"That were easy," said Clara—"but—but—Pray, ask no more of me than just to see him.—Say to him at once, I am a poor creature in body, in mind, in spirits, in temper, in understanding—above all, say that I can receive him only once."

"I shall say no such thing," said Mowbray, blantly; "it is good to be plain with you at once—I thought of putting off this discussion—but since it must come, the sooner it is over the better.—You are to understand, Clara Mowbray, that Lord Etherington has a particular view in this visit, and that his view has my full sanction and approbation."

"I thought so," said Clara, in the same altered tone of voice in which she had before spoken; "my mind foreboded this last of misfortunes!—But, Mowbray, you have no child before you—I neither will nor can see this nobleman."

"How!" exclaimed Mowbray, fiercely; "do you dare return me so peremptory an answer?—Think better of it, for, if we differ, you will find you will have the worst of the game."

"Rely upon it," she continued, with more vehemence, "I will see him nor no man upon the footing you mention—my resolution is taken, and threats and entreaties will prove equally unavailing."

"Upon my word, madam," said Mowbray, "you have, for a modest and retired young lady, plucked up a goodly spirit of your own!—But you shall find me equals it. If you do not agree to see my friend Lord Etherington, ay, and to receive him with the politeness due to the consideration I entertain for him—Heaven! Clara, I will no longer regard you as my father's daughter. Think what you are giving up—the affection and protection of a brother—and for what?—merely for an idle point of etiquette.—You cannot, I suppose, even in the workings of your romantic brain, imagine that the days of Clanissa Harlowe and Harriet Byron are come back again, when women were married by main force! and it is monstrous vanity in you to suppose that Lord Etherington, since he has honoured you with any thoughts at all, will not be satisfied with a proper and civil refusal.—You are no such prize, methinks, that the days of romance are to come back for you."

"I care not what days they are," said Clara—"I tell you I will not see Lord Etherington, or any one else, upon such preliminaries as you have stated—I cannot—I will not—and I ought not.—Had you meant me to receive him, which can be a matter of no consequence whatever, you should have left him on the footing of an ordinary visiter—as it is, I will not see him."

"You shall see and hear him both," said Mowbray; "you shall find me as obstinate as you are—as willing to forget I am a brother, as you to forget that you have one."

"It is time, then," replied Clara, "that this house once our father's, should no longer hold us both. I can provide for myself, and may God bless you!"

"You take it coolly, madam," said her brother, walking through the apartment with much anxiety both of look and gesture.

"I do," she answered, "for it is what I have often foreseen.—Yes, brother, I have often foreseen that you would make your sister the subject of your plots and schemes, so soon as other stakes failed you. That hour is come, and I am, as you see, prepared to meet it."

"And where may you propose to retire to?" said Mowbray. "I think that I, your only relation and natural guardian, have a right to know that:—my honour and that of my family is concerned."

"Your honour!" she retorted, with a keen glance at him; "your interest, I suppose you mean, is somehow connected with the place of my abode.—But keep yourself patient—the den of the rock, the lair of the brook, should be my choice, rather than a palace without my freedom."

"You are mistaken, however," said Mowbray, sternly, "if you hope to enjoy more freedom than I think you capable of making a good use of. The law authorizes, and reason, and even affection, require, that you should be put under restraint for your own safety, and that of your character. You roamed the woods a little too much in my father's time, if all stories be true."

"I did—I did indeed, Mowbray," said Clara, weeping; "God pity me, and forgive you for upbraiding me with my state of mind—I know I cannot sometimes trust my own judgment; but is it for you to remind me of this?"

Mowbray was at once softened and embarrassed.

"What folly is this?" he said; "you say the most cutting things to me—are ready to fly from my house—and when I am provoked to make an angry answer, you burst into tears!"

"Say you did not mean what you said, my dearest brother!" exclaimed Clara; "O say you did not mean it!—Do not take my liberty from me—it is all I have left, and, God knows, it is a poor comfort in the sorrows I undergo. I will put a fair face on every thing—will go down to the Well—will wear what you please, and say what you please—but O! leave me the liberty of my solitude here—let me weep alone in the house of my father—and do not force a broken-hearted sister to lay her death at your door.—My span must be a brief one, but let not your hand shake the sand-glass!—Disturb me not—let me pass quietly—I do not ask this so much for my sake as for your own. I would have you think of me, sometimes, Mowbray, after I am gone, and without the bitter reflections which the recollection of harsh usage will assuredly bring with it. Pity me, were it but for your own sake.—I have deserved nothing but compassion at your hand—There are but two of us on earth, why should we make each other miserable?"

She accompanied these entreaties with a flood of tears, and the most heart-bursting sobs. Mowbray knew not what to determine. On the one hand, he was bound by his promise to the Earl; on the other, his sister was in no condition to receive such a visiter; nay, it was most probable, that if he adopted the strong measure of compelling her to receive him, her behaviour would probably be such as totally to break off the projected match, on the success of which he had founded so many castles in the air. In this dilemma, he had again recourse to argument.

"Clara," he said, "I am, as I have repeatedly said, your only relation and guardian—if there be any real reason why you ought not to receive, and, at least, make a civil reply to such a negotiation as the Earl of Etherington has thought fit to open, surely I ought to be intrusted with it. You enjoyed far too much of that liberty which you seem to prize so highly during my father's lifetime—in the last years of it at least—have you formed any foolish attachment during that time, which now prevents you from receiving such a visit as Lord Etherington has threatened?"

"Threatened!—the expression is well chosen," said Miss Mowbray; "and nothing can be more dreadful than such a threat, excepting its accomplishment."

"I am glad your spirits are reviving," replied her brother; "but that is no answer to my question."

"Is it necessary," said Clara, "that one must have actually some engagement or entanglement, to make them unwilling to be given in marriage, or even to be deterred upon such a subject?—Many young men decline they intend to die bachelors, why may not I be permitted to commence old maid at three-and-twenty?—Let me do so, like a kind brother, and there were never nephews and nieces so petted and so spoiled, so nursed and so cuffed by a maiden aunt, as children, when you have them, shall be by aunt Clara."

"And why not say all this to Lord Etherington?" said Mowbray; "wait until he propose such a terrible bugbear as matrimony, before you refuse to receive him. Who knows, the whim that he hinted at may have passed away—he was, as you say, flirting with Lady Binka, and her ladyship has a good deal of address, as well as beauty."

"Heaven improve both, (in an honest way,) if she will but keep his lordship to herself!" said Clara.

"Well, then," continued her brother, "things standing thus, I do not think you will have much trouble with his lordship—no more, perhaps, than just to give him a civil denial. After having spoken on such a subject to a man of my condition, he cannot well break off without you give him an apology."

"If that is all," said Clara, "he shall, as soon as he gives me an opportunity, receive such an answer as will leave him at liberty to woo any one whatsoever of Eve's daughters, excepting Clara Mowbray. Methinks I am so eager to set the captive free, that I now wish as much for his lordship's appearance as I feared it a little while since."

"Nay, nay, but let us go fair and softly," said her brother. "You are not to refuse him before he asks the question."

"Certainly," said Clara; "but I well know how to manage that—he shall never ask the question at all. I will restore Lady Binka's admirer, without accepting so much as a civility in ransom."

"Worse and worse, Clara," answered Mowbray; "you are to remember he is my friend and guest, and he must not be affronted in my house. Leave things to themselves.—Besides, consider an instant, Clara—had you not better take a little time for reflection in this case? The offer is a splendid one—title—fortune—and, what is more, a fortune which you will be well entitled to share largely in."

"This is beyond our implied treaty," said Clara. "I have yielded more than ever I thought I should have done, when I agreed that this Earl should be introduced to me on the footing of a common visiter; and now you talk favourably of his pretensions. This is an encroachment, Mowbray, and now I shall relapse into my obstinacy, and refuse to see him at all."

"Do as you will," replied Mowbray, sensible that it was only by working on her affections that he had any chance of carrying a point against her inclination.—"Do as you will, my dear Clara; but, for Heaven's sake, wipe your eyes."

"And behave myself," said she, trying to smile as she obeyed him.—"behave myself, you would say, like folks of this world; but the quotation is lost on you, who never read either Prior or Shakspeare."

"I thank Heaven for that," said Mowbray. "I have enough to burden my brain, without carrying such a lumber of rhymes in it as you and Lady Pen do.—Come, that is right; go to the mirror, and make yourself decent."

A woman must be much borne down indeed by pain and suffering, when she loses all respect for her external appearance. The madwoman in Bedlam wears her garland of straw with a certain air of pretensions; and we have seen a widow whom we knew to be most sincerely affected by a recent deprivation, whose weeds, nevertheless, were arranged with a dolorous degree of grace, which amounted almost to coquetry. Clara Mowbray had also, negligent as she seemed to be of appearances, her own art of the toilet, although of the most rapid and most simple character. She took off her little riding-hat, and, unbinding a lace of Indian gold which retained her locks, shook them in dark and glossy profusion over her very handsome form, which they overshadowed down to her slender waist; and while her brother stood looking on her with a mixture of pride, affection, and compassion, she arranged them with a large comb, and, without the assistance of any femme d'atours, wove them, in the course of a few minutes, into such a natural head-dress as we see on the statues of the Grecian nymphs.

"Now let me but find my best muff," she said "come prince and peer, I shall be ready to receive them."

"Pshaw! your muff—who has heard of such a thing these twenty years? Muffs were out of fashion before you were born."

"No matter, John," replied his sister; "when a woman wears a muff, especially a determined old maid like myself, it is a sign she has no intentions to scratch; and therefore the muff serves all the purposes of a white flag, and prevents the necessity of drawing on a glove, so prudentially recommended by the motto of our cousins, the M'Intoshes."*

"Be it as you will, then," said Mowbray; "for other than you do will it, you will not suffer it to be. —But how is this!—another billet?—We are in request this morning."

"Now, Heaven send his lordship may have judiciously considered all the risks which he is sure to encounter on this charmed ground, and resolved to leave his adventure unattempted," said Miss Mowbray.

Her brother glanced a look of displeasure at her, as he broke the seal of the letter, which was addressed to him with the words, "Haste and secrecy," written on the envelope. The contents, which greatly surprised him, we remit to the commencement of the next chapter.

PRIVATE INFORMATION.

—Ope this letter;
I can produce a champion that will prove
What is avouched there.—

King Lear.

THE billet which Mowbray received, and read in his sister's presence, contained these words:

"SIR,
"CLARA MOWBRAY has few friends—none, perhaps, excepting yourself in right of blood, and the writer of this letter, by right of the fondest, truest, and most disinterested attachment, that ever man bore to woman. I am thus explicit with you, because though it is unlikely that I should ever again see or speak to your sister, I am desirous that you should be clearly acquainted with the cause of that interest, which I must always, even to my dying breath, take in her affairs.

"The person, calling himself Lord Etherington, is, I am aware, in the neighbourhood of Shaws-Castle, with the intention of paying his addresses to Miss Mowbray; and it is easy for me to foresee, arguing according to the ordinary views of mankind, that he may place his proposals in such a light as may make them seem highly desirable. But ere you give this person the encouragement which his offers may seem to deserve, please to inquire whether his fortune is certain, or his rank indisputable; and be not satisfied with light evidence on either point. A man may be in possession of an estate and title, to which he has no better right than his own rapacity and forwardness of assumption; and supposing Mr. Mowbray jealous, as he must be, of the honour of his family, the alliance of such a one cannot but bring disgrace. Thus comes from one who will make good what he has written."

On the first perusal of a billet so extraordinary, Mowbray was inclined to set it down to the malice of some of the people at the Well, anonymous letters being no uncommon resource of the small wits who frequent such places of general resort, as a species of deception safely and easily executed, and well calculated to produce much mischief and confusion. But upon closer consideration, he was shaken in this opinion, and, starting suddenly from the reverie into which he had fallen, asked for the messenger who had brought the letter. "He was in the hall," the servant thought, and Mowbray ran to the hall. No—the messenger was not there, but Mowbray might see his back as he walked up the avenue. He hollod—no answer was returned—he ran after the fellow, whose appearance was that of a countryman. The man quickened his pace as he saw himself pursued, and when he got out of the avenue, threw himself into one of the numerous bypaths which wanderers, who strayed in quest of nuts, or for the sake of exercise, had made in various directions through the extensive copse which surrounded the Castle, and were doubtless the reason of its acquiring the name of Shaws, which signifies, in the Scottish dialect, a wood of this description.

Irritated by the man's obvious desire to avoid him, and naturally obstinate in all his resolutions, Mowbray pursued for a considerable way, until he fairly lost breath; and the flier having been long out of sight, he recollected at length that his engagement with the Earl of Etherington required his attendance at the Castle.

The young lord, indeed, had arrived at Shaws-Castle, so few minutes after Mowbray's departure, that it was wonderful they had not met in the avenue. The servant to whom he applied, conceiving that his master must return instantly, as he had gone out without his hat, ushered the Earl, without further ceremony, into the breakfast-room, where Clara was seated upon one of the window-seats, so busily employed with a book, or perhaps with her own thoughts while she held a book in her hands, that she scarce raised her head, until Lord Etherington, advancing, pronounced the words, "Miss Mowbray." A start and a loud scream, announced her deadly alarm, and these were repeated as he made one pace nearer, and in a firmer accent said, "Clara."

"No nearer—no nearer," she exclaimed, "if you would have me look upon you and live!" Lord Etherington remained standing, as if uncertain whether to advance or retreat, while with incredible rapidity she poured out her hurried entreaties that he would be gone, sometimes addressing him as a real personage, sometimes, and more frequently, as a delusive phantom, the offspring of her own excited imagination. "I knew it," she muttered. "I knew what would happen, if my thoughts were forced into that fearful chance. Speak to me, brother! speak to me while I have reason left, and tell me that what stands before me is but an empty shadow! But it is no shadow—it remains before me in all the lineaments of mortal substance!"

"Clara," said the Earl, with a firm, yet softened voice, "collect and compose yourself. I am, indeed, no shadow—I am a much-injured man, come to demand rights which have been unjustly withheld from me. I am now armed with power as well as justice, and my claims shall be heard."

"Never—never!" replied Clara Mowbray; "since extremity is my portion, let extremity give me courage. You have no rights—none—I know you not, and I defy you."

"Defy me not, Clara Mowbray," answered the Earl, in a tone, and with a manner—how different from those which delighted society! for now he was solemn, tragic, and almost stern, like the judge when he passes sentence upon a criminal. "Defy me not," he repeated. "I am your Fate, and it rests with you to make me a kind or severe one."

"Dare you speak thus?" said Clara, her eyes flashing with anger, while her lips grew white, and quivered for fear—"Dare you speak thus, and remember that the same heaven is above our heads, to which you so solemnly vowed you would never see me more without my own consent?"

"That vow was conditional—Francis Tyrral, as he calls himself, swore the same—hath he not seen you?" He fixed a piercing look on her; "He has—you dare not disown it!—And shall an oath, which to him is but a cobweb, be to me a shackle of iron?"

"Alas! it was but for a moment," said Miss Mowbray, sinking in courage, and drooping her head as she spoke.

"Were it but the twentieth part of an instant—the least conceivable space of subdivided time—still, I did meet—he saw you—you spoke to him. And now also you must see—me also you must hear! Or I will first claim you for my own in the face of the world; and, having vindicated my rights, I will seek out and extinguish the wretched rival who has dared to interfere with them."

"Can you speak thus?" said Clara—"can you burst through the ties of nature?—Have you a heart?"
"I have; and it shall be moulded like wax to your slightest wishes, if you agree to do me justice; but not granite, nor aught else that nature has of hardest, will be more inflexible if you continue a useless opposition!—Clara Mowbray, I am your Fate."

"Not so, proud man," said Clara, rising, "God gave not one potsherd the power to break another, save by his divine permission—my fate is in the will of Him, without whose will not even a sparrow falls not to the ground.—Begone—I am strong in faith of heavenly protection."

"Do you speak thus in sincerity?" said the Earl of Etherington; "consider first what is the prospect before you. I stand here in no doubtful or ambiguous character—I offer not the mere name of a husband—propose to you not a humble lot of obscurity and hardship, with fears for the past and doubts for the future; yet there was a time when to a suit like this you could listen favourably.—I stand high among the nobles of the country, and offer you, as my bride, your share in my honours, and in the wealth which becomes them.—Your brother is my friend, and favours my suit. I will raise from the ground, and once more render illustrious, your ancient house—your motions shall be regulated by your wishes, even by your caprices—I will even carry my self-denial so far, that you shall, should you insist on so severe a measure, have your own residence, your own establishment, and without intrusion on my part, until the most devoted love, the most unceasing attentions, shall make way on your inflexible disposition.—All this I will consent to for the future—all that is past shall be concealed from the public.—But mine, Clara Mowbray, you must be."

"Never—never!" she said with increasing vehemence. "I can but repeat a negative, but it shall have all the force of an oath.—Your rank is nothing to me—your fortune I scorn—my brother has no right, by the law of Scotland, or of nature, to compel my inclinations.—I detest your treachery, and I scorn the advantage you propose to attain by it.—Should the law give you my hand, it would but award you that of a corpse."

"Alas! Clara," said the Earl, "you do but flutter in the net; but I will urge you no farther now—there is another encounter before me."

He was turning away, when Clara, springing forward, caught him by the arm, and repeated, in a low and impressive voice the commandment,—"Thou shalt do no murder!"

"Fear not any violence," he said, softening his voice, and attempting to take her hand, "but what may flow from your own severity.—Francis is safe from me, unless you are altogether unreasonable.—Allow me but what you cannot deny to any friend of your brother, the power of seeing you at times—suspend at least the impetuosity of your dislike to me, and I will, on my part, modify the current of my just and otherwise uncontrollable resentment."

Clara, extricating herself, and retreating from him, only replied, "There is a Heaven above us, and THERE shall be judged our actions towards each other! You abuse a power most treacherously obtained—you break a heart that never did you wrong—you seek an alliance with a wretch who only wishes to be wedded to her grave.—If my brother brings you hither, I cannot help it—and if your coming prevents bloody and unnatural violence, it is so far well.—But by my consent you come not; and, were the choice mine, I would rather be struck with life-long blindness, than that my eyes should again open on your person—rather that my ears were stuffed with the earth of the grave than that they should again hear your voice!"

The Earl of Etherington smiled proudly, and replied, "Even this, madam, I can hear without resentment. Anxious and careful as you are to deprive your compliance of every grace and of every kindness, I receive the permission to wait on you, as I interpret your words."

"Do not so interpret them," she replied; "I do but submit to your presence as an unavoidable evil. Heaven be my witness, that, were it not to prevent greater and more desperate evil, I would not even so far acquiesce."

"Let acquiescence, then, be the word," he said; "and so thankful will I be, even for your acquiescence, Miss Mowbray, that all shall remain private, which I conceive you do not wish to be disclosed; and, unless absolutely compelled to it in self-defence, you may rely, no violence will be resorted to by me in any quarter.—I relieve you from my presence."

So saying, he withdrew from the apartment.

CHAPTER XXV.

EXPLANATORY.

— By your leave, gentle wax.

SHAKESPEARE.

IN the hall of Shaws-Castle the Earl of Etherington met Mowbray, returned from his fruitless chase after the bearer of the anonymous epistle before recited; and who had but just learned, on his return, that the Earl of Etherington was with his sister. There was a degree of mutual confusion when they met; for Mowbray had the contents of the anonymous letter fresh in his mind, and Lord Etherington, notwithstanding all the coolness which he had endeavoured to maintain, had not gone through the scene with Clara without discomposure. Mowbray asked the Earl whether he had seen his sister, and invited him, at the same time, to return to the parlour; and his lordship replied, in a tone as indifferent as he could assume, that he had enjoyed the honour of the lady's company for several minutes, and would not now intrude farther upon Miss Mowbray's patience.

"You have had such a reception as was agreeable, my lord, I trust?" said Mowbray. "I hope Clara did the honours of the house with propriety during my absence?"

"Miss Mowbray seemed a little fluttered with my sudden appearance," said the Earl; "the servant showed me in rather abruptly; and, circumstanced as we were, there is always awkwardness in a first meeting, where there is no third party to act as master of the ceremonies.—I suspect, from the lady's looks, that you have not quite kept my secret, my good friend. I myself, too, felt a little consciousness in approaching Miss Mowbray—but it is over now; and, the ice being fairly broken, I hope to have other and more convenient opportunities to improve the advantage I have just gained in acquiring your lovely sister's personal acquaintance."

"So be it," said Mowbray; "but, as you declare for leaving the castle just now, I must first speak a single word with your lordship, for which this place is not altogether convenient."

"I can have no objections, my dear Jack," said Etherington, following him with a thrill of conscious feeling, somewhat perhaps like that of the spider when he perceives his deceitful web is threatened with injury, and sits balanced in the centre, watching every point, and uncertain which he may be called upon first to defend. Such is one part, and not the slightest part, of the penance which never fails to wait on those, who, abandoning the "fair play of the world," endeavour to work out their purposes by a process of deception and intrigue.

"My lord," said Mowbray, when they had entered a little apartment, in which the latter kept his guns, fishing-tackle, and other implements of sport, "you have played on the square with me; nay, more—I am bound to allow you have given me great odds. I am therefore not entitled to hear any reports to the prejudice of your lordship's character, without instantly communicating them. There is an anonymous letter which I have just received. Perhaps your lordship may know the hand, and thus be enabled to detect the writer."

"I do know the hand," said the Earl, as he received the note from Mowbray; "and, allow me to say, it is the only one which could have dared to frame any calumny to my prejudice. I hope, Mr. Mowbray, it is impossible for you to consider this infamous charge as any thing but a falsehood?"

"My placing it in your lordship's hands, without farther inquiry, is a sufficient proof that I hold it such, my lord; at the same time that I cannot doubt for a moment that your lordship has it in your power to overthrow so full a column by the most satisfactory evidence."

"Unquestionably I can, Mr. Mowbray," said the Earl; "for, besides my being in full possession of the estate and title of my father, the late Earl of Esherington, I have my father's contract of marriage, my own certificate of baptism, and the evidence of the whole country, to establish my right. All these shall be produced with the best despatch possible. You will not think it surprising that one does not travel with this sort of documents in one's pocket-chain."

"Certainly not, my lord," said Mowbray; "it is sufficient they are forthcoming when called for; but, may I inquire, my lord, who the writer of this letter is, and whether he has any particular spleen to gratify by this very impudent assertion, which is so easily capable of being disproved?"

"He is," said Esherington, "or, at least, has the reputation of being, I am sorry to say, a most—very near relation of my own—in fact, a brother by the father's side, but illegitimate. My father was fond of him—I loved him also, for he has uncommonly fine parts, and is accounted highly accomplished. But there is a strain of something irregular in his mind—a vein, in short, of madness, which breaks out in the usual manner, rendering the poor young man a dupe to vain imaginations of his own dignity and grandeur, which is perhaps the most ordinary effect of insanity, and inspiring the deepest aversion against his nearest relatives, and against myself in particular. He is a man extremely plausible, both in speech and manners, so much so, that many of my friends think there is more vice than humanity in the irregularities which he commits; but, I may, I hope, be forgiven, if I have formed a milder judgment of one supposed to be my father's son. Indeed, I cannot help being sorry for poor Frank, who might have made a very distinguished figure in the world."

"May I ask the gentleman's name, my lord?" said Mowbray.

"My father's indulgence gave him our family name of Tyrrel, with his own Christian name Francis; but his proper name, to which alone he has a right, is Martigny."

"Francis Tyrrel!" exclaimed Mowbray; "why that is the name of the very person who made some disturbance at the well just before your lordship arrived—You may have seen an advertisement—a sort of placard."

"I have, Mr. Mowbray," said the Earl. "Spare me on that subject, if you please—it has formed a strong reason why I did not mention my connection with this unhappy man before; but it is no unusual thing for persons, whose imaginations are excited, to rush into senseless quarrels, and then to make irreparable retreats from them."

"Or," said Mr. Mowbray, "he may have, after all, been prevented from reaching the place of rendezvous—it was that very day on which your lordship, I think, received your wound, and, if I mistake not, you hit the man from whom you got the hurt."

"Mowbray," said Lord Esherington, lowering his voice, and taking him by the arm, "it is true that I did so—and truly glad I am to observe, that, whatever might have been the consequences of such an accident, they cannot have been serious.—It struck me afterwards, that the man by whom I was so strangely assaulted, had some resemblance to the unfortunate Tyrrel—but I had not seen him for years.—At any rate, he cannot have been much hurt, since he is now able to resume his intrigues to the prejudice of my character."

"Your lordship views the thing with a firm eye," said Mowbray; "firmer than I think most people would be able to command, who had so narrow a chance of a scrape so uncomfortable."

"Why, I am, in the first place, by no means sure that the risk existed," said the Earl of Esherington; "for, as I have often told you, I had but a very transient glimpse of the ruffian, and, in the second place, I am sure that no permanent bad consequences have ensued. I am too old a fox-hunter to be afraid of a leap after it is cleared, as they tell of the fellow who flung in the morning at the sight of the pretence he had clambered over when he was drunk on the night before. The man who wrote that letter," touching with his finger, "is alive, and able to threaten me; and if he did come to any hurt from my hand, it was in the act of attempting my life, of which I shall owe the mark to my grave."

"Nay, I am far from blaming your lordship," said Mowbray, "for what you did in self-defence, but the circumstance might have turned out very unpleasant.—May I ask what you intend to do with this unfortunate gentleman, who is in all probability in the neighbourhood?"

"I must first discover the place of his retreat," said Lord Esherington, "and then consider what is to be done both for his safety, poor fellow, and my own. It is probable, too, that he may find sharps to pry upon what fortune he still possesses, which, I assure you, is sufficient to attract a set of folk, who may not while they humour him.—May I beg that you will be on the outlook, and let me know if you hear or see more of him?"

"I shall, most certainly, my lord," answered Mowbray; "but the only one of his haunts which I know is the old Clerkum Inn, where he chose to take up his residence. He has now left it, but perhaps he is crab-fish of a landlady may know something of him."

"I will not fail to inquire," said Lord Esherington; and with these words he took a kind farewell of Mowbray, mounted his horse, and rode up the stream.

A nod to him, said Mowbray, as he looked after him, and a devil fellow this brother-in-law of mine, that is to be, takes a shot at his father's son with a little remorse as at a blackcock—what would he do with me were we to quarrel?—Well, I can smother a candle, and strike out the eye of brags; and should things go wrong, he has no Jack Raw to deal with, but Jack Mowbray."

Mean while the Earl of Esherington hastened home to his own apartments at the Hotel; and, not much pleased with the events of the day, commenced a letter to his correspondent, agent, and confidant, Captain Jehyl, which we have fortunately the means of presenting to our readers.—

"FADING HARRY."

"They say a falling house is best known by the rats leaving it—a falling stone, by the descent of confederates and allies—and a falling man, by the desertion of his friends. If this be true, surely your last letter may be considered an ominous sign of my breaking down. Methinks you have gone far enough, and shared deep enough with me, to have some confidence in my secret force—some little faith both in my aims and management. What cross-grained fiend has it once inspired you with what I suppose you wish me to call public doubts and scruples of conscience, by which I can only regard as symptoms of fear and dissimulation? You can have no idea of 'such breast relations so nearly connected'—and 'the often most very delicate and intricate'—and again, 'the matter has never been fully explained to you'—and, moreover, 'if you are expected to take an active part in the business, it must be when you are honoured with my full and unreserved confidence, otherwise how could you be of the use to me which I might require?' Such are your expressions."

"Now, as to scruples of conscience about my relations, and so forth, all that has blown by without much mischief, and certainly is not likely to occur again. Besides, did you never hear of friends quarrelling before? And are they not to exercise the usual privileges of gentlemen when they do? Moreover, how am I to know that this plaguy fellow is actually related to me?—They say it is a wise child knows its own father, and I cannot be expected wise enough to know to a certainty my father's son.—So much for relationship.—Then, as to full and unreserved confidence—why Harry, this is just as if I were to ask you to look at a watch, and tell what it was o'clock, and you were to reply, that truly you could not inform me, because you had not examined the quips, the counter-balance, the wheels, and the whole internal machinery of the little timepiece.—But the upshot of the whole is this. Harry Jekyl, who is as sharp a fellow as any other, thinks he has his friend Lord Etherington at a dead lock, and that he knows already so much of the said noble lord's history as to oblige his lordship to tell him the whole. And perhaps he not unreasonably concludes, that the custody of a whole secret is more creditable, and probably more lucrative, than that of a half one; and, in short,—he is resolved to make the most of the cards in his hand. Another, mine honest Harry, would take the trouble to recall to your mind past times and circumstances, and conclude with expressing an humble opinion, that if Harry Jekyl were asked now to do any service for the noble lord aforesaid, Harry had got his reward in his pocket aforehand. But I do not argue thus, because I would rather be leagued with a friend who assists me with a view to future profit, than from respect to benefits already received. The first lies like the fox's scent when on his last legs, increasing every moment; the other is a back-scent, growing colder the longer you follow it, until at last it becomes impossible to puzzle it out. I will therefore, submit to circumstances, and tell you the whole story, though somewhat tedious, in hopes that I can conclude with such a trail as you will open upon breast-high.

"Thus then it was.—Francis, fifth Earl of Etherington, and my much-honoured father, was what is called a very eccentric man—that is, he was neither a wise man nor a fool—had too much sense to walk into a well, and yet in some of the furious fits which he was visited with, I have seen him quite mad enough to throw any one else into it.—Men said there was a lurking insanity—but it is an ill bird, &c., and I will say no more about it. This shatterbrained peer was, on other respects, a handsome accomplished man, with an expression somewhat haughty, yet singularly pleasing when he chose it—a man, in short, who might push his fortune with the fair sex.

"Lord Etherington, such as I have described him, being upon his travels in France, formed an attachment of the heart—ay, and some have pretended, of the hand also, with a certain beautiful orphan, Marie de Martigny. Of this union is said to have sprung (for I am determined not to be certain on that point) that most incommodious person, Francis Tyrrel, as he calls himself, but as I would rather call him, Francis Martigny; the latter suiting my views, as perhaps the former name agrees better with his pretensions. Now, I am too good a son to subscribe to the alleged regularity of the marriage between my right honourable and very good lord father, because my said right honourable and very good lord did, on his return to England, become wedded in the face of the church, to my very affectionate and well-endowed mother, an Bulmer of Bulmer-hall, from which happy union sprung I, Francis Valentine Bulmer Tyrrel, lawful inheritor of my father and mother's joint estates, as I was the proud possessor of their ancient names. But the noble and wealthy pair, though blessed with such a pledge of love as myself, lived mighty ill together, and the rather, when my right honourable father, sending for this other Sosia, this unlucky Francis Tyrrel, senior, from France, insisted, in the face of propriety, that he should reside in his house, and share, in all respects, in the opportunities of education which the real Sosia, Francis Valentine Bulmer Tyrrel, then commonly called Lord Oakendale, hath enjoyed in such an uncommon degree.

"Various were the matrimonial quarrels which rose between the honoured lord and lady, in consequence of this unseemly conjunction of the legitimate and illegitimate; and to these, we, the subjects of the dispute, were sometimes very properly, as well as decorously, made the witnesses. On one occasion, my right honourable mother, who was a free spoken lady, found the language of her own rank quite inadequate to express the strength of her generous feelings, and borrowing from the vulgar two emphatic words, applied them to Marie de Martigny, and her son Francis Tyrrel. Never did Earl that ever wore coronet fly to a pitch of more uncontrollable rage, than did my right honourable father: and in the ardour of his reply, he adopted my mother's phraseology, to inform her, that if there was a whore and bastard connected with his house, it was herself and her brat.

"I was even then a sharp little fellow, and was incredibly struck with the communication, which, in this hour of ungovernable irritation, had escaped my right honourable father. It is true, he instantly gathered himself up again; and, he perhaps recollecting such a word as bigamy, and my mother, on her side, considering the consequences of such a thing as a descent from the Countess of Etherington into Mrs. Bulmer, neither wife, maid, nor widow, there was an apparent reconciliation between them, which lasted for some time. But the speech remained deeply imprinted on my remembrance; the more so, that once, when I was exerting over my friend Francis Tyrrel, the authority of a legitimate brother, and Lord Oakendale, old Cecil, my father's confidential valet, was so much scandalized, as to intimate a possibility that we might one day change conditions. These two accidental communications seemed to me a key to certain long lectures, with which my father used to regale us boys, but me in particular, upon the extreme mutability of human affairs,—the disappointment of the best-grounded hopes and expectations,—and the necessity of being so accomplished in all useful branches of knowledge, as might, in case of accidents, supply any defalcation in our rank and fortune;—as if any art or science could make amends for the loss of an Earldom, and twelve thousand a-year! All this prosing seemed to my anxious mind designed to prepare me for some unfortunate change; and when I was old enough to make such private inquiries as lay in my power, I became still more persuaded that my right honourable father nourished some thoughts of making an honest woman of Marie de Martigny, and a legitimate elder brother of Francis, after his death at least, if not during his life. I was the more convinced of this, when a little affair, which I chanced to have with the daughter of my Tu—, drew down my father's wrath upon me in great abundance, and occasioned my being banished to Scotland, along with my brother, under a very poor allowance, without introductions, except to one steady, or call it rusty, old Professor, and with the charge that I should not assume the title of Lord Oakendale, but content myself with my maternal grandfather's name of Valentine Bulmer, that of Francis Tyrrel being pre-occupied.

"Upon this occasion, notwithstanding the fear which I entertained of my father's passionate temper, I did venture to say, that since I was to resign my title, I thought I had a right to keep my family name, and that my brother might take his mother's. I wish you had seen the look of rage with which my father regarded me when I gave him this spirited hint. 'Thou art,' he said, and paused, as if to find out the bitterest epithet to supply the blank—'thou art thy mother's child, and her perfect picture'—(this seemed the severest reproach that occurred to him.)—'Bear her name then, and bear it with patience and in secrecy; or, I here give you my word, you shall never bear another the whole days of your life.' This sealed my mouth with a witness; and then, in allusion to my flirtation with the daughter of my Tu— afore-said, he enlarged on the folly and iniquity of private marriages, warned me that in the country I was going to, the matrimonial noose often lies hid under flowers, and that folks find it twitched round their neck when they least expect such a cravat; assured me, that he had very particular views for settling Francis and me in life, and that he would forgive neither of us who should, by any such rash entanglements, render them unavailing.

"The last minatory admonition was the more tolerable, that my rival had his share of it; and so we were bundled off to Scotland, coupled up like two pointers in a dog-cart, and— I can speak for one at least—with much the same uncordial feelings towards each other. I often, indeed, detected Francis looking at me with a singular expression, as of pity and anxiety, and once or twice he seemed disposed to enter on something respecting the situation in which we stood towards each other; but I felt no desire to encourage his confidence. Mean time, as we were called, by our father's directions, not brother's but cousins, so we came to bear towards each other the habits of companionship, though scarcely of friendship. What Francis thought, I know not; for my part, I must confess, that I lay by on the watch for some opportunity when I might mend my own situation with my father, though at the prejudice of my rival. And Fortune, while she seemed to prevent such an opportunity, involved us both in one of the strangest and most entangled mazes that her capricious divinityship ever wove, and out of which I am even now struggling, by sleight or force, to extricate myself. I can hardly help wondering, even yet, at the odd conjunction, which has produced such an intricacy of complicated incidents.

"My father was a great sportsman, and Francis and I had both inherited his taste for field-sports; but I in a keener and more ecstatic degree. Edinburgh, which is a tolerable residence in winter and spring, becomes disagreeable in summer, and in autumn is the most melancholy sojourn that ever poor mortals were condemned to. No public places are open, no inhabitant of any consideration remains in the town; those who cannot get away, hide themselves in obscure corners, as if ashamed to be seen in the streets.—The gentry go to their country-houses—the citizens to their sea-bathing quarters—the lawyers to their circuits—the writers to visit their country clients—and all the world to the moors to shoot grouse. We, who felt the indignity of remaining in town during this deserted season, obtained, with some difficulty, permission from the Earl to betake ourselves to any obscure corner, and shoot grouse, if we could get leave to do so on our general character of English students at the University of Edinburgh, without quoting any thing more.

"The first year of our banishment we went to the neighbourhood of the Highlands; but finding our sport interrupted by gamekeepers and their gillies, on the second occasion we established ourselves at this little village of St. Ronan's, where there were then no Spa, no fine people, no card tables, no quizzes, excepting the old quiz of a landlady with whom we lodged. We found the place much to our mind; the old landlady had interest with some old fellow, agent of a non-residing nobleman, who gave us permission to sport over his moors, of which I availed myself keenly, and Francis with more moderation. He was, indeed, of a grave musing sort of habit, and often preferred solitary walks, in the wild and beautiful scenery with which the village is surrounded, to the use of the gun. He was attached to fishing, moreover, that dullest of human amusements, and this also tended to keep us considerably apart. This gave me rather pleasure than concern;—not that I hated Francis at that time; nay, not that I greatly disliked his society; but merely because it was unpleasant to be always with one, whose fortunes I looked upon as standing in direct opposition to my own. I also rather despised the indifference about sport, which indeed seemed to grow upon him; but my gentleman had better taste than I was aware of. If he sought no grouse on the hill, he had flushed a pheasant in the wood.

"Clara Mowbray, daughter of the Lord of the more picturesque than wealthy domain of St. Ronan's, was at that time scarce sixteen years old, and as wild and beautiful a woodland nymph as the imagination can fancy—simple as a child in all that concerned the world and its ways, acute as a needle in every point of knowledge which she had found an opportunity of becoming acquainted with; fearing harm from no one, and with a lively and natural strain of wit, which brought amusement and gayety wherever she came. Her motions were under no restraint, save that of her own inclination; for her father, though a cross, peevish, old man, was confined to his chair with the gout, and her only companion, a girl of somewhat inferior caste, bred up in the utmost deference to Miss Mowbray's fancies, served for company indeed in her strolls through the wild country on foot and horseback, but never thought of interfering with her will and pleasure.

"The extreme loneliness of the country, (at that time,) and the simplicity of its inhabitants, seemed to render these excursions perfectly safe. Francis, happy dog, became the companion of the damisels on such occasions through the following accident. Miss Mowbray had dressed herself and her companion like country wenches, with a view to surprise the family of one of their better sort of farmers. They had accomplished their purpose greatly to their satisfaction, and were lying home after sunset, when they were encountered by a country fellow—a sort of Harry Jekyl in his way—who, being equipped with a glass or two of whisky, saw not the nobility of blood through her disguise, and accosted the daughter of a hundred sires as he would have done a ewe-maid. Miss Mowbray remonstrated—her companion screamed—up came cousin Francis with a fowling-piece on his shoulder, and soon put the silvan to flight.

"This was the beginning of an acquaintance, which had gone great lengths before I found it out. Their Clara, it seems, found it safer to roam in the woods with an escort than alone, and my studious and sentimental relative was almost her constant companion. At their age, it was likely that some time might elapse ere they came to understand each other; but confidence and intimacy was established between them ere I heard of their amour.

"And here, Harry, I must pause till next morning, and send you the conclusion under a separate cover. The rap which I had over the elbow the other day, is still tingling at the end of my fingers, and you must not be critical with my manuscript."

CHAPTER XXVI.

LETTER CONTINUED.

—Must I then ravel out My weaved up follies?—SHAKESPEARE

"I RESUME my pen, Harry, to mention what, attempting to describe my surprise, that Francis, compelled by circumstances, made me the confidant of his love-intrigue. My grave cousin in love, at very much in the mind of approaching the period, verge of clandestine marriage—he who used ever now and then, not much to the improvement of my cordial regard, to lecture me upon filial duty, just on the point of slipping the bridle himself! I do not for my life tell whether surprise, or a feeling of mischievous satisfaction, was predominant. I tried to talk to him as he used to talk to me; but I had not the gift of persuasion, or he the power of understanding the words of wisdom. He insisted our situation was different—that his unhappy birth, as he termed it, freed him at least from dependence on his father's absolute will—that he had, by bequest from some relative of his mother, a moderate competence, which Miss Mowbray had consented to share with him;—a fine, that he desired not my counsel but my assistance. A moment's consideration convinced me, that I should be unkind, not to him only, but to myself, unless I gave him all the backing I could in this most dutiful scheme. I recollected our right honorable father's denunciations against Scottish marriages, and secret marriages of all sorts—denunciations perhaps not the less vehement, that he might feel some secret prick of conscience on the subject himself. I remembered that my grave brother had always been a favourite, and I forgot not—how was it possible I could forget—those ominous expressions which intimated a possibility of the hereditary estate and honours being transferred to the elder, instead of the younger son. Now, it required no conjuring to foresee, that should Francis commit this inexpiable crime of secretly allying himself with a Scottish beauty, our sire would lose all wish to accomplish such a transference in his favour; and while my brother's merits were altogether obscured by such an unpardonable act of disobedience, my own, no longer overshadowed by prejudice or partiality, would shine forth in all their natural brilliancy. These considerations, which flashed on me with the rapidity of lightning, induced me to consent to hold Frank's back-hand during the perilous game he proposed to play. I had only to take care that my own share in the matter should not be so prominent as to attract my father's attention; and this I was little afraid of, for his wrath was usually of that vehement and forcible character, which, like lightning, is attracted to one single point, there bursting with violence as undivided as it was uncontrollable.

"I soon found the lovers needed my assistance more than I could have supposed; for they were absolute novices in any sort of intrigue, which to me seemed as easy and natural as lying. Francis had been detected by some tattling spy in his walks with Clara, and the news had been carried to old Mowbray, who was greatly incensed at his daughter, though little knowing that her crime was greater than admitting an unknown English student to form a personal acquaintance with her. He prohibited farther intercourse—resolved, in justice-of-peace phrase, to rid the country of us; and, prudently sinking all mention of his daughter's delinquency, commenced an action against Francis, under pretext of punishing him as an encroacher upon his gaine, but in reality to scare him from the neighbourhood. His person was particularly described to all the keepers and satellites about Shaws-Castle, and any personal intercourse betwixt him and Clara became impossible, except under the most desperate risks. Nay, such was their alarm, that Master Francis thought it prudent, for Miss Mowbray's sake, to withdraw as far as a town called Marchthorn, and there to conceal himself, maintaining his intercourse with Clara only by letter.

"It was then I became the sheet-anchor of the hope of the lovers; it was then my early dexterity and powers of contrivance were first put to the test; and it would be too long to tell you in how many shapes, and by how many contrivances, I acted as agent, letter-carrier, and go-between, to maintain the intercourse of these separated turtles. I have had a good deal of trouble in that way on my own account, but never half so much as I took on account of this brace of lovers. I scaled walls and swam rivers, set bloodhounds, quarterstaves, and blunderbusses at defiance; and, excepting the distant prospect of self-interest which I have hinted at, I was neither to have honour nor reward for my pains. I will own to you, that Clara Mowbray was so very beautiful—so absolutely confiding in her lover's friend—and thrown into such close intercourse with me, that there were times when I thought that, in conscience, she ought not to have scrupled to have contributed a mite to reward the faithful labourer. But then, she looked like purity itself; and I was such a novice at that time of day, that I did not know how it might have been possible for me to retreat, if I had made too bold an advance—and, in short, I thought it best to content myself with assisting true love to run smooth, in the hope that its course would assure me, in the long-run, an Earl's title, and an Earl's fortune.

"Nothing was, therefore, ventured on my part which could raise suspicion, and, as the confidential friend of the lovers, I prepared every thing for their secret marriage. The pastor of the parish agreed to perform the ceremony, prevailed upon by an argument which I used to him, and which Clara, had she guessed would have little thanked me for. I led the honest man to believe, that in declining to do his office, he might prevent a too successful lover from doing justice to a betrayed maiden; and the parson, who, I found, had a spice of romance in his disposition, relieved, under such pressing circumstances, to do them the kind office of binding them together, although the consequence might be a charge of irregularity against himself. Old Mowbray was much confined to his room, his daughter less watched since Frank had removed from the neighbourhood—the brother (which, by the by, I should have said before) not then in the country—and it was settled that the lovers should meet at the Old Kirk of Saint Ronan's when the twilight became deep, and go off in a chaise for England as soon as the ceremony was performed.

"When all this was arranged, save the actual appointment of the day, you cannot conceive the happiness and the gratitude of my sage brother. He looked upon himself as approaching to the seventh heaven, instead of losing his chance of a good fortune, and encumbering himself at nineteen with a wife, and all the probabilities of narrow circumstances, and an increasing family. Though so much younger myself, I could not help wondering at his extreme want of knowledge of the world, and feeling ashamed that I had ever allowed him to take the airs of a tutor with me; and this conscious superiority supported me against the thrill of jealousy which always seized me when I thought of his carrying off the beautiful prize, which, without my address, he could never have made his own.—But at this important crisis, I had a letter from my father, which, by some accident, had long lain at our lodgings in Edinburgh; and then visited our former quarters in the Highlands; again returned to Edinburgh, and at length reached me at Marchthorn in a most critical time.

"It was in reply to a letter of mine, in which, among other matters, such as good boys send to their papas, descriptions of the country, accounts of studies, exercises, and so forth, I had, to fill up the sheet to a dutiful length, thrown in something about the family of St. Ronan's, in the neighbourhood of which I was writing. I had no idea what an effect the name would produce on the mind of my right honourable father, but his letter sufficiently expressed it. He charged me to cultivate the acquaintance of Mr. Mowbray as fast and as intimately as possible; and, if need were, to inform him candidly of our real character and situation in life. Wisely considering, at the same time, that his filial admonition might be neglected if not backed by some sufficient motive, his lordship frankly let me into the secret of my granduncle by the mother's side, Mr. S. Mowbray of Nettlewood's last will and testament, by which I saw, to my astonishment and alarm, that a large and fair estate was bequeathed to the eldest son and heir of the Earl of Etherington, on condition of his forming a matrimonial alliance with a lady of the house of Mowbray, of St. Ronan's.—Mercy of Heaven! how I stared! Here had I been making every preparation for wedding Francis to the very girl, whose hand would insure to myself wealth and independence!—And even the first loss, though great, was not likely to be the last. My father spoke of the marriage like a land-surveyor, but of the estate of Nettlewood like an impassioned lover. He seemed to dote on every acre of it, and dwelt on its contiguity to his own domains as a circumstance which rendered the union of the estates not desirable merely, but constituted an arrangement, pointed out by the hand of nature. And although he observed, that, on account of the youth of the parties, a treaty of marriage could not be immediately undertaken, it was yet clear he would approve at heart of any bold stroke which would abolish the interval of time that might otherwise intervene, ere Oakendale and Nettlewood became one property.

"Here, then, were shipwrecked my fair hopes. It was clear as sunshine, that a private marriage, unpardonable in the abstract, would become venial, nay, highly laudable, in my father's eyes, if it united his heir with Clara Mowbray; and if he really had, as my fears suggested, the means of establishing legitimacy on my brother's part, nothing was so likely to tempt him to use them, as the certainty that, by his doing so, Nettlewood and Oakendale would be united into one. The very catastrophe which I had prepared, as sure to exclude my rival from his father's favour, was thus likely, unless it could be prevented, to become a strong motive and argument for the Earl placing his rights above mine.

"I shut myself up in my bedroom; locked the door; read, and again read my father's letter; and, instead of giving way to idle passion, (beware of that, Harry, even in the most desperate circumstances,) I considered, with keen investigation, whether some remedy could not yet be found. To break off the match for the time, would have been easy—a little private information to Mr. Mowbray would have done that with a vengeance.—But then the treaty might be renewed under my father's auspices;—at all events, the share which I had taken in the intrigue between Clara and my brother, rendered it almost impossible for me to become a suitor in my own person.—Amid these per-never, I shall endeavour to answer them as well as I may.

Repent the past, said you?—Yes, Harry, I think I repent the past—that is, not quite in the parson's sense of repentance, which resembles yours when you have the headache, but as I would repent a hand at cards which I had played on false principles. I should have begun with the young lady—availed myself in a different manner of Monsieur Martigny's advice, and my own intimacy with her, and thus seduced him, if possible, in the damsel's affections.

The scheme I adopted, though there was, I think, a boldness and dexterity in it, was that of a nonchalance of premature genius, who could not calculate consequences. So much for repentance.—Do I not fear the future?—Harry, I will not cut your throat for supposing you to have put the question, but calmly assure you that I never feared any thing in my life. I was born without the sensation, I believe; at least, it is exactly unknown to me. When I felt that cursed steel pass across my breast, when I felt the pistol-bullet benumb my arm, I felt no more agitation than the bounce of a champagne-cork. But I would have you think that I am fool enough to risk life, trouble, and danger, (all of which, besides considerable expense, I am now prepared to encounter without some adequate motive,—and here it is.

From various quarters, hints, rumours, and surmises have reached me, that an attack will be made on my rank and status in society, which can only be the half of this fellow Martigny, (for I will not call him by his stolen name of Tyrrel.) Now, this I hold to be a breach of the paction betwixt us, by which—namely, by that which I am determined to esteem its meaning and purport—he was to leave my right durable father and me to settle our own matters without his interference, which amounted to a virtual annihilation of his rights, if the scoundrel ever had

Can he expect I am to resign my wife, and that it is a better thing, old Scrogie Mowbray's estate at Nettlewood, to gratify the humour of a fellow who has up claims to my title and whole property? No.

—! If he assails me in a point so important, I retaliate upon him in one where he will feel as acutely; and that he may depend upon.—And now, thinks you come upon me with a second edition of your grave remonstrances, about family feuds, unbecoming rencontres, offence to all the feelings of all the world, et cetera, et cetera, which you might usher in most delectably with the old stave about brethren holding together in unity. I will not stop to inquire, whether all these delicate apprehensions are on account of the Earl of Etherington, his safety, and his situation; or whether my friend Harry Jekyl be not considering how far his own interference with such a mighty business will be well taken at Head-quarters; I do, without pausing on that question. I shall bare—and briefly say, that you cannot be more sensible than I am of the madness of bringing matters to such extremity—I have no such intention. I assure you, that it is with no such purpose that I invite you here. Were I to challenge Martigny, he would refuse me a meeting; and all less ceremonious ways of arranging such an affair are quite old-fashioned.

It is true, at our first meeting, I was betrayed into a scrape I told you of—just as you may have shot at a shot at, for I think you are no downright hitter; a unpleasant when dashed within distance, by a sort of instinctive movement, without reflecting on the enormity you were about to commit. The truth is, there is an ignominious influence, which seems to pervade our house—passed as wildfire through my father's veins—of the kind, to me in full view. I every now and then feel it as a hot iron. There was my father's and my mother's portion was I had time to think about the matter. But I will be on my guard; I know the new enemy as I cannot give any provocation from him, or the contrary.

I must confess the whole business was wronging it a little. It is the first account of the matter in the Gazette, where, mentioning a woman, I am certain would never have been first at me, and the pistol went off as it did. But you know me well enough to be assured, that I will never be again in the scrape of attacking an unresisting antagonist, were he ten times my brother.

Then, as to this long tirade about hating my brother—Harry, I do not hate him more than the first-born of Egypt are in general hated by those whom they exclude from entailed estates, and so forth—not one landed man in twenty of us that is not hated by his younger brothers, to the extent of wishing him quiet in his grave, as an abominable stumbling-block in their path of life and so far only do I hate Monsieur Martigny. But for the rest, I rather like him as otherwise; and would he but die, would give my frank consent to his being canonized; and while he lives, I am not desirous that he should be exposed to any temptation from rank and riches, those main obstacles to the self-denying course of life, by which the odour of sanctity is attained.

Here again you break in with your impertinent queries—If I have no purpose of quarrelling personally with Martigny, why do I come into collision with him at all?—why not abide by the treaty of March-thorn, and remain in England, without again approaching St. Ronan's or claiming my maiden bride?

Have I not told you, I want him to cease all threatened attempts upon my fortune and dignity? Have I not told you, that I want to claim my wife, Clara Mowbray, and my estate of Nettlewood, fairly won by marrying her?—And, to let you into the whole secret, though Clara is a very pretty woman, yet she goes for so little in the transaction with me, her unimpassioned bridegroom, that I hope to make some relaxation of my rights over her the means of obtaining the concessions which I think most important.

I will not deny, that an aversion to awakening bustle, and encountering reproach, has made me so slow in looking after my interest, that the period will shortly expire, within which I ought, by old Scrogie Mowbray's will, to qualify myself for becoming his heir, by being the accepted husband of Miss Mowbray of St. Ronan's. Time was—time is—and, if I catch it not by the forelock as it passes, time will be no more—Nettlewood will be forfeited—and if I have in addition a lawsuit for my title, and for Oakendale, I run a risk of being altogether capotted. I must, therefore, act at all risks, and act with vigour—and this is the general plan of my campaign, subject always to be altered according to circumstances. I have obtained—I may say purchased—Mowbray's consent to address his sister. I have this advantage, that if she agrees to take me, she will for ever put a stop to all disagreeable reports and recollections, founded on her former conduct. In that case I secure the Nettlewood property, and am ready to wage war for my paternal estate. Indeed, I firmly believe, that should this happy consummation take place, Monsieur Martigny will be too much heart-broken to make further fight, but will even throw helve after hatchet, and run to hide himself, after the fashion of a true lover, in some desert beyond seas.

But supposing the lady has the bad taste to be obstinate, and will none of me. I still think that her happiness, or her peace of mind, will be as dear to Martigny, as Gibraltar is to the Spaniards, and that he will sacrifice a great deal to induce me to give up my pretensions. Now, I shall want some one to act as my agent in communicating with this fellow; for I will not deny that my old appetite for cutting his throat may awaken suddenly, were I to hold personal intercourse with him. Come thou, therefore, without delay, and hold my back-hand—Come, for you know me, and that I never left a kindness unrequited. To be specific, you shall have means to raise off a certain inconvenient mortgage, without troubling the tribe of leeches, if you will be but true to me in this matter—Come, therefore, without any apologies or further delay. There shall, I say, be no word, neither be risk or offence in the part of the drama which I intend to commit to your charge.

Talking of the drama, we had a most remarkable scene at a sort of bastard theatricals at Mr. Mowbray's rag-gnawed mansion. There were some things worth noticing—One, that I lost all the courage or what I prided myself, and fairly fled from the scene, when I presented myself before Miss Clara Mowbray, who camp to the peak. And upon this I pray you to remark, that I am a person of singular delicacy and modesty, instead of being the Drawcanter and Dareddevil that you would make of me. The other memorable is of a more delicate nature, respecting the conduct of a certain fair lady, who seemed determined to fling herself at my head. There is a wonderful degree of freemasonry among us folk of spirit, and it is astonishing how soon we can place ourselves on a footing with neglected wives and discontented daughters. If you come not soon, one of the rewards held out to you in my former letter, will certainly not be forthcoming. No schoolboy keeps gingerbread for his comrade, without feeling a desire to nibble at it; and, if you appear not to look after your own interest, say you had fair warning. For my own part, I am rather embarrassed than gratified by the prospect of such an essay, when I have on the tapis another of a different nature. Thus anxious I will explain at meeting.

"Thus finishes my long communication. If my motives of action do not appear explicit, think in what a maze fortune has involved me, and how much must necessarily depend on the chapter of accidents.

"Yesterday I may be said to have opened my steps, for I presented myself before Clara. I had no very flattering reception—that was of little consequence, for I did not expect one. By alarming her fears, I made an impression then far, that she acquiesced in my appearing before her as her brother's guest, and this is no small point gained. She will become accustomed to look on me, and will remember with less bitterness the trick which I played her formerly; while I, on the other hand, by a similar piece of play, will get over certain awkward feelings with which I have been communally visited whenever I look upon her.—Adieu! Health and brotherhood.

"Thine,
"ETHERINGTON.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE REPLY.

Thus begins a previous burden, greatly past, Fits and unfits—how then it explains out!—Old Play.

"I HAVE received your two long letters, my dear Etherington, with equal surprise and interest; for what I knew of your Scottish adventures before, was by no means sufficient to prepare me for a statement so perversely complicated. The Ignis Fatuus which, you say, governed your father, seems to have ruled the fortunes of your whole house, there is so much eccentricity in all that you have told me. But n'importe, Etherington, you were my friend—you held me up when I was completely broken down; and, whatever you may think, my services are at your command much more from reflections on the past, than hopes for the future. I am no speech-maker, but thus you may rely on while I continue to be Harry Jekyll. You have deserved some love at my hands, Etherington, and you have it.

"Perhaps I love you the better since your perplexities have become known to me; for, my dear Etherington, you were before too much an object of envy to be entirely an object of affection. What a happy fellow! was the song of all who named you. Rank, and a fortune to maintain it—luck sufficient to repair all the waste that you could make in your income, and still to back that luck, or supply it, should it for a moment fail you.—The cards turning up as if to your wish—the dice rolling, it almost seemed at your wink—it was rather your look than the touch of your cue that sent the ball into the pocket. You seemed to have fortune in chains, and a man of less honour would have been almost suspected of helping his luck by a little art.—You won every bet; and the instant that you were interested, one might have named the winning horse—it was always that which you were to give most by.—You never held out your purse but the game went down—and then the women!—with faces, manners, persons, and, above all, your vague—what wild work have you made among them!—Good heaven! and have you had the sword hanging over your head by a horsehair all this while!—Has your rank been doubtful? Your fortune unsettled?—And your luck, so constant in every thing else, has that, as well as your predominant influence with the women failed you, when you wished to form a connexion for life, and when the case of your fortune required you to do so?—Etherington, I am astonished!—The Mowbray arrange I always thought an inconvenient one, as well as the quarrel with this same Tyrrel, or Martigny; but I was far from guessing the complicated nature of your perplexities.

"But I must not run on in a manner, which though it relieves my own marvellous mind, cannot be very pleasant to you. Enough, I look on my obligations to you as more light to be borne, now I have some chance of repaying them to a certain extent; but, even were the full debt paid, I would remain as much attached to you as ever. It is your friend who speaks, Etherington, and, if he offers his advice in somewhat plain language, do not, I entreat you, suppose that your confidence has encouraged an officious familiarity, but consider me as one who, in a weighty matter, writes plainly, to avoid the least chance of misconstruction.

"Etherington, your conduct hitherto has resembled any thing rather than the coolness and judgment which are so peculiarly your own when you choose to display them. I pass over the masquerade of your marriage—it was a boy's trick, which could hardly have availed you much, even if successful; for what sort of a wife would you have acquired, had this same Clara Mowbray proved willing to have accepted the change which you had put upon her, and transferred herself, without repugnance, from one bridegroom to another?—Poor as I am, I know that neither Kettlewood nor Oakendale should have bribed me to marry such a — I cannot depreciously fill up the blank.

"Neither, my dear Etherington, can I forgive you the trick you put on the clergyman, in whom you destroyed the poor girl's character to induce her to consent to perform the ceremony, and have thereby perhaps fixed an indelible stain on her life—this was not a few ruses de guerre.—As it is, you have taken little by your stratagem—unless, what it should be difficult for the young lady to prove its imposition put upon her—for that being admitted, the marriage certainly goes for nothing. At least, do only use you can make of it, would be to drive us into a more formal union, for fear of having the whole unpleasant discussion brought into a court of law; and in this, with all the advantages you possess, joined to your own arts of persuasion, and her brother's influence, I should think you very likely to succeed. All women are necessarily the slaves of their reputation. I have known some to lay down their virtue to preserve their character, which, after all, only the shadow of it. I therefore would not conceive it difficult for Clara Mowbray to persuade herself to become a countess, rather than be the topic of conversation for all Britain, while a lawsuit between you is in dependence; and that may be for the greater part of both your lives.

"But, in Miss Mowbray's state of mind, a long require time to bring her to such a conclusion, and I fear you will be thwarted in your operations by your rival—I will not offend you by calling her my rival. Now, it is here that I think with persons; and be of some use to you, under the above condition, that there shall be no thoughts of further combat taking place between you. However, you may have smoothed over your rencontre to yourself, there is no doubt that the public would have regarded my accident which might have befallen on that occasion as a crime of the deepest dye, and had the law followed it with the most severe punishment. And for all that I have said of my miserable disposition, I would fear stop short on this side of the pole—my neck is too long already. What a fellow Etherington, you must be ruled by common sense matter. I detect your heart to this point, and the line of your latter, even when you wish to be y grateful and devoted Henry Jexi, has one, which seems to be exactly without on. Why, thou suspicious creature, have ed a hundred times that I repeat, without h rencontre, and am determined to wait and be on my guard in future—And what me upon me, with your long drawn sword and punishment, and fratricide, and to deal with an argument: as a boy, who t have he shoots, which he never thinks has fired the second barrel into me. ow you would have been for a lawyer: ou would have held forth upon the pite- until the poor bothered judge was almost ecide against justice, that he might be you. One would think, to read your communication, that you had yourself discovered the propriety of acting as a negotiator, and the reasons which might, in the course of such a treaty, be urged with advantage to induce this fellow to leave the country—Why, this is the very course chalked out in my last letter! You are bolder than the boldest gipsy, for you not only steal my ideas, and disfigure them that they may pass for yours, but you have the assurance to come a-begging with them to the door of the original parent! No man like you for stealing other men's inventions, and cooking them up in your own way. However, Harry, bating a little self-conceit and assumption, thou art an honest fellow as ever man put faith in—clever, too, in your own style, though not quite the genius you would fain pass for.—Come on thine own terms, and come as speedily as thou canst. I do not reckon the promise I made the less binding, that you very generously make no allusion to it.

"Thine,
"ETHERINGTON.

"P. S. One single caution I must add—do not mention my name to any one at Harrowgate, or your prospect of meeting me, or the route which you are about to take. On the purpose of your journey, it is unnecessary to recommend silence. I know not whether such doubts are natural to all who have secret measures to pursue, or whether nature has given me an unusual share of anxious suspicion; but I cannot divest myself of the idea, that I am closely watched by some one whom I cannot discover. Although I concealed my purpose of coming hither from all mankind but you, whom I do not for an instant suspect of blabbing, yet it was known to this Mar- tigny, and he is down here before me. Again, I said not a word—gave not a hint to any one of my views towards Clara, yet the tattling people here had spread a report of a marriage depending between us, even before I could make the motion to her brother. To be sure, in such society there is nothing talked of but marrying and giving in marriage; and this, which alarms me, as connected with my own private purposes, may be a bare rumour, arising out of the gossip of the place—Yet I feel like the poor woman in the old story, who felt herself watched by an eye that gazed upon her from behind the tapestry.

"I should have told you in my last, that I had been recognized at a public entertainment by the old clergyman, who pronounced the matrimonial blessing on Clara and me, nearly eight years ago. He insisted upon addressing me by the name of Valentine Bulmer, under which I was then best known. It did not suit me at present to put me into my confidence, so I cut him Harry, as I would an old peer. The task was the less difficult, that I had to do with one of the most absent-minded men that ever graced this fair globe. I really believe he thought he was engaged in some transaction with a friend, and that he had better be really seen me before. Your post, however, has told me about what I was less than formerly acquainted with. I have a good notion now, after all, that I was not so much mistaken as I formerly thought I was in exaggerating it was a secret. Perhaps of Martigny's fact I suppose. I am sure he has done me wrong, and I shall be glad to see him.

"Here you have a promise, Harry, longer than the other, but I shall be glad to see him.

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE FIGHT.

As I was the only one of my kind
Who had been so long in the land
As I was the only one of my kind
Who had been so long in the land

It had been settled by all who had the power to make consideration, that the fight, Harry, was to be made soon quarrel with his landlady, Mrs. Dods, and become impatient of his residence at St. Ronan's. A man so kind to himself, and so inquisitive about the affairs of others, could have, it was supposed, a limited sphere for gratification either of his tastes or of his curiosity, in the Aultoun of St. Ronan's: and many a time the precise day and hour of his departure were fixed by the idlers at the Spa. But still old Touchwood appeared amongst them when the weather permitted, with his nut-brown visage, his throat carefully wrapped up in an immense Indian kerchief, and his gold-headed cane, which he never failed to carry over his shoulder; his short, but stout limbs, and his active step, showing plainly that he bore it rather as a badge of dignity than a means of support. There he stood, answering shortly and gruffly to all questions proposed to him, and making his remarks aloud upon the company, with great indifference as to the offence which might be taken; and as soon as the ancient priestess had handed him his glass of the salutiferous water, turned on his heel with a brief good-morning, and either marched back to hide himself in the Manse, with his cronny Mr. Cargill, or to engage in some hobby-horsical pursuit connected with his neighbours in the Aultoun.

The truth was, that the honest gentleman having, so far as Mrs. Dods would permit, put matters to rights within her residence, wisely abstained from pushing his innovations any farther, aware that it is not every stone which is capable of receiving the last degree of polish. He next set himself about putting Mr. Cargill's house into order; and without leave asked or given by that reverend gentleman, he actually accomplished as wonderful a reformation in the Manse, as could have been effected by a benevolent Brownie. The floors were sometimes swept—the carpets were sometimes shaken—the plates and dishes were cleaner—there was tea and sugar in the tea-chest, and a joint of meat at proper times was to be found in the larder. The elder maid-servant wore a good stuff gown—the younger snooded up her hair, and now went about the house a damsel so trig and neat, that some said she was too handsome for the service of a bachelor divine; and others, that they saw no business so old a fool as the Nabob had to be meddling with a lassie's busking. But for such evil bruits Mr. Touchwood cared not, even if he happened to hear of them, which was very doubtful. Add to all these changes, that the garden was weeded, and the glebe was regularly laboured.

The talisman by which all this desirable alteration was wrought, consisted partly in small presents, partly in constant attention. The liberality of the singular old gentleman gave him a perfect right to scold when he saw things wrong; the domestics, who had fallen into total sloth and indifference, began to exert themselves under Mr. Touchwood's new system of rewards and surveillance; and the minister, half unconscious of the cause, reaped the advantage of the exertions of his busy friend. Sometimes he lifted his head, when he heard workmen thumping and bouncing in the neighbourhood of his study, and demanded the meaning of the clatter which annoyed him; but on receiving for answer that it was by order of Mr. Touchwood, he resumed his labours, under the persuasion that all was well.

But even, the Augean task of putting the Manse in order, did not satisfy the gigantic activity of Mr. Touchwood. He aspired to universal dominion in the Aultoun of St. Ronan's; and, like most men of an ardent temper, he contrived, in a great measure, to possess himself of the authority which he longed after. Then was there war waged by him with all the petty, but perpetual nuisances, which infest a Scottish town of the old stamp—then was the hereditary dunghill, which had reeked before the window of the cottage for fourscore years, transported behind the house—then was the broken wheelbarrow, or unserviceable cart, removed out of the footpath—the old hat, or blue petticoat, taken from the window into which it had been stuffed, to “expel the winter's flaw,” was consigned to the gutter, and its place supplied by good perspicuous glass. The means by which such reformation was effected, were the same as resorted to in the Manse—money and admonition. The latter given alone would have met little attention—perhaps would have provoked opposition—but softened and sweetened by a little present to assist the reform recommended, it sunk into the hearts of the hearers, and in general overcame their objections. Besides, an opinion of the Nabob's wealth was high among the villagers; and an idea prevailed amongst them, that, notwithstanding his keeping no servants or equipage, he was able to purchase, if he pleased, the land in the country. It was not grand carriages and fine liveries that made heavy purses, they rather helped to lighten them; and they said, who pretended to know what they were talking about, that old Turnpenny, and Mr. Bindloose to boot, would tell down more money on Mr. Touchwood's mere word, than upon the joint bond of half the fine folk at the Well. Such an opinion smoothed every thing before the path of one, who showed himself neither averse to give nor to lend; and it by no means diminished the reputation of his wealth, that in transactions of business he was not carelessly negligent of his interest, but plainly showed he understood the value of what he was parting with. Few, therefore, cared to withstand the humours of a whimsical old gentleman who had both the will and the means of obliging those disposed to comply with his fancies; and thus a singular stranger contrived, in the course of a brief space of days or weeks, to place the villagers more absolutely at his devotion, than they had been at the pleasure of any individual since their ancient lords had left the Aultoun. The power of the baron-bail himself, though the office was vested in the person of old Meiklewham, was a subordinate jurisdiction, compared to the voluntary allegiance which the inhabitants paid to Mr. Touchwood.

There were, however, recusants, who declined the authority thus set up amongst them, and, with the characteristic obstinacy of their countrymen, refused to hearken to the words of the stranger, whether they were for good or for evil. These men's dunghills were not removed, nor the stumbling-blocks taken from the footpath, where it passed the front of their houses. And it befell, that while Mr. Touchwood was most eager in abating the nuisances of the village, he was very nearly experienced a frequent fate of great reformers—that of losing his life by means of one of those enormities which as yet had subsisted in spite of all his efforts.

The Nabob finding his time after dinner hanging somewhat heavy on his hand, and the moon being tolerably bright, had, one harvest evening, sought his usual remedy for dispelling ennui by a walk to the Manse, where he was sure, that, if he could not succeed in engaging the minister himself in some disputation, he would at least find something in the establishment to animadvert upon and to restore to order.

Accordingly, he had taken the opportunity to lecture the younger of the minister's lasses upon the duty of wearing shoes and stockings; and, as his advice came fortified by a present of six pair of white cotton hose and two pair of stout leathern shoes, it was received, not with respect only, but with gratitude, and the chuck under the chin that rounded up the oration, while she opened the outer door for his honour, was acknowledged with a blush and a giggle. Nay, so far did Grizzy carry her sense of Mr. Touchwood's kindness, that, observing the moon was behind a cloud, she very carefully offered to escort him to the Cleikum Inn with a lantern, in case he should come to some harm by the gate. This the traveller's independent spirit scorned to listen to; and, having briefly assured her that he had walked the streets of Paris and of Madrid whole nights without such an accommodation, he stoutly strode off on his return to his lodgings.

An accident, however, befell him, which, unless the police of Madrid and Paris be belied, might have happened in either of those two splendid capitals as well as in the miserable Aultoun of St. Ronan's. Before the door of Saunders Jaup, a fever of some importance, “who held his land free, and cared as a bodle for any one,” yawned that odorous culrelept, in Scottish phrase, the jaw-hole; in other words, an uncovered common sewer. The local situation of this receptacle of filth was well known to Mr. Touchwood; for Saunders Jaup was at the very head of those who held out for the practices of their fathers, and still maintained those ancient and unsavoury customs which our traveller had in so many instances succeeded in abating. Guided, therefore, by his nose, the Nabob made a considerable circuit to avoid the displeasure and danger of passing his filthy puddle at the nearest, and by that means all upon Scylla as he sought to avoid Charybdis. In plain language, he approached so near the bank of the little rivulet, which in that place passed betwixt the footpath and the horseroad, that he lost his footing, and fell into the channel of the streamlet from a height of three or four feet. It was thought that the noise of his fall, or at least his call for assistance, must have been heard in the house of Saunders Jaup; but that honest person was, according to his own account, at that time engaged in the exercise of the evening; an excuse which passed current, although Saunders Jaup privately heard to allege, that the town would have been the quieter, "if the auld, meddling busy-body had bidden still in the burn for gude and a'."

But Fortune had provided better for poor Touch-ood, whose foibles, as they arose out of the most excellent motives, would have ill deserved so severe fate. A passenger, who heard him shout for help, ventured cautiously to the side of the bank, down which he had fallen; and, after ascertaining the nature of the ground as carefully as the darkness permitted, was at length, and not without some fort, enabled to assist him out of the channel of the rulet.

"Are you hurt materially?" said this good Samaritan to the object of his care.

"No—no—d—n it—no," said Touchwood, extremely angry at his disaster, and the cause of it. "Do you think I, who have been at the summit of Mount Thos, where the precipice sinks a thousand feet on the sea, care a farthing about such a fall as this is?"

But, as he spoke, he reeled, and his kind assistant caught him by the arm to prevent his falling.

"I fear you are more hurt than you suppose, sir," said the stranger: "permit me to go home along with me."

"With all my heart," said Touchwood; "for though impossible I can need help in such a foolish matter, yet I am equally obliged to you, friend; and if the leikum Inn be not out of your road, I will take your m so far, and thank you to the boot."

"It is much at your service, sir," said the stranger; indeed, I was thinking to lodge there for the night."

"I am glad to hear it," resumed Touchwood; "you will be my guest, and I will make them look after you in proper fashion - You seem to be a very civil sort of fellow, and I do not find your arm inconvenient - is the rheumatism makes me walk so ill - the pest all that have been in hot climates when they settle among these d-d fogs."

"Lean as hard and walk as slow as you will, sir," said the benevolent assistant—"this is a rough street."

"Yes, sir—and why is it rough?" answered Touch-ood. "Why, because the old pig-headed fool, saunders Jaup, will not allow it to be made smooth. here he sits, sir, and obstructs all rational improve-ment; and, if a man would not fall into his infernal strid gutter, and so become an abomination to him- self and odious to others, for his whole life to come, e runs the risk of breaking his neck, as I have done to-night."

"I am afraid, sir," said his companion. "you have fallen on the most dangerous side.--You remember wife's proverb, 'The more dirt, the less hurt.'"

"But why should there be either dirt or hurt in a well-regulated place?" answered Touchwood—"Why would not men be able to go about their affairs at night, in such a hamlet as this, without either endangering necks or noses?—Our Scottish magistrates are worth nothing, sir—nothing at all. Oh for a Turkish Pasha, now, to trounce the scoundrel—or the Mayor of Calcutta to bring him into his court—or were it but an English Justice of the Peace that is newly included in the commission, they would abate the villain's nuisance with a vengeance on him!—But here we are—this is the Cleikum Inn.—Hallo—hilloa—house!—Eppie Anderson!—Beenie Chambermaid!—boy Boots!—Mrs. Dods!—are you all of you asleep and dead?—Here have I been half murdered, and you let me stand hawling at the door!"

Eppie Anderson came with a light, and so did Beenie Chambermaid with another; but no sooner did they look upon the pair who stood in the porch under the huge sign that swung to and fro with heavy creaking, than Beenie screamed, flung away her candle, although a four in the pound, and in a newly japanned candlestick, and fled one way, while Eppie Anderson, echoing the yell, brandished her light round her head like a Bacchante flourishing her torch, and ran off in another direction.

"Ay—I must be a bloody spectacle," said Mr. Touchwood, letting himself fall heavily upon his assistant's shoulder, and wiping his face, which trickled with wet—"I did not think I had been so seriously hurt; but I find my weakness now—I must have lost much blood."

"I hope you are still mistaken," said the stranger; "but here lies the way to the kitchen—we shall find light there, since no one chooses to bring it to us."

He assisted the old gentleman into the kitchen, where a lamp, as well as a bright fire, was burning by the light of which he could easily discern that the supposed blood was only water of the rivulet, and, indeed, none of the cleanest, although much more so than the sufferer would have found it a little lower, where the stream is joined by the superfluities of Saunders Jaup's palladium. Relieved by his new friend's repeated assurances that such was the case, the Senior began to bustle up a little, and his companion, desirous to render him every assistance, went to the door of the kitchen to call for a basin and water. Just as he was about to open the door, the voice of Mrs. Dods was heard as she descended the stairs, in a tone of indignation by no means unusual to her, yet mingled at the same time with a few notes that sounded like unto the quaverings of consternation.

"Idle linniers—silly sluts—I'll warrant nane o' ye will ever see ony thing waur than yoursell, ye silly tawpries—Ghaist, indeed!—I'll warrant it's some idle dub-skelper frae the Waal, coming after some o' yoursell's on nae honest errand!—Ghaist, indeed!—Haud up the candle, John Ostler—I'se warrant it a two-handed ghaist, and the door left on the sneek. There's somebody in the kitchen—gang forward wi' the lantern, John Ostler."

At this critical moment the stranger opened the door of the kitchen, and beheld the Dame advancing at the head of her household troops. The ostler and humpbacked postilion, one bearing a stable-lantern and a hay-fork, the other a rushlight and a broom, constituted the advanced guard; Mrs. Dods herself formed the centre, talking loud and brandishing a pair of tongs; while the two maids, like troops not to be much trusted after their recent defeat, followed, cowering in the rear. But notwithstanding this admirable disposition, no sooner had the stranger shown his face, and pronounced the words, "Mrs. Dods!" than a panic seized the whole array. The advanced guard recoiled in consternation, the ostler upsetting Mrs. Dods in the confusion of his retreat; while the two maids, grappling with him in her retreat, secured him by the ears and hair, and they burst forth once again, to a hideous chorus. The two maids, however, after their former flight, and took refuge in the parlour, and shut the door of their bedroom, while the ostler, who had fled like the wind into the stable, and whose personal instinct began, in the extremity of his alarm, to saddle a horse.

Meanwhile, the guests were engaged in this combustion. "Please," said Mrs. Dods, above Mrs. Dods, and she gave a hearty slap on the back of the man to encourage the fellow. "What a fine time," "What a fine time," "What a fine time," all this senseless conversation.

and still shrank in her expectation, though in the very extremity of terror. "What is the reason that you should come and frighten a decent house, where you met nothing, when ye was in the body, but the height of civility?"

"And why should I frighten you, Mrs. Dods? or, in one word, what is the meaning of all this non-sensical terror?"

"Are not you," said Mrs. Dods, opening her eyes a little as she spoke, "the ghost of Francis Trel?"

"I am Francis Tyrral, unquestionably, my old friend."

"I heard it! I heard it!" answered the bonnet woman, reissuing into her agony; "and I think ye might be ashamed of yourself, that are a ghastly, and have no better to do than to frighten a poor old wife."

"On my word, I am no ghost, but a living man," answered Tyrral.

"Were ye no murdered then?" demanded Mrs. Dods, still in an uncertain voice, and only partially opening her eyes—"Are ye very sure ye wotna murdered?"

"Why, not that ever I heard of, certainly, dame," replied Tyrral.

"But I shall be murdered presently," said old Touchwood from the kitchen, where he had hitherto remained a mute auditor of this extraordinary scene—"I shall be murdered, unless you fetch me some water without delay."

"Coming, sir, coming," answered Dame Dods, her professional reply being so familiar to her as that of poor Francis's "anon, anon, sir." "As I live by honest reckonings," said she, fully collecting herself, and giving a glance of more composed temper at Tyrral. "I believe it is yourself, Master Frank, in blood and body after a—and are if I down go a proper scurvy to you two silly jacks that gaird me mak a bogle of you and a fule of myself! Ghastly! my catter, I tell them—If they had their heads as muckle on their work as on their daffing, they wad play us sic plunkies—it's the wanton stoid that ensues at the widdle strae—Ghastly! who e'er heard of ghosts in an honest house? Nobody need fear boggles that has a conscience void of offense.—But I am blithe that MacTurk heans murdered ye when a' is done, Master Francis."

"Come this way, Mother Dods, if you would not have me do a nuchaff!" exclaimed Touchwood, grasping a plate which stood on the dresser, as if he were about to leave it at the landlady, by way of recalling her attention.

"For the love of Heaven, dinna break it!" exclaimed the alarmed landlady, knowing that Touchwood's effervescence of impatience sometimes expended itself at the expense of her crockery, though it was afterwards liberally atoned for. "Lord, sir, are ye out of your wits!—it breaks a bot ye hae—God sake, put down the chreny plate and try your hand on the daff ware! it will just make as good a pogie—But, Lord haud a grip o' us! now I look at ye, what can hae come ower ye, and what sort of a plight are ye in! Wait till I fetch water and a towel!"

In fact, the miserable guise of her new lodger now overcame the dame's curiosity to inquire after the fate of her earlier acquaintance, and she gave her instant and exclusive attention to Mr. Touchwood, with many exclamations, while aiding him to perform the task of ablution and absterion. Her two fugitive hand-maidens had by this time returned to the kitchen, and endeavored to suppress a smuggled laugh at the recollection of their mistress's panic, by acting very efficiently in Mr. Touchwood's service. By dint of washing and drying, the token of the sabbie stains was at length removed, and the veteran became, with some difficulty, satisfied that he had been more shocked and frightened than hurt.

Tyrral, in the mean time, stood looking on with wonder, imagining that he beheld in the features which emerged from a mesh of mud, the countenance of an old friend. After the operation was ended, he could not help addressing himself to Mr. Touchwood, to demand whether he had not the pleasure to see a friend, to whom he had been obliged when at Smyrna, for some business respecting his money matters?

"Not worth speaking of—not worth speaking of," said Touchwood, hastily. "Glad to see you though—glad to see you—Yes, here I am; you will find me the same good-natured old fool that I was at Smyrna—never look how I am to get in money again—always laying it out. Never mind—it was written in my fate, as the Turk says—I will go up now and change my dress—you will sup with me when I come back—Mrs. Dods will toss us up something—a broiled fowl will be best, Mrs. Dods, with some mushrooms, and get us a jug of mulled wine—plotta, as ye call it—to put the recollection of the old Presbyterian's common answer out of my head."

So saying, up stairs marched the traveller to his own apartment, while Tyrral, sitting upon a stool, was about to do the same.

Mr. Touchwood is in the blue room, Mrs. Dods I suppose I may take possession of the yellow one?

"Suppose nothing about the matter, Master Francis Trel, till ye tell me downright where ye hae been this time, and whether ye hae been murdered or no?"

"I think you may be pretty well satisfied of this, Mrs. Dods?"

"Truth! and as I am in a screw, and ye a gae me gree to look upon ye, are many days and weeks has been since I thought ye were rotten in the mud. And now to see ye standing before me hale and he, and crying for a bedroom like other folk!"

"One would almost swear," said Tyrral, "that you were sorry at my having come this again."

"It's no for that," replied Mrs. Dods, who was peculiarly ingenious in the mode of framing up, seeing what she conceived to be her grievance, "but is it no a queer thing for a decent man like yourself, Master Trel, to be leaving your lodging without a word spoken, and run put to a' the charges in seeking for your dead body, and yet not taking my business out of honest Master Duddie's hands, because he hand the contrivance of the bed o' better than I did? And then they hae put me at advertisement down at the Waal yonder, wi' a' the names at it, setting ye forth, Master Francis, as o' the greatest black guards unhanged; and when ye think, as to keep ye in a creditable house, if that the character ye got?"

"You may leave that to me, Mrs. Dods—I am you that matter shall be put to rights to your satisfaction; and I think, as long as we have house and other, you may take my word that I am not carrying the shelter of your roof for a single night, I shall ask it no longer, until my character is abundantly cleared. It was for that purpose chiefly I am back again."

"Come back again?" said Mrs. Dods—"I jakes ye made me start, Master Trel, and ye looking as pale, too. But I think," she added, straining the joke, "if ye were a ghost, many we are and all acquaintances, ye wadna wish to apud me, but would just walk drearily up and down do all castle we're, or maybe down at the last pair—there hae been awful things done at that bit of kirkyard—I wadna dinn like to look that way for Francis."

"I am much of your mind, mistress," said Tyrral with a sigh; "and, indeed, I do as one man up bis the apparitions you talk of, for, like them, are as little persons, I walk about scenes when my prime departed. But I speak ridder as ye do, Dods—the plain truth is, that I met with a man on the day I last left your house, the owner of the dreamt me at some distance from St. Ronan's this very day."

"Heigh, are, and ye were speaking of your wife that wadna wait a bit line, or send a bit message? Ye might hae thought folk wad be too busy enough about ye forby undertaking, jakes, as having hae to work for your dead body."

"I shall willingly pay all reasonable charges that my dear, deceased wife may have occasioned," said Tyrral, "and I assure you, since by all duty remaining for some time past at Marchmont, and partly from illness, and partly from business of a serious and particular nature."

"At Marchthorn!" exclaimed Dame Dods, "heard ever man the like o' that!—And where did ye put up in Marchthorn, an ane may mak' bauld to speer?"

"At the Black Bull," replied Tyrrel.

"Ay, that's auld Tam Lowrie's—a very decent man, Thamas—and a douce creditable house—nane of your flisk-ma-hoys—I am glad ye made choice of sic gude quarters, neighbour; for I am beginning to think ye are but a queer ane—ye look as if butter wadna melt in your mouth, but I sall warrant cheese no choke ye.—But I'll thank ye to gang your ways into the parlour, for I am no like to get muckle mair out o' ye, it's like; and ye are standing here just in the gate, when we hae the supper to dish."

Tyrrel, glad to be released from the examination to which his landlady's curiosity had without ceremony subjected him, walked into the parlour, where he was presently joined by Mr. Touchwood, newly attired, and in high spirits.

"Here comes our supper!" he exclaimed.—"Sit ye down, and let us see what Mrs. Dods has done for us.—I profess, mistress, your plottie is excellent, ever since I taught you to mix the spices in the right proportion."

"I am glad the plottie pleases ye, sir—but I think I kend gay weel how to make it before I saw your honour.—Maister Tirl can tell that, for mony a browst of it I hae brewed lang syne for him and the callant Valentine Bulmer."

This ill-timed observation extorted a groan from Tyrrel; but the traveller, running on with his own recollections, did not appear to notice his emotion.

"You are a conceited old woman," said Mr. Touchwood; "how the devil should any one know how to mix spices so well as he who has been where they grow?—I have seen the sun ripening nutmegs and cloves, and here, it can hardly fill a peasecod, by Jupiter. Ah, Tyrrel, the merry nights we have had at Smyrna!—Gad, I think the gammon and the good wine taste all the better in a land where folks hold them to be sinful indulgences—Gad, I believe many a good Moslem is of the same opinion—that same prohibition of their prophet's gives a flavour to the ham, and a relish to the Cyprus.—Do you remember old Cogin Hassen, with his green turban?—I once played him a trick, and put a pint of brandy into his sherbet. Egad, the old fellow took care never to discover the cheat until he had got to the bottom of the flagon, and then he strokes his long white beard, and says, 'Ullah Kerim,'—that is, 'Heaven is merciful.' Mrs. Dods, Mr. Tyrrel knows the meaning of it.—Ullah Kerim, says he, after he had drunk about a gallon of brandy-punch!—Ullah Kerim, says the hypocritical old rogue, as if he had done the finest thing in the world!"

"And what for no? What for shouldna the honest man say a blessing after his drap punch?" demanded Mrs. Dods; "it was better, I ween, than blasting, and blawing, and swearing, as if folks shouldna be thankful for the creature comforts."

"Well said, old Dame Dods," said the traveller; "that is a right hostess's maxim, and worthy of Mrs. Quickly herself. Here is to thee, and I pray ye to pledge me before you leave the room."

"Troth, I'll pledge naeboddy the night, Maister Touchwood; for, what wi' the upcast and terror that I got a wee while syne, and what wi' the bit taste that I behoved to take of the plottie while I was making it, my head is sair enough distressed the night already.—Maister Tirl, the yellow room is ready for ye when ye like; and, gentlemen, as the morn is the Sabbath, I canna be keeping the servant queans out of their beds to wait on ye ony langer, for they will mak it an excuse for lying till aught o'clock on the Lord's day. So, when your plottie is done, I'll be muckle obliged to ye to light the bedroom candles, and put out the double moulds, and e'en show yourselfs to your beds; for douce folks, sic as the like of you, should set an example by ordinary.—And so, gude-night to ye baith."

"By my faith," said Touchwood, as she withdrew, "our dame turns as obstinate as a Pacha with three tails!—We have her gracious permission to finish our mug, however; so here is to your health once more,

Mr. Tyrrel, wishing you a hearty welcome to your own country."

"I thank you, Mr. Touchwood," answered Tyrrel; "and I return you the same good wishes, with, as I sincerely hope, a much greater chance of their being realized.—You relieved me, sir, at a time when the villany of an agent, prompted, as I have reason to think, by an active and powerful enemy, occasioned my being, for a time, pressed for funds.—I made remittances to the Ragion you dealt with, to acquit myself at least of the pecuniary part of my obligation; but the bills were returned, because, it was stated, you had left Smyrna."

"Very true—very true—left Smyrna, and here I am in Scotland—as for the bills, we will speak of them another time—something due for picking me out of the gutter."

"I shall make no deduction on that account," said Tyrrel, smiling, though in no jocose mood; and I beg you not to mistake me. The circumstances of embarrassment under which you found me at Smyrna, were merely temporary—I am most able and willing to pay my debt; and, let me add, I am most desirous to do so."

"Another time—another time," said Mr. Touchwood—"time enough before us, Mr. Tyrrel—besides, at Smyrna, you talked of a lawsuit—law is a lick-penny, Mr. Tyrrel—no counsellor like the pound in purse."

"For my lawsuit," said Tyrrel, "I am fully provided."

"But have you good advice?—Have you good advice?" said Touchwood; "answer me that."

"I have advised with my lawyers," answered Tyrrel, internally vexed to find that his friend was much disposed to make his generosity upon the former occasion a pretext for prying farther into his affairs now than he thought polite or convenient.

"With your counsel learned in the law—eh, my dear boy? But the advice you should take is of some travelled friend, well acquainted with mankind and the world—some one that has lived double your years, and is maybe looking out for some bare young fellow that he may do a little good to—one that might be willing to help you farther than I can pretend to guess—for, as to your lawyer, you get just your guinea's worth from him—not even so much as the baker's bargain, thirteen to the dozen."

"I think I should not trouble myself to go far in search of a friend such as you describe," said Tyrrel, who could not affect to misunderstand the senior's drift, "when I was near Mr. Peregrine Touchwood; but the truth is, my affairs are at present so much complicated with those of others, whose secrets I have no right to communicate, that I cannot have the advantage of consulting you, or any other friend. It is possible I may be soon obliged to lay aside this reserve, and vindicate myself before the whole public. I will not fail, when that time shall arrive, to take an early opportunity of confidential communication with you."

"That is right—confidential is the word—No person ever made a confidant of me who repented it—Think what the Pacha might have made of it, had he taken my advice, and cut through the Isthmus of Suez.—Turk and Christian, men of all tongues and countries, used to consult old Touchwood, from the building of a mosque down to the settling of an agio.—But come—Good-night—good-night."

So saying, he took up his bedroom light, and extinguished one of those which stood on the table, nodded to Tyrrel to discharge his share of the duty imposed by Mrs. Dods with the same punctuality, and they withdrew to their several apartments, entertaining very different sentiments of each other.

"A troublesome, inquisitive old gentleman," said Tyrrel to himself; "I remember him narrowly escaping the bastinado at Smyrna, for thrusting his advice on the Turkish eadi—and then I lie under a considerable obligation to him, giving him a sort of right to annoy me.—Well, I must parry his impertinence as I can."

"A shy cock this Frank Tyrrel," thought the traveller; "a very complete dodger!—But no matter—I shall wind him, were he to double like a fox—I am resolved to make his matters my own, and if I cannot carry him through, I know not who can."

Having formed this philanthropic resolution, Mr. Touchwood threw himself into bed, which luckily declined exactly at the right angle, and, full of self-complacency, consigned himself to slumber.

CHAPTER XXIX.

MEDIATION.

— So begone!

We will not now be troubled with reply;

We offer fair, take it advisedly.

King Henry IV., Part I.

It had been the purpose of Tyrrel, by rising and breakfasting early, to avoid again meeting Mr. Touchwood, having upon his hands a matter in which that officious gentleman's interference was likely to prove troublesome. His character, he was aware, had been assailed at the Spa in the most public manner, and in the most public manner he was resolved to demand redress, conscious that whatever other important concerns had brought him to Scotland, must necessarily be postponed to the vindication of his honour. He was determined, for this purpose, to go down to the rooms when the company was assembled at the breakfast hour, and had just taken his hat to set out, when he was interrupted by Mrs. Dods, who, announcing "a gentleman that was speering for him," ushered into the chamber a very fashionable young man in a military surtout, covered with silk lace and fur, and wearing a foraging-cap; a dress now too familiar to be distinguished, but which at that time was used only by geniuses of a superior order. The stranger was neither handsome nor plain, but had in his appearance a good deal of pretension, and the cool easy superiority which belongs to high breeding. On his part, he surveyed Tyrrel; and, as his appearance differed, perhaps, from that for which the exterior of the Cleikum Inn had prepared him, he abated something of the air with which he had entered the room, and politely announced himself as Captain Jekyl, of the — Guards, (presenting at the same time, his ticket.)

"He presumed he spoke to Mr. Martigny?"

"To Mr. Francis Tyrrel, sir," replied Tyrrel, drawing himself up—"Martigny was my mother's name—I have never borne it."

"I am not here for the purpose of disputing that point, Mr. Tyrrel, though I am not entitled to admit what my principal's information leads him to doubt."

"Your principal, I presume, is Sir Bingo Binks?" said Tyrrel. "I have not forgotten that there is an unfortunate affair between us."

"I have not the honour to know Sir Bingo Binks," said Captain Jekyl. "I come on the part of the Earl of Etherington."

Tyrrel stood silent for a moment, and then said, "I am at a loss to know what the gentleman who calls himself Earl of Etherington can have to say to me, through the medium of such a messenger as yourself, Captain Jekyl. I should have supposed that, considering our unhappy relationship, and the terms on which we stand towards each other, the lawyers were the fittest negotiators between us."

"Sir," said Captain Jekyl, "you are misunderstanding my errand. I am come on no message of hostile import from Lord Etherington—I am aware of the connexion betwixt you, which would render such an office altogether contradictory to common sense and the laws of nature; and I assure you, I would lay down my life rather than be concerned in an affair so unnatural. I would act, if possible, as a mediator betwixt you."

They had hitherto remained standing. Mr. Tyrrel now offered his guest a seat; and, having assumed one himself, he broke the awkward pause which ensued by observing, "I should be happy, after experiencing such a long course of injustice and persecution from your friend, to learn, even at this late period, Captain Jekyl, any thing which can make me think better, either of him, or of his purpose towards me and towards others."

"Mr. Tyrrel," said Captain Jekyl, "you must allow me to speak with candour. There is too great a stake betwixt your brother and you to permit you to be friends; but I do not see it is necessary that you should therefore be mortal enemies."

"I am not my brother's enemy, Captain Jekyl," said Tyrrel—"I have never been so—His friend I cannot be, and he knows but too well the insurmountable barrier which his own conduct has placed between us."

"I am aware," said Captain Jekyl, slowly and expressively, "generally, at least, of the particulars of your unfortunate disagreement."

"If so," said Tyrrel, colouring, "you must be also aware with what extreme pain I feel myself compelled to enter on such a subject with a total stranger—a stranger, too, the friend and confidant of one who — But I will not hurt your feelings Captain Jekyl, but rather endeavour to suppress my own. In one word, I beg to be favoured with the import of your communication, as I am obliged to go down to the Spa this morning, in order to put to rights some matters there which concern me nearly."

"If you mean the cause of your absence from an appointment with Sir Bingo Binks," said Captain Jekyl, "the matter has been already completely explained. I pulled down the offensive placard with my own hand, and rendered myself responsible for your honour to any one who should presume to hold it in future doubt."

"Sir," said Tyrrel, very much surprised, "I am obliged to you for your intention, the more so as I am ignorant how I have merited such interference. It is not, however, quite satisfactory to me, because I am accustomed to be the guardian of my own honour."

"An easy task, I presume in all cases, Mr. Tyrrel," answered Jekyl, "but peculiarly so in the present, when you will find no one so hardy as to assail it.—My interference, indeed, would have been unjustifiably officious, had I not been at the moment undertaking a commission implying confidential intercourse with you. For the sake of my own character, it became necessary to establish yours. I know the truth of the whole affair from my friend the Earl of Etherington, who ought to thank Heaven so long as he lives, that saved him on that occasion from the commission of a very great crime."

"Your friend, sir, has had, in the course of his life, much to thank Heaven for, but more for which to ask God's forgiveness."

"I am no divine, sir," replied Captain Jekyl with spirit; "but I have been told that the same may be said of most men alive."

"I, at least, cannot dispute it," said Tyrrel; "but, to proceed.—Have you found yourself at liberty, Captain Jekyl, to deliver to the public the whole particulars of a rencontre so singular as that which took place between your friend and me?"

"I have not, sir," said Jekyl—"I judged it a matter of great delicacy, and which each of you had the like interest to preserve secret."

"May I beg to know, then," said Tyrrel, "how it was possible for you to vindicate my honour from Sir Bingo's rendezvous otherwise?"

"It was only necessary, sir, to pledge my word as a gentleman and a man of honour, character which I am pretty well known to the world, that to my certain personal knowledge, you were not in an affair with a friend of mine, the further particulars of which prudence required should be sent into oblivion. I think no one will venture to dispute my word, or to require more than my assurance.—If there should be any one very hardy as to faith on the occasion, I shall find a way to rectify him. In the mean while, your outlawry has been rescinded in the most honourable manner; and Sir Bingo, in consideration of his share in giving rise to reports so injurious to you, is desirous to drop all further proceedings in his original quarrel, and hopes the whole matter will be forgot and forgiven on all sides."

"Upon my word, Captain Jekyl," answered Tyne under the necessity of acknowledging to you. You have cut a knot which found it very difficult to unloose; for I, that, while I was determined not to let the stigma put upon me, I should have culty in clearing myself, without men-istances, which, were it only for the other's memory, should be buried in n. composure; but do not say more on the topic you have touched upon, unless you would have before you a madman!—Is it possible for you, sir, to have heard even the outline of this story, and to imagine that I can ever reflect on the coldblooded and most inhu-man stratagem, which this friend of yours prepared for two unfortunates, without?"—He started up, and walked impetuously to and fro. "Since the friend himself interrupted the happiness of perfect innocence, there was never such an act of treachery—never such schemes of happiness destroyed—never such inevita-ble misery prepared for two wretches who had the idiocy to repose perfect confidence in him!—Had there been passion in his conduct, it had been the act of a man—a wicked man, indeed, but still a human crea-ture, acting under the influence of human feelings—but his was the deed of a calm, cold, calculating demon, actuated by the basest and most sordid motives of self-interest, joined, as I firmly believe, to an early and inveterate hatred of one whose claims he considered as at variance with his own."

"I am sorry to see you in such a temper," said Captain Jekyl, calmly; "Lord Etherington, I trust, acted on very different motives than those you impute to him; and if you will but listen to me, perhaps something may be struck out which may accommo-date these unhappy disputes."

"Sir," said Tyrrel, sitting down again, "I will listen to you with calmness, as I would remain calm under the probe of a surgeon tending a festered wound. But when you touch me to the quick, when you prick the very nerve, you cannot expect me to endure without wincing."

"I will endeavour, then, to be as brief in the opera-tion as I can," replied Captain Jekyl, who possessed the advantage of the most admirable composure dur-ing the whole conference. "I conclude, Mr. Tyrrel, that the peace, happiness, and honour of Miss Mow-bray, are dear to you?"

"Who dare impeach her honour!" said Tyrrel, fiercely; then checking himself, added, in a more moderate tone, but one of deep feeling, "They are dear to me, sir, as my eyesight."

"My friend holds them in equal regard," said the Captain; "and has come to the resolution of doing her the most ample justice."

"He can do her justice no otherwise, than by ceas-ing to haunt this neighbourhood, to think, to speak, even to dream of her."

"Lord Etherington thinks otherwise," said Captain Jekyl; "he believes that if Miss Mowbray has sus-tained any wrong at his hands, which, of course, I am not called upon to admit, it will be best repaired by the offer to share with her his title, his rank, and his fortune."

"His title, rank, and fortune, sir, are as much a falsehood as he is himself," said Tyrrel, with vio-lence—"Marry Clara Mowbray? never!"

"My friend's fortune, you will observe," replied Jekyl, "does not rest entirely upon the event of the lawsuit with which you, Mr. Tyrrel, now threaten him.—Deprive him, if you can, of the Oakendale estate, he has still a large patrimony by his mother; and besides, as to his marriage with Clara Mowbray, he conceives, that unless it should be the lady's wish to have the ceremony repeated, to which he is most desirous to defer his own opinion, they have only to declare that it has already passed between them."

"A trick, sir!" said Tyrrel, "a vile infamous trick! of which the lowest wretch in Newgate would be ashamed—the imposition of one person for another."

"Of that, Mr. Tyrrel, I have seen no evidence whatever. The clergyman's certificate is clear—Francis Tyrrel is united to Clara Mowbray in the holy bands of wedlock—such is the tenor—there is a copy—nay, stop one instant, if you please, sir. You say there was an imposition in the case—I have no doubt but you speak what you believe, and what Miss Mowbray told you. She was surprised—forced in some measure from the husband she had just married—ashamed to meet her former lover, to whom, doubt-less, she had made many a vow of love, and ne'er a true one—what wonder that, unsupported by her bride-groom, she should have changed her tone, and thrown all the blame of her own immaturity on the absent swim?—A woman, at a pinch so critical, will make the most improbable excuse, rather than be found guilty on her own confession.

"There must be no resting in this case," said Tyrrel, his cheek becoming pale, and his veins stirred with passion.

"I am quite serious, sir," replied Jekyl; "and there is no law court in Britain that would take the lady's word—all she has to offer, and that in her own cause—against a whole body of evidence, direct and circumstantial, showing that she was by her own free consent married to the gentleman who now claims her hand. Forgive me, sir—I see you are much agitated—I do not mean to dispute your right of believing what you think is most credible—I only use the freedom of pointing out to you the impression which the evidence is likely to make on the minds of indifferent persons."

"Your friend," answered Tyrrel, affecting a composure, which, however, he was far from possessing, "may think by such arguments to screen his villainy; but it cannot avail him—the truth is known to Heaven—it is known to me—and there is, besides, one indifferent witness upon earth, who can testify that the most abominable imposture was practised on Miss Mowbray."

"You mean her cousin,—Hannah Irwin, I think, is her name," answered Jekyl; "you say I am fully acquainted with all the circumstances of the case. But where is Hannah Irwin to be found?"

"She will appear, doubtless, in Heaven's good time, and to the confusion of him who now imagines the only witness of his treachery—the only one who could tell the truth of this complicated mystery—either no longer lives, or, at least, cannot be brought forward against him, to the ruin of his schemes. Yes, sir, that slight observation of yours has more than explained to me why your friend, or, to call him by his true name Mr. Valentine Blunier, has not compromised his machinations sooner, and also why he has commenced them now. He thinks himself certain that Hannah Irwin is not now in Britain, or to be produced in a court of justice—he may find himself mistaken."

"My friend seems perfectly confident of the issue of his cause," answered Jekyl; "but for the lady's sake, he is most unwilling to prosecute a suit which must be attended with so many circumstances of painful exposure."

"Exposure, indeed?" answered Tyrrel; "thanks to the traitor who led a mine so fearful, and who now affects to be reluctant to fire it.—Oh! how I am bound to curse that effrontery that restrains my hands! I would be content to be the meanest and vilest of society, for one hour of vengeance on this unexampled hypocrite!—One thing is certain, sir—your friend will have no living victim. His persecution will kill Clara Mowbray, and fill up the cup of his crimes, with the murder of one of the sweetest—! I shall grow a woman, if I say more on the subject!"

"My friend," said Jekyl, "were you like best to have him so defined, is as dangerous as you can be to spare the lady's feelings, and with that view, not reverting to former passages, he has laid before her brother a proposal of alliance, with which Mr. Mowbray is highly pleased."

"He?" said Tyrrel, starting—"And the lady?"

"And the lady so far proved favourable, as to consent that Lord Ethernington shall visit She-we-Castle."

"Her consent must have been extorted!" exclaimed Tyrrel.

"It was given voluntarily," said Jekyl, "as I am led to understand, unless, perhaps, in so far as the desire to end three very unpleasant transactions may have operated. I think naturally enough, to induce her to sink them in formal secrecy, by accepting Lord Ethernington's hand.—I see, sir, I give you pain, and am sorry for it.—I have no title to call upon you for any exertion of generosity, but should such be Miss Mowbray's arguments, as if too much in respect of you, that you will not compromise the lady's honour by meeting upon former claims, and opening up disputable transactions so long past."

"Captain Jekyl," said Tyrrel, solemnly, "I have no claims. Whatever I might have had, were recalled by the act of treachery through which your friend endeavoured too successfully to supplant me. Were Clara Mowbray as free from her pretended sorrows as law could pronounce her, still with me—me, at least, of all men in the world—the obstacles must ever remain, that the nuptial benediction has been pronounced over her, and the man whom I must for ever call brother."—He stopped at that word, as if it had cost him agony to pronounce it, and then resumed:—"No, sir, I have no views of personal advantage in this matter—they have been long anticipated. But I will not permit Clara Mowbray to become the wife of a villain—I will watch over her with thoughts as anxious as those of her guardian angel. I have been the cause of all the evil she has sustained. I first persuaded her to quit the path of duty. I, of all men who live, am bound to guard her from the misery—from the guilt—which will attach to her as this man's wife. I will not believe that she wishes it—I will never listen that in calm mind and sober reason, she can be brought to listen to such a guilty proposal.—Her mind—alas!—is not of the firm texture it once could bear; and your friend knows well how to press on the spring of every passion that can agitate and alarm her. Threats of exposure may extort her consent to this most unflattering match, if they do not indeed drive her to suicide, which I think the most likely termination. I will, therefore, be strong where she is weak.—Your friend, sir, must at least surmise proposals of this fine spinning. I will satisfy Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's of his false pretences, led to rank and fortune; and I rather think he will set his sister against the claim of a needy pretender, though he might be dazzled with the alabaster of a wealthy peer."

"Your cause, sir, is not yet won," answered Jekyl, "and when it is, your brother will retain power enough to enable him to marry a greater match than Miss Mowbray, besides the large estate of Nettwood, to which that alliance must give him right. He would wish to make some accommodation between you and her, if possible. You profess Mr. Tyrrel to lay aside all selfish wishes and views in the matter, and to wish entirely in Miss Mowbray's safety and happiness?"

"Such upon my honour, is the exclusive prayer of my interference. I would give all I am worth to procure her a hour of quiet—for happiness she will not know again."

Your anticipations of Miss Mowbray's future, said Jekyl, "are, I understand, founded upon the character of my friend. You think him a man of high principle, and because he overreached you as a private intriguer, you conclude that now, in his more exalted advanced years, the happiness of the lady is whom he are so much interested ought not to be trusted to him."

"There may be other grounds," said Tyrrel, harshly, "but you may argue upon those you have named sufficient to warrant my interference."

"How, then, if I should propose some accommodation of this nature? Lord Ethernington does not pretend to the ardour of a passionate lover. He has much in the world, and has no desire to quit it. Mr. Mowbray's health is delicate—his spirits variable—and retirement would most probably be his choice. Suppose—I am barely putting a supposition—suppose that a marriage between two persons in circumstances were rendered necessary or advantageous to him—suppose that such a marriage were to cover up on partly a large estate—were to insure the order upon all the consequences of an unpleasant exposure—on both ends might be obtained by the more convenient marriage passing between them. There might be a previous contract of separation, with suitable provisions for the lady, and stipulations, by which the husband should renounce all claim on her estate. Such things happen every season, if not on the marriage day, yet before the honeymoon is over. Wealth and freedom would be the lady's, and as good rank as you, sir, supposing your claims just, any thing proper to leave them."

There was a long pause, during which Tyrrel underwent many changes of countenance, which Jekyl watched carefully, without pressing him for an answer. At length he replied, "There is much in your proposal, Captain Jekyl, which I might be tempted to accede to, as one manner of unloosing this Gordian knot, and a compromise by which Miss Mowbray's future tranquillity would be in some degree provided for. But I would rather trust a fanged adder than your friend, unless I saw him fettered by the strongest ties of interest. Besides, I am certain the unhappy lady could never survive the being connected with him in this manner, though but for the single moment when they should appear together at the altar. There are other objections."

He checked himself, paused, and then proceeded in a calm and self-possessed tone. "You think, perhaps, even yet, that I have some selfish and interested views in this business; and probably you may feel yourself entitled to entertain the same suspicion towards me, which I avowedly harbour respecting every proposition which originates with your friend.—I cannot help it—I can but meet these disadvantageous impressions with plain dealing and honesty; and it is in the spirit of both that I make a proposition to you.—Your friend is attached to rank, fortune, and worldly advantages, in the usual proportion, at least, in which they are pursued by men of the world—this you must admit, and I will not offend you by supposing more."

"I know few people who do not desire such advantages," answered Captain Jekyl; "and I frankly own that he affects no particular degree of philosophic indifference respecting them."

"Be it so," answered Tyrrel. "Indeed, the proposal you have just made indicates that his pretended claim on this young lady's hand is entirely, or almost entirely, dictated by motives of interest, since you are of opinion that he would be contented to separate from her society on the very marriage day, provided that, in doing so, he was assured of the Nettlewood property."

"My proposition was unauthorized by my principal," answered Jekyl; "but it is needless to deny, that its very tenor implies an idea, on my part, that Lord Etherington is no passionate lover."

"Well then," answered Tyrrel. "Consider, sir, and let him consider well, that the estate and rank he now assumes, depend upon my will and pleasure—that, if I prosecute the claims of which that scroll makes you aware, he must descend from the rank of an earl into that of a commoner, stripped of by much the better half of his fortune—a diminution which would be far from compensated by the estate of Nettlewood, even if he could obtain it, which could only be by means of a lawsuit, precarious in the issue, and most dishonourable in its very essence."

"Well, sir," replied Jekyl, "I perceive your argument—What is your proposal?"

"That I will abstain from prosecuting my claim on those honours and that property—that I will leave Valentine Bulmer in possession of his usurped title and ill-deserved wealth—that I will bind myself under the strongest penalties never to disturb his possession of the Earldom of Etherington and estates belonging to it—on condition that he allows the woman, whose peace of mind he has ruined for ever, to walk through the world in her wretchedness, undisturbed either by his marriage-suit, or by any claim founded upon his own most treacherous conduct—in short, that he forbear to molest Clara Mowbray, either by his presence, word, letter, or through the intervention of a third party, and be to her in future as if he did not exist."

"This is a singular offer," said the Captain; "may I ask if you are serious in making it?"

"I am neither surprised nor offended at the question," said Tyrrel. "I am a man, sir, like others, and affect no superiority to that which all men desire the possession of—a certain consideration and station in society. I am no romantic fool to undervalue the sacrifice I am about to make. I renounce a rank which is and ought to be the more valuable to me, because it involves (he blushed as he spoke) the fame of an honoured mother—because, in failing to claim it, I disobey the commands of a dying father, who wished that by doing so I should declare to the world the penitence which hurried him perhaps to the grave, and the making which public he considered might be some atonement for his errors. From an honoured place in the land, I descend voluntarily to become a nameless exile; for, once certain that Clara Mowbray's peace is assured, Britain no longer holds me. All this I do, sir, not in any idle strain of overheated feeling, but seeing, and knowing, and dearly valuing, every advantage which I renounce—yet I do it, and do it willingly, rather than be the cause of farther evil to one, on whom I have already brought too—too much."

His voice, in spite of his exertions, faltered as he concluded the sentence, and a big drop which rose to his eye, required him for the moment to turn towards the window.

"I am ashamed of this childishness," he said, turning again to Captain Jekyl; "if it excites your ridicule, sir, let it be at least a proof of my sincerity."

"I am far from entertaining such sentiments," said Jekyl, respectfully—for, in a long train of fashionable follies, his heart had not been utterly hardened—"very far, indeed. To a proposal so singular as yours, I cannot be expected to answer—except thus far—the character of the peerage is, I believe, indelible, and cannot be resigned or assumed at pleasure. If you are really Earl of Etherington, I cannot see how your resigning the right may avail my friend."

"You, sir, it might not avail," said Tyrrel, gravely, "because you, perhaps, might scorn to exercise a right, or hold a title that was not legally yours. But your friend will have no such compunctious visitings. If he can act the Earl to the eye of the world, he has already shown that his honour and conscience will be easily satisfied."

"May I take a copy of the memorandum containing this list of documents," said Captain Jekyl, "for the information of my constituent?"

"The paper is at your pleasure, sir," replied Tyrrel; "it is itself but a copy.—But Captain Jekyl," he added, with a sarcastic expression, "is, it would seem, but imperfectly let into his friend's confidence—he may be assured his principal is completely acquainted with the contents of this paper, and has accurate copies of the deeds to which it refers."

"I think it scarce possible," said Jekyl, angrily.

"Possible and certain!" answered Tyrrel. "My father, shortly preceding his death, sent me—with a most affecting confession of his errors—this list of papers, and acquainted me that he had made a similar communication to your friend. That he did so I have no doubt, however Mr. Bulmer may have thought proper to disguise the circumstance in communication with you. One circumstance, among others, stamps at once his character, and confirms me of the danger he apprehended by my return to Britain. He found means, through a scoundrelly agent, who had made me the usual remittances from my father while alive, to withhold those which were necessary for my return from the Levant, and I was obliged to borrow from a friend."

"Indeed?" replied Jekyl. "It is the first time I have heard of these papers—May I inquire where the originals are, and in whose custody?"

"I was in the East," answered Tyrrel, "during my father's last illness, and these papers were by him deposited with a respectable commercial house, with which he was connected. They were enclosed in a cover directed to me, and that again in an envelope, addressed to the principal person in that firm."

"You must be sensible," said Captain Jekyl, "that I can scarcely decide on the extraordinary offer which you have been pleased to make, of resigning the claim founded on these documents, unless I had a previous opportunity of examining them."

"You shall have that opportunity—I will write to have them sent down by the post—they lie but in small compass."

"This, then," said the Captain, "sums up all that can be said at present.—Supposing these proofs to be of unexceptionable authenticity, I certainly would advise my friend Etherington to put to sleep a claim so important as yours, even at the expense of resigning his matrimonial speculation—I presume you design to abide by your offer?”

“I am not in the habit of altering my mind—still less of retracting my word,” said Tyrrel, somewhat haughtily.

“We part friends, I hope?” said Jekyl, rising, and taking his leave.

“Not enemies, certainly, Captain Jekyl. I will own to you I owe you my thanks for extricating me from that foolish affair at the Well—nothing could have put me to more inconvenience than the necessity of following to extremity a frivolous quarrel at the present moment.”

“You will come down among us, then?” said Jekyl.

“I certainly shall not wish to appear to hide myself,” answered Tyrrel; “it is a circumstance might be turned against me—there is a party who will avail himself of every advantage. I have but one path, Captain Jekyl—that of truth and honour.”

Captain Jekyl bowed, and took his leave. So soon as he was gone, Tyrrel locked the door of the apartment, and drawing from his bosom a portrait, gazed on it with a mixture of sorrow and tenderness, until the tears dropped from his eye.

It was the picture of Clara Mowbray, such as he had known her in the days of their youthful love, and taken by himself, whose early turn for painting had already developed itself. The features of the blooming girl might be yet traced in the fine countenance of the more matured original. But what was now become of the glow which had shaded her cheek?—what of the arch, yet subdued pleasantry, which lurked in the eye?—what of the joyous content, which composed every feature to the expression of a Euphrosyne?—Alas! these were long fled!—Sorrow had laid his hand upon her—the purple light of youth was quenched—the glance of innocent gaiety was exchanged for looks now moody with ill-concealed care, now animated by a spirit of reckless and satirical observation.

“What a wreck! what a wreck!” exclaimed Tyrrel; “and all of one wretch’s making.—Can I put the last hand to the work, and be her murderer outright? I cannot—I cannot!—I will be strong in the resolve I have formed—I will sacrifice all—rank—station—fortune—and fame. Revenge!—Revenge itself, the last good left me—revenge itself I will sacrifice, to obtain for her such tranquillity as she may be yet capable to enjoy.”

In this resolution he sat down, and wrote a letter to the commercial house with whom the documents of his birth, and other relative papers were deposited, requesting that the packet containing them should be forwarded to him through the post-office.

Tyrrel was neither unambitious, nor without those sentiments respecting personal consideration, which are usually united with deep feeling and an ardent mind. It was with a trembling hand, and a watery eye, but with a heart firmly resolved, that he sealed and despatched the letter; a step towards the resignation, in favour of his mortal enemy, of that rank and condition in life, which was his own by right of inheritance, but had so long hung in doubt betwixt them.

CHAPTER XXX.

INTRUSION.

By my troth, I will go with thee to the lane’s-end (—I am a kind of burr—I shall stick.—Measure for Measure.)

It was now far advanced in autumn. The dew lay thick on the long grass, where it was touched by the sun; but where the sward lay in shadow, it was covered with hoar frost, and crisped under Jekyl’s foot, as he returned through the woods of St. Ronan’s. The leaves of the ash-trees detached themselves from the branches, and, without an air of wind, fell spontaneously on the path. The mists still lay lazily upon the heights, and the huge old tower of St. Ronan’s was entirely shrouded with vapour, except where a sunbeam, struggling with the mist, penetrated into its wreath so far as to show a projecting turret upon one of the angles of the old fortress, which, long a favourite haunt of the raven, was popularly called the Corbie’s Tower. Beneath, the scene was open and lightsome, and the robin redbreast was chirping his best, to atone for the absence of all other choristers. The fine foliage of autumn was seen in many a glade, running up the sides of each little ravine, russet-bled and golden-speckled, and tinged frequently with the red hues of the mountain-ash; while here and there a huge old fir, the native growth of the soil, flung his broad shadow over the rest of the trees, and seemed to exult in the permanence of his dusky livery over the more showy, but transitory brilliance by which he was surrounded.

Such is the scene, which, so often described in prose and in poetry, yet seldom loses its effect upon the ear or upon the eye, and through which we wander with a strain of mind congenial to the decline of the year. There are few who do not feel the impression; and even Jekyl, though bred to far different pursuits than those most favourable to such contemplation, relaxed his pace to admire the uncommon beauty of the landscape.

Perhaps, also, he was in no hurry to rejoin the Earl of Etherington, towards whose service he felt himself more disinclined since his interview with Tyrrel. It was clear that that nobleman had not fully reposed in his friend the confidence promised; he had not made him aware of the existence of those important documents of proof, on which the whole fate of his negotiation appeared now to hinge, and in so far had deceived him. Yet, when he pulled from his pocket and re-read Lord Etherington’s explanatory letter, Jekyl could not help being more sensible than he had been on the first perusal, how much the present possessor of that title felt alarmed at his brother’s claims; and he had some compassion for the natural feeling that must have rendered him shy of communicating at once the very worst view of his case, even to his most confidential friend. Upon the whole, he remembered that Lord Etherington had been his benefactor to an unusual extent; that, in return, he had promised the young nobleman his active and devoted assistance, in extricating him from the difficulties with which he seemed at present surrounded; that, in quality of his confidant, he had become acquainted with the most secret transactions of his life; and that it could only be some very strong cause indeed which could justify breaking off from him at this moment. Yet he could not help wishing either that his own obligations had been less, his friend’s cause better, or, at least, the friend himself more worthy of assistance.

“A beautiful morning, sir, for such a foggy and climate as this,” said a voice close by Jekyl’s ear, which made him at once start out of his contemplation. He turned half round, and beside him stood our honest friend Touchwood, his throat muffled in his large Indian handkerchief, huge gouty shoes thrust upon his feet, his bobwig well powdered, and the gold-headed cane in his hand, carried upright as a sergeant’s halberd. One glance of contemptuous survey entitled Jekyl, according to his modish ideas, to rank the old gentleman as a regular-built quizz, and to treat him as the young gentlemen of his Majesty’s Guards think themselves entitled to use every unfashionable variety of the human species. A slight inclination of a bow, and a very cold “You have the advantage of me, sir,” dropped as it were unconsciously from his tongue, were meant to repress the old gentleman’s advances, and moderate his ambition to be hail fellow well met with his betters. But Mr. Touchwood was callous to the intended rebuke; he had lived too much at large upon the world, and was far too confident of his own merits, to take a repulse easily, or to permit his modesty to interfere with any purpose which he had formed.

“Advantage of you, sir?” he replied; “I have lived too long in the world not to keep all the advantages I have, and get all I can—and I reckon it one that I have overtaken you, and shall have the pleasure of your company to the Well.”

“I should but interrupt your worthier meditations, sir,” said the other; “besides, I am a modest young man, and think myself fit for no better company than my own—moreover, I walk slow—very slow.—Good morning to you, Mr. A—A—I believe my treacherous memory has let slip your name, sir."

"My name!—Why, your memory must have been like Pat Murtough's greyhound, that let the hare go before he caught it. You never heard my name in your life. Touchwood is my name. What d'ye think of it, now you know it?"

"I am really no connoisseur in surnames," answered Jekyl; "and it is quite the same to me whether you call yourself Touchwood or Touchstone. Don't let me keep you from walking on, sir. You will find breakfast far advanced at the Well, sir, and your walk has probably given you an appetite."

"Which will serve me to luncheon-time, I promise you," said Touchwood; "I always drink my coffee as soon as my feet are in my pabouches—it's the way all over the East. Never trust my breakfast to their scalding milk-and-water at the Well, I assure you; and for walking slow, I have had a touch of the gout."

"Have you?" said Jekyl; "I am sorry for that; because, if you have no mind to breakfast, I have—and so, Mr. Touchstone, good-morrow to you."

But, although the young soldier went off at double quick time, his pertinacious attendant kept close by his side, displaying an activity which seemed inconsistent with his make and his years, and talking away the whole time, so as to show that his lungs were not in the least degree incommoded by the unusual rapidity of motion.

"Nay, young gentleman, if you are for a good smart walk, I am for you, and the gout may be d--d. You are a lucky fellow to have youth on your side; but yet, so far as between the Aultoun and the Well, I think I could walk you for your sum, barring running—all heel and toe—equal weight, and I would match Barclay himself for a mile."

"Upon my word, you are a gay old gentleman!" said Jekyl, relaxing his pace; "and if we must be fellow-travellers, though I can see no great occasion for it, I must even shorten sail for you."

So saying, and as if another means of deliverance had occurred to him, he slackened his pace, took out a morocco case of cigars, and, lighting one with his briquet, said, while he walked on, and bestowed as much of its fragrance as he could upon the face of his intrusive companion, "Vergeben sie, mein herr—ich bin erzogen in kaiserlicher dienst—muss rauchen ein kleine wenig."

"Rauchen sie immer fort," said Touchwood, producing a huge meerschauum, which, suspended by a chain from his neck, lurked in the bosom of his coat, "habe auch mien pfeichen—Sehen sie den lieben topf!" and he began to return the smoke, if not the fire, of his companion, in full volumes, and with interest.

"The devil take the twaddle," said Jekyl to himself, "he is too old and too fat to be treated after the manner of Professor Jackson; and, on my life, I cannot tell what to make of him.—He is a residenter too—I must tip him the cold shoulder, or he will be pestering me eternally."

Accordingly, he walked on, sucking his cigar, and apparently in as abstracted a mood as Mr. Cargill himself, without paying the least attention to Touchwood, who, nevertheless, continued talking, as if he had been addressing the most attentive listener in Scotland, whether it were the favourite nephew of a cross, old, rich bachelor, or the aid-de-camp of some old rusty firelock of a general, who tells stories of the American war.

"And so, sir, I can put up with any companion at a pinch, for I have travelled in all sorts of ways, from a caravan down to a carrier's cart; but the best society is the best every where; and I am happy I have fallen in with a gentleman who suits me so well as you.—That grave, steady attention of yours reminds me of Elfi Bey—you might talk to him in English, or any thing he understood least of—you might have read Aristotle to Elfi, and not a muscle would he stir—give him his pipe, and he would sit on his cushion with a listening air as if he took in every word of what you said."

Captain Jekyl threw away the remnant of his cigar, with a little movement of pettishness, and began to whistle an opera air.

"There again, now!—That is just so like the Marquis of Rocconbole, another dear friend of mine, that whistles all the time you talk to him—He says he learned it in the Reign of Terror, when a man was glad to whistle to show his throat was whole. And, talking of great folk, what do you think of this affair between Lord Etherington and his brother, or cousin, as some folk call him?"

Jekyl absolutely started at the question; a degree of emotion, which, had it been witnessed by any of his fashionable friends, would for ever have ruined his pretensions to rank in the first order.

"What affair?" he asked, so soon as he could command a certain degree of composure.

"Why, you know the news surely? Francis Tyrrel, whom all the company voted a coward the other day, turns out as brave a fellow as any of us; for, instead of having run away to avoid having his own throat cut by Sir Bingo Binks, he was at the very moment engaged in a gallant attempt to murder his elder brother, or his more lawful brother, or his cousin, or some such near relation."

"I believe you are misinformed, sir," said Jekyl dryly, and then resumed, as deftly as he could, his proper character of a pocourante.

"I am told," continued Touchwood, "one Jekyl acted as a second to them both on the occasion—a proper fellow, sir—one of those fine gentlemen whom we pay for polishing the pavement in Bond Street, and looking at a thick shoe and a pair of worsted stockings, as if the wearer were none of their paymasters. However, I believe the Commander-in-Chief is like to discard him when he hears what has happened."

"Sir!" said Jekyl, fiercely—then, recollecting the folly of being angry with an original of his companion's description, he proceeded more coolly, "You are misinformed—Captain Jekyl knew nothing of any such matter as you refer to—you talk of a person you know nothing of—Captain Jekyl is"—(Here he stopped a little, scandalized, perhaps, at the very idea of vindicating himself to such a personage from such a charge.)

"Ay, ay," said the traveller, filling up the chasm in his own way, "he is not worth our talking of certainly—but I believe he knew as much of the matter as either you or I do, for all that."

"Sir, this is either a very great mistake, or wilful impertinence," answered the officer. "However absurd or intrusive you may be, I cannot allow you, either in ignorance or incivility, to use the name of Captain Jekyl with disrespect.—I am Captain Jekyl, sir."

"Very like, very like," said Touchwood, with the most provoking indifference; "I guessed as much before."

"Then, sir, you may guess what is likely to follow, when a gentleman hears himself unwarrantably and unjustly slandered," replied Captain Jekyl, surprised and provoked that his annunciation of name and rank seemed to be treated so lightly. "I advise you, sir, not to proceed too far upon the immunities of your age and insignificance."

"I never presume farther than I have good reason to think necessary, Captain Jekyl," answered Touchwood, with great composure. "I am too old, as you say, for any such idiotical business as a duel, which no nation I know of practices but our silly fools of Europe—and then, as for your switch, which you are grasping with so much dignity, that is totally out of the question. Look you, young gentleman; four-fifths of my life have been spent among men who do not set a man's life at the value of a button on his collar—every person learns, in such cases, to protect himself as he can; and whoever strikes me must stand to the consequences. I have always a brace of bull-dogs

* Forgive me, sir, I was bred in the Imperial service, and must smoke a little.

* Smoke as much as you please; I have got my pipe too.—See what a beautiful head!

about me which put age and youth on a level. So suppose me horse-whipped, and pray, at the same time, suppose yourself shot through the body. The same exertion of imagination will serve for both purposes."

So saying, he exhibited a very handsome, highly finished, and richly-mounted pair of pistols.

"Catch me without my tools," said he, significantly buttoning his coat over the arms, which were concealed in a side-pocket, ingeniously contrived for that purpose. "I see you do not know what to make of me," he continued, in a familiar and confidential tone; "but, to tell you the truth, every body that has meddled in this St. Ronan's business is a little off the hooks—something of a tête exaltée, in plain words, a little crazy, or so; and I do not affect to be much wiser than other people."

"Sir," said Jekyl, "your manners and discourse are so unprecedented, that I must ask your meaning plainly and decidedly—Do you mean to insult me or no?"

"No insult at all, young gentleman—all fair meaning, and above board—I only wished to let you know what the world may say, that is all."

"Sir," said Jekyl, hastily, "the world may tell what lies it pleases; but I was not present at the rencontre between Etherington and Mr. Tyrrel—I was some hundred miles off."

"There now," said Touchwood, "there was a rencontre between them—the very thing I wanted to know."

"Sir," said Jekyl, aware too late that, in his haste to vindicate himself, he had committed his friend, "I desire you will found nothing on an expression hastily used to vindicate myself from a false aspersion—I only meant to say, if there was an affair such as you talk of, I knew nothing of it."

"Never mind—never mind—I shall make no bad use of what I have learned," said Touchwood. "Were you to eat your words with the best fish-sauce, (and that is Burgess's,) I have got all the information from them I wanted."

"You are strangely pertinacious, sir," replied Jekyl.

"O, a rock, a piece of flint for that—What I have learned, I have learned, but I will make no bad use of it.—Hark ye, Captain, I have no malice against your friend—perhaps the contrary—but he is in a bad course, sir—has kept a false reckoning, for as deep as he thinks himself; and I tell you so, because I hold you (your finery out of the question) to be, as Hamlet says, indifferent honest; but, if you were not, why necessity is necessity; and a man will take a Bedouin for his guide in the desert, whom he would not trust with an aspar in the cultivated field; so I think of reposing some confidence in you—have not made up my mind, yet though."

"On my word, sir, I am greatly flattered both by your intentions and your hesitation," said Captain Jekyl. "You were pleased to say just now, that every one concerned with these matters was something particular."

"Ay, ay—something crazy—a little mad, or so. That was what I said, and I can prove it."

"I should be glad to hear the proof," said Jekyl—"I hope you do not except yourself?"

"Oh! by no means," answered Touchwood; "I am one of the maddest old boys ever slept out of straw, or went loose. But you can put fishing questions in your turn, Captain, I see that—you would fain know how much, or how little, I am in all these secrets. Well, that is as hereafter may be. In the mean time, here are my proofs.—Old Scrogie Mowbray was mad, to like the sound of Mowbray better than that of Scrogie; young Scrogie was mad, not to like it as well. The old Earl of Etherington was not sane when he married a French wife in secret, and devilish mad indeed when he married an English one in public. Then for the good folk here, Mowbray of St. Ronan's is cracked, when he wishes to give his sister to he knows not precisely whom: She is a fool not to take him, because she does know who he is, and what has been between them; and your friend is maddest of all, who seeks her under so heavy a penalty:—and you and I, Captain, go mad gratis for company's sake, when we mix ourselves with such a mess of folly and frenzy."

"Really, sir, all that you have said is an absolute riddle to me," replied the embarrassed Jekyl.

"Riddles may be read," said Touchwood, nodding: "if you have any desire to read mine, pray, take notice, that this being our first interview, I have exerted myself faire les frais du conversation, as Jack Frenchmen says; if you want another, you may come to Mrs. Dod's, at the Cleikum Inn, any day before Saturday, at four precisely, when you will find none of your half-starved, long-limbed bundles of bones which you call poultry at the table-d'hôte but a right Chitty-gong fowl!—I got Mrs. Dods the breed from old Ben Vandewash, the Dutch broker—stewed to a minute, with rice and mushrooms.—If you can eat without a silver fork, and your appetite serves you you shall be welcome—that's all.—So, good morning to you, good master lieutenant, for a captain of the Guards is but a lieutenant after all."

So saying, and ere Jekyl could make any answer the old gentlemen turned short off into a path which led to the healing fountain, branching away from that which conducted to the Hotel.

Uncertain with whom he had been holding a conversation so strange, Jekyl remained looking after him, until his attention was roused by a little boy who crept out from an adjoining thicket, with a switch in his hand, which he had been just cutting—probably against regulations to the contrary effect—made and provided, for he held himself ready to take cover in the copse again, in case any one were in sight who might be interested in chastising his delinquency. Captain Jekyl easily recognised in him one of that hopeful class of imps, who pick up a precarious livelihood about places of public resort, by going errands, brushing shoes, doing the groom's and coachman's work in the stables, driving donkeys, opening gates, and so forth, for about one tenth part of their time, spending the rest in gambling, sleeping in the sun, and otherwise qualifying themselves to exercise the profession of thieves and pickpockets, either separately, or in conjunction with those of waiters, groom's, and postilions. The little outcast had an indifferent pair of pantaloons, and about him a jacket, for, like Pentapolin with the naked arm, he went on action with his right shoulder bare; a third part of what had once been a hat covered his face, bleached white with the sun, and his face, as brown as a berry, was illuminated by a pair of eyes, which for spying out either peril or profit, might have rivalled those of the hawk.—In a word, it was the original Puck of the Shaws dramatics.

"Come hither, ye unhang'd whelp," said Jekyl, "and tell me if you know the old gentleman that passed down the walk just now—yonder he is, still in sight."

"It is the Nabob," said the boy; "I could swear to his back among all the backs at the Waal, ye honour."

"What do you call a Nabob, you varlet?"

"A Nabob—a Nabob?" answered the scout. "odd, I believe it is ane comes frae foreign parts with mair siller than his pouches can haud, and spils it a' through the country—they are as yellow as oranges, and maun hae a' thing their ain gate."

"And what is this Nabob's name, as you call him?" demanded Jekyl.

"His name is Touchwood," said his informant: "ye may see him at the Waal every morning."

"I have not seen him at the ordinary."

"Na, na," answered the boy; "he is a queer sike cull, he disna frequent wi' other folk, but lives up at the Cleikum.—He gave me half-a-crown yince and forbade me to play it awa' at pitch and tosa."

"And you disobeyed him, of course?"

"Na, I didna dis-obeyd him—I played it awa' neevie-neevie-nick-nack."

"Well, there is sixpence for thee; lose it to the devil in any way thou think'st proper."

So saying, he gave the little galopin his donative, and a slight rap on the pate at the same time, which sent him scouring from his presence. He himself hastened to Lord Etherington's apartments, and, as luck would have it, found the Earl alone.

CHAPTER XXXI.

DISCUSSION.

I will converse with iron-witted fools
And unrespectful boys—none are for me
That look into me with suspicious eyes.

Richard III.

"How now, Jekyl!" said Lord Etherington, eagerly; "what news from the enemy?—Have you seen him?"

"I have," replied Jekyl.

"And in what humour did you find him?—in none that was very favourable, I dare say, for you have a ruffled and perplexed look, that confesses a losing game—I have often warned you how your hang-dog look betrays you at brag—And then, when you would ain brush up your courage, and put a good face on a sad game, your bold looks always remind me of a standard hoisted only half-mast high, and betraying melancholy and dejection, instead of triumph and defiance."

"I am only holding the cards for your lordship at present," answered Jekyl; "and I wish to Heaven here may be no one looking over the hand."

"How do you mean by that?"

"Why, I was beset, on returning through the wood, by an old bore, a Nabob, as they call him, and Touchwood by name."

"I have seen such a quiz about," said Etherington— "What of him?"

"Nothing," answered Jekyl, "except that he seemed to know much more of your affairs than you would wish or are aware of. He smoked the truth of the contrebetwixt Tyrrel and you, and what is worse—must needs confess the truth—he contrived to wring out of me a sort of confirmation of his suspicions."

"Slife! wert thou mad?" said Lord Etherington, turning pale; "His is the very tongue to send the story through the whole country—Hal, you have undone me."

"I hope not," said Jekyl; "I trust in Heaven I have not!—His knowledge is quite general—only that there was some scuffle between you—Do not look so dismayed about it, or I will even go back and cut his throat, to secure his secrecy."

"Cursed indiscretion!" answered the Earl—"how could you let him fix on you at all?"

"I cannot tell," said Jekyl—"he has powers of oring beyond ten of the dullest of all possible doctors—stuck like a limpet to a rock—a perfect double of the Old Man of the Sea, who I take to have been the greatest bore on record."

"Could you not have turned him on his back like a turtle, and left him there?" said Lord Etherington.

"And had an ounce of lead in my body for my pains?—no—we have already had footpad work enough—promise you the old buck was armed, as if he meant to bring folks on the low toby."

"Well—well—But Martigny, or Tyrrel, as you call him—what says he?"

"Why, Tyrrel, or Martigny, as your lordship calls him," answered Jekyl, "will by no means listen to our lordship's proposition. He will not consent that Miss Mowbray's happiness shall be placed in your lordship's keeping; nay, it did not meet his approbation a bit the more, when I hinted at the acknowledgment of the marriage, or the repetition of the ceremony, attended by an immediate separation, which I thought I might venture to propose."

"And on what grounds does he refuse so reasonable an accommodation?" said Lord Etherington—"Does he still seek to marry the girl himself?"

"I believe he thinks the circumstances of the case render that impossible," replied his confidant.

"What? then he would play the dog in the manger—neither eat nor let eat?—He shall find himself mistaken. She has used me like a dog, Jekyl, since I saw you; and, by Jove! I will have her, that I may break her pride, and cut him to the liver with the agony of seeing it."

"Rob as a footpad."

3 S

"Nay, but hold—hold!" said Jekyl; "perhaps I have something to say on his part, that may be a better compromise than all you could have by teasing him. He is willing to purchase what he calls Miss Mowbray's tranquillity, at the expense of his resignation of his claims to your father's honours and estate; and he surprised me very much, my lord, by showing me this list of documents, which, I am afraid, makes his success more than probable, if there really are such proofs in existence." Lord Etherington took the paper and seemed to read with much attention, while Jekyl proceeded—"He has written to procure these evidences from the person with whom they are deposited."

"We shall see what like they are when they arrive," said Lord Etherington—"They come by post, I suppose?"

"Yes; and may be immediately expected," answered Jekyl.

"Well—he is my brother on one side of the house, at least," said Lord Etherington; "and I should not much like to have him lagged for forgery, which I suppose will be the end of his bolstering up an unsubstantial plea by fabricated documents—I should like to see these same papers he talks of."

"But, my lord," replied Jekyl, "Tyrrel's allegation is, that you have seen them; and that copies, at least, were made out for you, and are in your possession—such is his averment."

"He lies," answered Lord Etherington, "so far as he pretends I know of such papers. I consider the whole story as froth—foam—fudge, or whatever is most unsubstantial. It will prove such when the papers appear, if indeed they ever will appear. The whole is a bully from beginning to end; and I wonder at thee, Jekyl, for being so thirsty after syllabub, that you can swallow such whipt cream as that stuff amounts to. No, no—I know my advantage, and shall use it so as to make all their hearts bleed. As for these papers, I recollect now that my agent talked of copies of some manuscripts having been sent him, but the originals were not then forthcoming; and I'll bet the long odds that they never are—mere fabrications—if I thought otherwise, would I not tell you?"

"Certainly, I hope you would, my lord," said Jekyl; "for I see no chance of my being useful to you, unless I have the honour to enjoy your confidence."

"You do—you do, my friend," said Etherington, shaking him by the hand; "and since I must consider your present negotiation as failed, I must devise some other mode of settling with this mad and troublesome fellow."

"No violence, my lord," said Jekyl, once more, and with much emphasis.

"None—none—none, by Heaven!—Why, thou suspicious wretch, must I swear, to quell your scruples?—On the contrary, it shall not be my fault, if we are not on decent terms."

"It would be infinitely to the advantage of both your characters if you could bring that to pass," answered Jekyl; "and if you are serious in wishing it, I will endeavour to prepare Tyrrel. He comes to the Well or to the ordinary to-day, and it would be highly ridiculous to make a scene."

"True, true; find him out, my dear Jekyl, and persuade him how foolish it will be to bring our family quarrels out before strangers, and for their amusement. They shall see the two bears can meet without biting.—Go—go—I will follow you instantly—go, and remember you have my full and exclusive confidence.—Go, half-bred, startling fool!" he continued, the instant Jekyl had left the room, "with just spirits enough to ensure your own ruin, by hurrying you into what you are not up to.—But he has character in the world—is brave—and one of those whose countenance gives a fair face to a doubtful business. He is my creature, too—I have bought and paid for him, and it would be idle extravagance not to make use of him.—But as to confidence—no confidence, honest Hal, beyond that which cannot be avoided. If I wanted a confidant, here comes a better than thou by half—Solmes has no scruples—he will always give me money's worth of zeal and secrecy for money."

His lordship's valet at this moment entered the apartment, a grave, civil-looking man, past the middle age, with a sallow complexion, a dark thoughtful eye, slow, and sparing of speech, and sedulously attentive to all the duties of his situation.

"Solmes,"—said Lord Etherington, and then stopped short.

"My lord"—There was a pause; and when Lord Etherington had again said, "Solmes!" and his valet had answered, "Your lordship," there was a second pause; until the Earl, as if recollecting himself "Oh! I remember what I wished to say—it was about the course of post here. It is not very regular, I believe?"

"Regular enough, my lord, so far as concerns this place—the people in the Aultoun do not get their letters in course."

"And why not, Solmes?" said his lordship.

"The old woman who keeps the little inn there, my lord, is on bad terms with the post-mistress—the one will not send for the letters, and the other will not despatch them to the village; so, betwixt them, they are sometimes lost or mislaid, or returned to the General Post-office."

"I wish that may not be the case of a packet which I expect in a few days—it should have been here already, or, perhaps, it may arrive in the beginning of the week—it is from that formal ass, Trueman the Quaker, who addresses me by my Christian and family name, Francis Tyrrel. He is like enough to mistake the inn, too, and I should be sorry it fell into Monsieur Martigny's hands—I suppose you know he is in that neighbourhood?—Look after its safety, Solmes—quietly, you understand; because people might put odd constructions, as if I were wanting a letter which was not my own."

"I understand perfectly, my lord," said Solmes, without exhibiting the slightest change in his sallow countenance, though entirely comprehending the nature of the service required.

"And here is a note will pay for postage," said the Earl, putting into his valet's hand a bank-bill of considerable value; "and you may keep the balance for occasional expenses."

This was also fully understood; and Solmes, too politic and cautious even to look intelligence, or acknowledge gratitude, made only a bow of acquiescence, put the note into his pocket-book, and assured his lordship that his commands should be punctually attended to.

"There goes the agent for my money, and for my purpose," said Lord Etherington, exultingly; "no extorting of confidence, no demanding of explanations, no tearing off the veil with which a delicate manœuvre is gaze—all excuses are received as argent comptant, provided only, that the best excuse of all, the argent comptant itself, come to recommend them. Yet I will trust no one—I will out, like a skilful general, and reconnoitre in person."

With this resolution, Lord Etherington put on his surtout and cap, and sallying from his apartments, took the way to the bookseller's shop, which also served as post-office and circulating library; and being in the very centre of the parade, (for so is termed the broad terrace walk which leads from the inn to the Well,) it formed a convenient lounging-place for news-mongers and idlers of every description.

The Earl's appearance created, as usual, a sensation upon the public promenade; but whether it was the suggestion of his own alarmed conscience, or that there was some real cause for the remark, he could not help thinking his reception was of a more doubtful character than usual. His fine figure and easy manners produced their usual effect, and all whom he spoke to received his attention as an honour; but none offered, as usual, to unite themselves to him, or to induce him to join their party. He seemed to be looked on rather as an object of observation and attention, than as making one of the company; and to escape from a distant gaze, which became rather embarrassing, he turned into the little emporium of news and literature.

He entered unobserved, just as Lady Penelope had finished reading some verses, and was commenting upon them with all the alacrity of a femina savante, in possession of something which no one is to hear repeated oftener than once.

"Copy—no indeed!"—these were the snatches which reached Lord Etherington's ear, from the group of which her ladyship formed the centre—"honour bright—I must not betray poor Chatterly—besides, his lordship is my friend, and a person of rank, you know—so one would not—You have not got the book, Mr. Pott?—you have not got Statius?—you never have any thing one longs to see."

"Very sorry, my lady—quite out of copies at present—I expect some in my next monthly parcel."

"Good luck, Mr. Pott, that is your never-failing answer," said Lady Penelope; "I believe if I were to ask you for the last new edition of the Alkoran, you would tell me it was coming down in your next monthly parcel."

"Can't say, my lady, really," answered Mr. Pott; "have not seen the work advertised yet; but I have no doubt, if it is likely to take, there will be copies in my next monthly parcel."

"Mr. Pott's supplies are always in the paullo post futurum tense," said Mr. Chatterly, who was just entering the shop.

"Ah! Mr. Chatterly, are you there?" said Lady Penelope; "I lay my death at your door—I cannot find this Thebaid, where Polynices and his brother—"

"Hush, my lady!—hush, for Heaven's sake!" said the poetical divine, and looked towards Lord Etherington. Lady Penelope took the hint, and was silent; but she had said enough to call up the traveller Touchwood, who raised his head from the newspaper which he was studying, and, without addressing his discourse to any one in particular, ejaculated, as if in scorn of Lady Penelope's geography—

"Polynices?—Polly Peachum.—There is no such place in the Thebais—the Thebais is in Egypt—the mummies come from the Thebais—I have been in the catacombs—caves very curious indeed—we were lapidated by the natives—pebbled to some purpose—I give you my word. My janizary thrashed a whole village by way of retaliation."

While he was thus proceeding, Lord Etherington, as if in a listless mood, was looking at the letters which stood ranged on the chimney-piece, and carrying on a languid dialogue with Mrs. Pott, whose person and manners were not ill adapted to her situation, for she was good-looking, and vastly fine and affected.

"Number of letters here which don't seem to find owners, Mrs. Pott?"

"Great number, indeed, my lord—it is a great vexation, for we are obliged to return them to the post-office, and the postage is charged against us if they are lost; and how can one keep sight of them all?"

"Any love-letters among them, Mrs. Pott?" said his lordship, lowering his tone.

"Oh, fie! my lord, how should I know?" answered Mrs. Pott, dropping her voice to the same cadence.

"Oh! every one can tell a love-letter—that has ever received one, that is—one knows them without opening—they are always folded hurriedly and sealed carefully—and the direction manifests a kind of tremulous agitation, that marks the state of the writer's nerves—that now,"—pointing with his switch to a letter upon the chimney-piece, "that must be a love-letter."

"He, he, he!" giggled Mrs. Pott, "I beg pardon for laughing, my lord—but—he, he, he!—that is a letter from one Bindloose, the banker body, to the old woman Luckie Dods, as they call her, at the change-house in the Aultoun."

"Depend upon it then, Mrs. Pott, that your neighbour, Mrs. Dods, has got a lover in Mr. Bindloose—unless the banker has been shaking hands with the palsy. Why do you not forward her letter?—you are very cruel to keep it in durance here."

"Me forward!" answered Mrs. Pott; "the caparinoity, old, girning alewife, may wait long enough or I forward it—She'll not loose the letters that come to her by the King's post, and she must go on taking wi' the old carrier, as if there was no post-house in the neighbourhood. But the solicitor will be about wi' her one of these days."

"Oh! you are too cruel—you really should send the love-letter; consider, the older she is, the poor soul as the less time to lose."

But this was a topic on which Mrs. Pott understood no jesting. She was well aware of our nation's inveteracy against her and her establishment, and she resented it as a placeman resents the efforts of a radical. She answered something sulkily, "That they that loosed letters should have letters; and neither Luckie Dods, nor any of her lodgers, should ever see the scrape of a pen from the St. Ronan's office, that they did not call for and pay for."

It is probable that this declaration contained the essence of the information which Lord Etherington had designed to extract by his momentary flirtation with Mrs. Pott; for when, retreating as it were from his sore subject, she asked him, in a pretty mincing tone, to try his skill in pointing out another love-letter, he only answered carelessly, "that in order to do that I must write her one;" and leaving his confidential mission by her little throne, he lounged through the arrow shop, bowed slightly to Lady Penelope as he passed, and issued forth upon the parade, where he saw a spectacle which might well have appalled a man of less self-possession than himself.

Just as he left the shop, little Miss Digges entered most breathless, with the emotion of impatience and of curiosity. "Oh la! my lady, what do you say here for?—Mr. Tyrrel has just entered the other end of the parade this moment, and Lord Etherington is walking that way—they must meet each other. O lord! come, come away, and see them meet!—I wonder if they'll speak—I hope they won't fight—Oh! do come, my lady!"

"I must go with you, I find," said Lady Penelope; "it is the strangest thing, my love, that curiosity of ours about other folk's matters—I wonder what your mamma will say to it."

"Oh! never mind mamma—nobody minds her—no, nor nobody—Do come, dearest Lady Pen, or I will run away by myself.—Mr. Chatterly, do make her come!"

"I must come, it seems," said Lady Penelope, "or I shall have a pretty account of you."

But notwithstanding this rebuke, and forgetting, at the same time, that people of quality ought never to come in a hurry, Lady Penelope, with such of her tell-tales as she could hastily collect around her, hurried along the parade with unusual haste, in sympathy, doubtless, with Miss Digges's curiosity, as her friendship declared she had none of her own.

Our friend the traveller, had also caught up Miss Digges's information; and, breaking off abruptly an account of the Great Pyramid, which had been naturally introduced by the mention of the Thebais, and heeding the fair alarmist's words, "hope they won't fight," he rushed upon the parade, and hustled along as hard as his sturdy supporters could carry him. If the gravity of the traveller, and the delicacy of Lady Penelope, were surprised into unwonted haste from their eagerness to witness the meeting of Tyrrel and Lord Etherington, it may be well supposed that the decorum of the rest of the company was a slender strait on their curiosity, and that they hurried to be present at the expected scene, with the alacrity of gentlemen of the fancy hastening to a set-to.

In truth, though the meeting afforded little sport to those who expected dire conclusions, it was, nevertheless, sufficiently interesting to those spectators who were accustomed to read the language of suppressed passion betraying itself at the moment when the parties are most desirous to conceal it.

Tyrrel had been followed by several loiterers so soon as he entered the public walk; and their number was now so much reinforced, that he saw himself with pain and displeasure the centre of a sort of crowd who watched his motions. Sir Bingo and Captain MacTurk were the first to bustle through it, and to address him with as much politeness as they could command.

"Servant, sir," mumbled Sir Bingo, extending the right hand of fellowship and reconciliation, ungloved.

Servant—sorry that any thing should have happened between us—very sorry, on my word."

"No more need be said, sir," replied Tyrrel; "the whole is forgotten."

"Very handsome, indeed—quite the civil thing—hope to meet you often, sir."—And here the knight was silent.

Mean while, the more verbose Captain proceeded, "Och, py Cot, and it was an awfu' mistake, and I could draw the penknife across my finger for having written the word.—By my sowl, and I scratched it till I scratched a hole in the paper.—Och! that I should live to do an uncivil thing by a gentleman that had got himself hit in an honourable affair! But you should have written, my dear; for how the devil could we guess that you were so well provided in quarrels, that you had to settle two in one day!"

"I was hurt in an unexpected—an accidental manner, Captain MacTurk. I did not write because there was something in my circumstances at the moment which required secrecy; but I was resolved, the instant I recovered, to put myself to rights in your good opinion."

"Och! and you have done that," said the Captain, nodding sagaciously; "for Captain Jekyl, who is a fine child, has put us all up to your honourable conduct. They are pretty boys, these guardsmen, though they may play a little fine sometimes, and think more of themselves than peradventure they need for to do, in comparison with us of the line.—But he let us know all about it—and, though he said not a word of a certain fine lord, with his footpad, and his hurt, and what not, yet we all knew how to lay that and that together.—And if the law would not right you, and there were bad words between you, why should not two gentlemen right themselves? And as to your being kinsmen, why should not kinsmen behave to each other like men of honour? Only, some say you are father's sons, and that is something too near.—I had once thoughts of calling out my uncle Dougal myself, for there is no saying where the line should be drawn; but I thought, on the whole, there should be no fighting, as there is no marriage, within the forbidden degrees. As for first cousins—Wheugh!—that's all fair—fire away, Flanigan!—But here is my lord, just upon us, like a stag of the first head, and the whole herd behind him."

Tyrrel stepped forward a little before his officious companions, his complexion rapidly changing into various shades, like that of one who forces himself to approach and touch some animal or reptile for which he entertains that deep disgust and abhorrence which was anciently ascribed to constitutional antipathy. This appearance of constraint put upon himself, with the changes which it produced on his face, was calculated to prejudice him somewhat in the opinion of the spectators, when compared with the steady, stately, yet, at the same time, easy demeanour of the Earl of Etherington, who was equal to any man in England in the difficult art of putting a good countenance on a bad cause. He met Tyrrel with an air as unembarrassed, as it was cold; and, while he paid the courtesy of a formal and distant salutation, he said aloud, "I presume, Mr. Tyrrel de Martigny, that, since you have not thought fit to avoid this awkward meeting, you are disposed to remember our family connexion so far as to avoid making sport for the good company?"

"You have nothing to apprehend from my passion, Mr. Bulmer," replied Tyrrel, "if you can assure yourself against the consequences of your own."

"I am glad of that," said the Earl, with the same composure, but sinking his voice so as only to be heard by Tyrrel; "and as we may not again in a hurry hold any communication together, I take the freedom to remind you, that I sent you a proposal of accommodation by my friend, Mr. Jekyl."

"It was inadmissible," said Tyrrel—"altogether inadmissible—both from reasons which you may guess, and others which it is needless to detail.—I sent you a proposition, think of it well."

"I will," replied Lord Etherington, "when I shall see it supported by those alleged proofs, which I do not believe ever had existence."

"Your conscience holds another language from your tongue," said Tyrrel; "but I disclaim reproaches, and decline altercation. I will let Captain Jekyl know when I have received the papers, which, you say, are essential to your forming an opinion on my proposal. —In the mean while, do not think to deceive me. I am here for the very purpose of watching and defeating your machinations; and, while I live, be assured they shall never succeed. —And now, sir—or my lord—for the titles are in your choice—fare you well.

"Hold a little," said Lord Etherington. "Since we are condemned to shock each other's eyes, it is fit the good company should know what they are to think of us. You are a philosopher, and do not value the opinion of the public—a poor worldling like me is desirous to stand fair with it. —Gentlemen," he continued, raising his voice, "Mr. Winterblossom, Captain Mac-Turk, Mr.—what is his name, Jekyl?—Ay, Micklehen. You have, I believe, all some notion, that this gentleman, my near relation, and I, have some undecided claims on each other, which prevent our living upon good terms. We do not mean, however, to disturb you with our family quarrels; and, for my own part, while this gentleman, Mr. Tyrrel, or whatever he may please to call himself, remains a member of this company, my behaviour to him will be the same as to any stranger who may have that advantage. —Good morrow to you, sir—Good morning, gentlemen—we all meet at dinner, as usual.—Come, Jekyl."

So saying, he took Jekyl by the arm, and, gently extricating himself from the sort of crowd, walked off, leaving most of the company prepossessed in his favour, by the ease and apparent reasonableness of his demeanour. Sounds of depreciation, forming themselves indistinctly into something like the words, "my eye, and Betty Martin," did issue from the neck-cloth of Sir Bingo, but they were not much attended to; for it had not escaped the observation of the quick-sighted gentry at the Well, that the Baronet's feelings towards the noble Earl were in the inverse ratio of those displayed by Lady Pinks, and that, though ashamed to testify, or perhaps incapable of feeling, any anxious degree of jealousy, his temper had been for some time considerably upon the fret; a circumstance concerning which his fair moiety did not think it necessary to give herself any concern.

Mean while, the Earl of Etherington walked onward with his confidant, in the full triumph of successful genius.

"You see," he said, "Jekyl, that I can turn a corner with any man in England. It was a proper blunder of yours, that you must extricate the fellow from the mist which accident had flung around him—you might as well have published the story of our rencontre at once, for every one can guess it, by laying time, place, and circumstance together; but never trouble your brains for a justification. You marked how I assumed my natural superiority over him—towered up in the full pride of legitimacy—silenced him even where the good company most do congregate. This will go to Mowbray through his agent, and will put him still madder on my alliance. I know he looks jealously on my flirtation with a certain lady—the dasher yonder—nothing makes a man sensible of the value of an opportunity, but the chance of losing it."

"I wish to Heaven you would give up thoughts of Miss Mowbray!" said Jekyl; "and take Tyrrel's offer, if he has the means of making it good."

"Ay, if—if. But I am quite sure he has no such rights as he pretends to, and that his papers are all a deception.—Why do you put your eye upon me as fixed as if you were searching out some wonderful secret?"

"I wish I knew what to think of your real bona fide belief respecting these documents," said Jekyl, not a little puzzled by the steady and unembarrassed air of his friend.

"Why, thou most suspicious of coxcombs," said Etherington, "what the devil would you have me say to you?—Can I, as the lawyers say, prove a negative? or, is it not very possible, that such things may exist, though I have never seen or heard of them? All I can say is, that of all men I am the most interested to deny the existence of such documents; and, therefore, certainly will not admit of it, unless I am compelled to do so by their being produced; nor then either, unless I am at the same time well assured of their authenticity."

"I cannot blame you for your being hard of faith, my lord," said Jekyl; "but still I think if you can cut out with your earldom, and your noble hereditary estate, I would, in your case, pitch Nettlewood to the devil."

"Yes, as you pitched your own patrimony, Jekyl; but you took care to have the spending of it first.—What would you give for such an opportunity of peering your fortunes by marriage?—Confess the truth."

"I might be tempted, perhaps," said Jekyl, "in my present circumstances; but if they were what they have been, I should despise an estate that was to be held by petticoat tenure, especially when the lady of the manor was a sickly fantastic girl, that hated me, as this Miss Mowbray has the bad taste to hate you."

"Umph—sickly?—no, no, she is not sickly—she is as healthy as any one in constitution—and, on my word, I think her paleness only renders her more interesting. The last time I saw her, I thought she might have rivalled one of Canova's finest statues."

"Yes; but she is indifferent to you—you do not love her," said Jekyl.

"She is any thing but indifferent to me," said the Earl; "she becomes daily more interesting—for her dislike piques me; and besides, she has the insolence openly to defy and condemn me before her brother, and in the eyes of all the world. I have a kind of loving hatred—a sort of hating love for her; in short, thinking upon her is like trying to read a riddle, and makes one make quite as many blunders, and say just as much nonsense. If ever I have the opportunity, I will make her pay for all her airs."

"What airs?" said Jekyl.

"Nay, the devil may describe them, for I cannot; but, for example—Since her brother has insisted on her receiving me, or I should rather say on her appearing when I visit Shaws-Castle, one would think her invention has toiled in discovering different ways of showing want of respect to me, and dislike to my presence. Instead of dressing herself as a lady should, especially on such occasions, she chooses some fantastic, or old-fashioned, or negligent bedizening, which makes her at least look odd, if it cannot make her ridiculous—such triple tiaras of various-coloured gauze on her head—such pieces of old tapestry, I think, instead of shawls and pelisses—such thick-soled shoes—such tan-leather gloves—mercy upon us, Hal, the very sight of her equipment would drive mad a whole conclave of milliners! Then her postures are so strange—she does so stoop and lollop, as the women call it, so cross her legs and square her arms—were the goddess of grace to look down on her, it would put her to flight for ever!"

"And you are willing to make this awkward, ill-dressed, unmannered dowdy, your Countess Etherington; you, for whose critical eye half the town dress themselves?" said Jekyl.

"It is all a trick, Hal—all an assumed character to get rid of me, to disgust me, to baffle me; but I am not to be had so easily. The brother is driven to despair—he bites his nails, winks, coughs, makes signs, which she always takes up at cross-purposes.—I hope he beats her after I go away; there would be a touch of consolation, were one but certain of that."

"A very charitable hope, truly, and your present feelings might lead the lady to judge what she may expect after wedlock. But," added Jekyl, "cannot you, so skilful in fathoming every mood of the female mind, divine some mode of engaging her in conversation?"

"Conversation!" replied the Earl; "why, ever since the shock of my first appearance was surmounted, she has contrived to vote me a nonentity; and that she may annihilate me completely, she has chosen, of all occupations, that of working a stocking! From what cursed old antediluvian, who lived before the invention of spinning-jennies, she learned this craft, Heaven only knows; but there she sits with her work pinned to her knee—not the prettily taper silken fabric, with which Jeannette of Amiens acquitted, while Tristram Shandy was observing her progress; but a huge worsted bag, designed for some lat-footed old pauper, with heels like an elephant—and there she squats, counting all the stitches as she works, and refusing to speak, or listen, or look up, under pretence that it disturbs her calculation!"

"An elegant occupation, truly, and I wonder it does not work a cure upon her noble admirer," said Jekyl.

"Confound her—no—she shall not trick me. And then amid this affectation of vulgar stolidity, there break out such sparkles of exultation, when she thinks she has succeeded in baffling her brother, and in plaguing me, that, by my faith, Hal, I could not tell, were it at my option, whether to kiss or to cuff her."

"You are determined to go on with this strange affair, then?" said Jekyl.

"On—on—on, my boy!—Clara and Nettlewood forever!" answered the Earl. "Besides this brother of hers provokes me too—he does not do for me half what he might—what he ought to do. He stands on points of honour, forsooth, this broken-down horse-ockey, who swallowed my two thousand pounds as a pointer would a pat of butter.—I can see he wishes to play fast and loose—has some suspicions, like you, Hal, upon the strength of my right to my father's titles and estate; as if, with the title of the Nettlewood property alone, I would not be too good a match for one of his beggarly family. He must scheme, forsooth, this half-baked Scotch cake!—He must hold off and on, and be cautious, and wait the result, and try conclusions with me, this lump of oatmeal dough!—I am much tempted to make an example of him in the course of my proceedings."

"Why, this is vengeance horrible and dire," said Jekyl; "yet I give up the brother to you; he is a conceited coxcomb, and deserves a lesson. But I would fain intercede for the sister."

"We shall see"—replied the Earl; and then suddenly, "I tell you what it is, Hal; her caprices are so liverting, that I sometimes think out of mere contradiction, I almost love her; at least, if she would put clear old scores, and forget one unlucky prank of mine, it should be her own fault if I did not make her a happy woman."

CHAPTER XXXII.

A DEATH-BED.

It comes—it wrings me in my parting hour,
The long-hid crime—the well-disguised guilt.
Bring me some holy priest to lay the spectre!

Old Play.

THE general expectation of the company had been disappointed by the pacific termination of the meeting betwixt the Earl of Etherington and Tyrrel, the anticipation of which had created so deep a sensation. It had been expected that some appalling scene would have taken place; instead of which, each party seemed to acquiesce in a sullen neutrality, and leave the war to be carried on by their lawyers. It was generally understood that the cause was removed out of the courts of Bellona into that of Themis; and although the litigants continued to inhabit the same neighbourhood, and once or twice met at the public walks or public table, they took no notice of each other, farther than by exchanging on such occasions a grave and distant bow.

In the course of two or three days, people ceased to take interest in a feud so coldly conducted; and if they thought of it at all, it was but to wonder that both the parties should persevere in residing near the lake, and in chilling, with their unsocial behaviour, a party met together for the purposes of health and amusement.

But the brothers, as the reader is aware, however painful their occasional meetings might be, had the strongest reasons to remain in each other's neighbourhood—Lord Etherington to conduct his lesson upon Miss Mowbray, Tyrrel to disconcert his plan, if possible, and both to await the answer which should be returned by the house in London, who were depositaries of the papers left by the late Earl.

Jekyl, anxious to assist his friend as much as possible made in the mean time a visit to old Touchwood at the Aultoun, expecting to find him as communicative as he had formerly been on the subject of the quarrel betwixt the brothers, and trusting to discover, by dint of address, whence he had derived his information concerning the affairs of the noble house of Etherington. But the confidence which he had been induced to expect on the part of the old traveller was not reposed. Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, as the Earl called him, had changed his mind or was not in the vein of communication. The only proof of his confidence worth mentioning, was his imparting to the young officer a valuable receipt for concocting curra-powder.

Jekyl was therefore reduced to believe that Touchwood, who appeared all his life to have been a great intermeddler in other people's matters, had puzzled out the information which he appeared to possess of Lord Etherington's affairs, through some of those obscure sources whence very important secrets do frequently, to the astonishment and confusion of those whom they concern, escape to the public. He thought this the more likely, as Touchwood was by no means critically nice in his society, but was observed to converse as readily with a gentleman's gentleman, as with the gentleman to whom he belonged, and with a lady's attendant, as with the lady herself. He that will stoop to this sort of society, who is fond of tattle, being at the same time disposed to pay some consideration for gratification of his curiosity, and not over scrupulous respecting its accuracy, may always command a great quantity of private anecdote. Captain Jekyl naturally enough concluded, that this busy old man became in some degree master of other people's affairs by such correspondence as these; and he could himself bear witness to his success in cross-examination, as he had been surprised into an avowal of the rencontre between the brothers, by an insidious observation of the said Touchwood. He reported, therefore, to the Earl, after this interview, that, on the whole, he thought he had no reason to fear much on the subject of the traveller, who, though he had become acquainted, by some means or other, with some leading facts of his remarkable history, only possessed them in a broken, confused, and desultory manner, insomuch that he seemed to doubt whether the parties in the expected lawsuit were brothers or cousins, and appeared totally ignorant of the facts on which it was to be founded.

It was the next day after this éclaircissement on the subject of Touchwood, that Lord Etherington dropped as usual into the bookseller's shop, got his papers, and skimming his eye over the shelf on which lay, till called for, the postponed letters destined for the Aultoun, saw with a beating heart the smart post-mistress toss amongst them with an air of sovereign contempt, a pretty large packet, addressed to Francis Tyrrel, Esq. &c. He withdrew his eyes, as if conscious that even to have looked on this important parcel might engender some suspicion of his purpose, or intimated the deep interest which he took in the contents of the missive which was so slightly treated by his friend Mrs. Pott. At this moment the door of the shop opened, and Lady Penelope Penfeather entered, with her eternal pendante, the little Miss Digges.

"Have you seen Mr. Mowbray?—Has Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's been down this morning?—Do you know any thing of Mr. Mowbray, Mrs. Pott?" were questions which the lettered lady eagerly huddled on the back of each other, scarcely giving time to the lady of letters to return a decided negative to all and each of them.

"Mr. Mowbray was not about—was not coming there this morning—his servant had just called for letters and papers, and announced as much."

"Good Heaven! how unfortunate!" said Lady Penelope, with a deep sigh, and sinking down on one of the little sofas in an attitude of shocking desolation, which called the instant attention of Mr. Pott and his good woman, the first uncorking a small phial of salts, for he was a pharmacopolist as well as vender of literature and transmitter of letters, and the other hastening for a glass of water. A strong temptation thrilled from Lord Etherington's eyes to his finger-ends. Two steps might have brought him within arm's-length of the unwatched packet, on the contents of which, in all probability, rested the hope and claims of his rival in honour and fortune; and, in the general confusion, was it impossible to possess himself of it unobserved? But no—no—no—the attempt was too dreadfully dangerous to be risked; and, passing from one extreme to another, he felt as if he was incurring suspicion by suffering Lady Penelope to play off her airs of affected distress and anxiety, without seeming to take that interest in them which her rank at least might be supposed to demand. Stung with this apprehension, he hastened to express himself so anxiously on the subject, and to demonstrate so busily his wish to assist her ladyship, that he presently stood committed a great deal farther than he had intended. Lady Penelope was infinitely obliged to his lordship—indeed, it was her character in general not to permit herself to be overcome by circumstances; but something had happened, so strange, so embarrassing, so melancholy, that she owned it had quite overcome her—notwithstanding, she had at all times piqued herself on supporting her own distresses, better than she was able to suppress her emotions in viewing those of others.

"Could he be of any use?" Lord Etherington asked. "She had inquired after Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's—his servant was at her ladyship's service, if she chose to send to command his attendance."

"Oh! no, no!" said Lady Penelope; "I dare say, my dear lord, you will answer the purpose a great deal better than Mr. Mowbray—that is, provided you are a Justice of Peace."

"A Justice of Peace!" said Lord Etherington, much surprised; "I am in the commission unquestionably, but not for any Scotch county."

"O, that does not signify," said Lady Penelope; "and if you will trust yourself with me a little way, I will explain to you how you can do one of the most charitable, and kind, and generous things in the world."

Lord Etherington's delight in the exercise of charity, kindness, and generosity, was not so exuberant as to prevent his devising some means for evading Lady Penelope's request, when, looking through the sash-door, he had a distant glance of his servant Solmes approaching the Post-office.

I have heard of a sheep-stealer who had rendered his dog so skilful an accomplice in his nefarious traffic, that he used to send him out to commit acts of felony by himself, and had even contrived to impress on the poor cur the caution that he should not, on such occasions, seem even to recognise his master, if they met accidentally.* Apparently, Lord Etherington

* There were several instances of this dexterity, but especially those which occurred in the celebrated case of Murdison and Millar in 1773. These persons, a sheep-farmer and his shepherd, settled in the vale of Tweed, commenced and carried on for some time an extensive system of devastation on the flocks of their neighbours. A dog belonging to Millar was so well trained, that he had only to show him during the day the parcel of sheep which he desired to have; and when dismissed at night for the purpose, Yarrow went right to the pasture where the flock had fed, and carried off the quantity shown him. He then drove them before him by the most secret paths to Murdison's farm, where the dishonest master and servant were in readiness to receive the booty. Two things were remarkable. In the first place, that if the dog, when thus dishonestly employed, actually met his master, he observed great caution in recognising him, as if he had been afraid of bringing him under suspicion; secondly, that he showed a distinct sense that the illegal transactions in which he was engaged were not of a nature to endure daylight. The sheep which he was directed to drive, were often reluctant to leave their own pastures, and sometimes the intervention of rivers or other obstacles made their progress peculiarly difficult. On such occasions, Yarrow continued his efforts to drive his plunder forward, until the day began to dawn, a signal which, he conceived, rendered it necessary for him to desert his spoil, and slink homeward by a circuitous road. It is generally said this accomplished dog was hanged along with his master; but the truth is, he survived him long, in the service of a man in Leithen, yet was said afterwards to have shown little of the wonderful instinct exhibited in the employment of Millar.

Another instance of similar sagacity, a friend of mine discovered in a beautiful little spaniel, which he had purchased from a dealer in the canine race. When he entered a shop, he conducted himself upon a similar principle; had no sooner a glimpse of his agent, than he seemed to feel the necessity of leaving the stage free from machinations.

"My servant," he said, with as much indifference as he could assume, "will call for my letters—attend Lady Penelope;" and, instantly proffering services as Justice of the Peace, or in whatever quality she chose to employ them, he hastily put his arm, and scarce gave her ladyship time to rise from her state of languor to the necessary degree of activity ere he hurried her from the shop; and her thin hatchet-face chattering close to his ear, yellow and scarlet feathers crossing his nose, his right honourable arm hooking his elbow, he heeded the suppressed titters and sneers of all the young women whom he met as they traversed the public walk. One glance of intelligence, though shot at a distance betwixt his lordship and Solmes as they left the public walk under the guidance of Lady Penelope, his limbs indeed obeying her pleasure, his ears dinning with her attempts to explain the business in question, but his mind totally indifferent what was going, or ignorant on what purpose, and busily occupied with the packet in Mrs. Pott's possession, and its probable fate.

At length an effort of recollection made Lord Etherington sensible that his abstraction must seem suspicious eyes of his companion; putting therefore the necessary degree of constraint upon himself, he expressed for the first time, curiosity to know where their meeting was to terminate. It chanced, that this was precisely the question which he needed not to have asked had paid but the slightest attention to the very plausible communications of her ladyship, which he had turned upon this subject.

"Now, my dear lord," she said, "I must beg of you lords of the creation think us poor simpletons the vainest fools alive. I have told you how much pain it costs me to speak about my little creature, and yet you come to make me tell you the whole over again. But I hope, after all, your lordship surprised at what I have thought it my duty to disclose in this sad affair—perhaps I have listened too much to the dictates of my own heart, which are apt to be deceitful."

On the watch to get at something explanatory, afraid, by demanding it directly, to show that the previous tide of narrative and pathos had been lost in an inattentive ear, Lord Etherington could only say that Lady Penelope could not err in acting according to the dictates of her own judgment.

Still the compliment had not sauce enough for the lady's sated palate; so, like a true glutton of compliments, she began to help herself with the soup-ladle.

"Ah! judgment?—how is it you men know so little, that you think we can pause to weigh sentiment in the balance of judgment?—that is expecting too much from us poor victims of our feelings, that you must really hold me excused if I forget the errors of this guilty and unhappy creature, and look upon her wretchedness—Not that I have my little friend, Miss Digges, or your lordship suppose that I am capable of palliating the fault, I pity the poor, miserable sinner. Oh, no—Words express beautifully what one ought to do on such occasions—

'For never was the gentle breast
Insensible to human woes;
Feeling, though firm, it melts to distress'd
For weaknesses it never knows.'

"Most accursed of all précieuses," thought his lordship, "when wilt thou, amidst all thy chatter, utter one word sounding like sense or information?"

But Lady Penelope went on—"If you knew was not long in observing that his little companion was not to follow at some interval, and to estrange itself from its master so much as to appear totally unconnected with him. And when he left the shop, it was the dog's custom to stand behind him till it could find an opportunity of seizing a glove, or silk stockings, or some similar property, and bringing it to its master. The poor fellow probably saved by falling into the hands of an honest man.

a family of respectability, and the character of a young lady, we ought to inquire no farther after."

"I differ from your lordship," said Lady Penelope; "I differ extremely—I suppose you guess whom her discourse touched upon?"

"Indeed, your ladyship does my acuteness too much honour."

"Did she not mention a Christian name?" said Lady Penelope; "your lordship is strangely dull this morning!"

"A Christian name?—No, none that I heard—yes, she said something about—a Catherine, I think it was."

"Catherine?" answered the lady; "No, my lord, it was Clara—rather a rare name in this country, and belonging, I think, to a young lady of whom your lordship should know something, unless your evening flirtations with Lady Binks have blotted entirely out of your memory your morning visits to Shaws-Castle. You are a bold man, my lord. I would advise you to include Mrs. Blower among the objects of your attention, and then you will have maid, wife, and widow upon your list."

"Upon my honour, your ladyship is too severe," said Lord Etherington; "you surround yourself every evening with all that is clever and accomplished among the people here, and then you ridicule a poor secluded monster, who dare not approach your charmed circle, because he seeks for some amusement elsewhere. This is to tyrannize, and not to reign—it is Turkish despotism!"

"Ah! my lord, I know you well, my lord," said Lady Penelope—"Sorry would your lordship be, had you not power to render yourself welcome to any circle which you may please to approach."

"That is to say," answered the lord, "you will pardon me if I intrude on your ladyship's coterie this evening?"

"There is no society which Lord Etherington can think of frequenting, where he will not be a welcome guest."

"I will plead then at once my pardon and privilege this evening—And now," (speaking as if he had succeeded in establishing some confidence with her ladyship,) "what do you really think of this blind story?"

"O, I must believe it concerns Miss Mowbray. She was always an odd girl—something about her I could never endure—a sort of effrontery—that is, perhaps, a harsh word, but a kind of assurance—an air of confidence—so that though I kept on a footing with her, because she was an orphan girl of good family, and because I really knew nothing positively bad of her, yet she sometimes absolutely shocked me."

"Your ladyship, perhaps, would not think it right to give publicity to the story? at least, till you know exactly what it is," said the Earl, in a tone of suggestion.

"Depend upon it, that it is quite the worst, the very worst—You heard the woman say that she had exposed Clara to ruin—and you know she must have meant Clara Mowbray, because she was so anxious to tell the story to her brother, St. Ronan's."

"Very true—I did not think of that," answered Lord Etherington; "still it would be hard on the poor girl if it should get abroad."

"O, it will never get abroad for me," said Lady Penelope; "I would not tell the very wind of it. But then I cannot meet Miss Mowbray as formerly—I have a station in life to maintain, my lord—and I am under the necessity of being select in my society—it is a duty I owe the public, if it were even not my own inclination."

"Certainly, my lady Penelope," said Lord Etherington; "but then consider, that, in a place where all eyes are necessarily observant of your ladyship's behaviour, the least coldness on your part to Miss Mowbray—and, after all, we have nothing like assurance of any thing being wrong there—would ruin her with the company here, and with the world at large."

"Oh! my lord," answered Lady Penelope, "as for the truth of the story, I have some private reasons of my own for holding the strange tale devoutly true; for I had a mysterious hint from a very worthy, but a very singular man, (your lordship knows how I adore originality,) the clergyman of the parish, who made me aware there was something wrong about Miss Clara—something that—your lordship will excuse my speaking more plainly,—Oh, no!—I fear—I fear it is all too true—You know Mr. Cargill, I suppose, my lord?"

"Yes—no—I—I think I have seen him," said Lord Etherington. "But how came the lady to make the parson her father-confessor?—they have no auricular confession in the Kirk—it must have been with the purpose of marriage, I presume—let us hope that it took place—perhaps it really was so—did he, Cargill—the minister, I mean—say any thing of such a matter?"

"Not a word—not a word—I see where you are, my lord; you would put a good face on't.—

'They call'd it marriage, by that specious name
To veil the crime, and sanctify the shame.'

Queen Dido for that. How the clergyman came into the secret I cannot tell—he is a very close man. But I know he will not hear of Miss Mowbray being married to any one, unquestionably because he knows that, in doing so, she would introduce disgrace into some honest family—and, truly, I am much of his mind, my lord."

"Perhaps Mr. Cargill may know the lady is privately married already," said the Earl; "I think that is the more natural inference, begging your ladyship's pardon for presuming to differ in opinion."

Lady Penelope seemed determined not to take this view of the case.

"No, no—no, I tell you," she replied; "she cannot be married, for if she were married, how could the poor wretch say that she was ruined?—You know there is a difference betwixt ruin and marriage."

"Some people are said to have found them synonymous, Lady Penelope," answered the Earl.

"You are smart on me, my lord; but still, in common parlance, when we say a woman is ruined, we mean quite the contrary of her being married—it is impossible for me to be more explicit upon such a topic, my lord."

"I defer to your ladyship's better judgment," said Lord Etherington. "I only entreat you to observe a little caution in this business—I will make the strictest inquiries of this woman, and acquaint you with the result; and I hope, out of regard to the respectable family of St. Ronan's, your ladyship will be in no hurry to intimate any thing to Miss Mowbray's prejudice."

"I certainly am no person to spread scandal, my lord," answered the lady, drawing herself up; "at the same time, I must say, the Mowbrays have little claim on me for forbearance. I am sure I was the first person to bring this Spa into fashion, which has been a matter of such consequence to their estate; and yet Mr. Mowbray set himself against me, my lord, in every possible sort of way, and encouraged the underbred people about him to behave very strangely.—There was the business of building the Belvidere, which he would not permit to be done out of the stock-purse of the company, because I had given the workmen the plan and the orders—and then, about the tea-room—and the hour for beginning dancing—and about the subscription for Mr. Rymour's new Tale of Chivalry—in short, I owe no consideration to Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's."

"But the poor young lady?" said Lord Etherington.

"Oh! the poor young lady?—the poor young lady can be as saucy as a rich young lady, I promise you.—There was a business in which she used me scandalously, Lord Etherington—it was about a very trifling matter—a shawl. Nobody minds dress less than I do, my lord; I thank Heaven my thoughts turn upon very different topics—but it is in trifles that disrespect and unkindness are shown; and I have had a full share of both from Miss Clara, besides a good deal of impertinence from her brother upon the same subject."

"There is but one way remains," thought the Earl as they approached the Spa, "and that is to work on the fears of this d-d vindictive blue-stockings' d wildcat.—Your ladyship," he said aloud, "is aware what severe damages have been awarded in late cases where something approaching to scandal has been traced to ladies of consideration—the privileges of the tea-table have been found insufficient to protect some fair critics against the consequences of too frank and liberal animadversion upon the characters of their friends. So pray, remember, that as yet we know very little on this subject."

Lady Penelope loved money, and feared the law; and this hint, fortified by her acquaintance with Mowbray's love of his sister, and his irritable and revengeful disposition, brought her in a moment much nearer the temper in which Lord Etherington wished to leave her. She protested, that no one could be more tender than she of the fame of the unfortunate, even supposing their guilt was fully proved—promised caution on the subject of the pauper's declaration, and hoped Lord Etherington would join her tea-party early in the evening, as she wished to make him acquainted with one or two of her protégés, whom, she was sure, his lordship would find deserving of his advice and countenance. Being by this time at the door of her own apartment, her ladyship took leave of the Earl with a most gracious smile.

CHAPTER XXXII.

DISAPPOINTMENT.

On the lee-beam lies the land, boys,
See all clear to reef each course;
Let the fore-sheets go, don't mind, boys,
Though the weather should be worse.—The Storm.

"It darkens round me like a tempest," thought Lord Etherington, as, with slow step, folded arms, and his white hat slouched over his brows, he traversed the short interval of space betwixt his own apartments and those of the Lady Penelope. In a buck of the old school, one of Congreve's men of wit and pleasure about town, this would have been a departure from character; but the present fine man does not derogate from his quality, even by exhibiting all the moody and gentlemanlike solemnity of Master Stephen. So, Lord Etherington was at liberty to carry on his reflections, without attracting observation.—"I have put a stopper into the mouth of that old vinegar-cruet of quality, but the acidity of her temper will soon dissolve the charm—And what to do?"

As he looked round him, he saw his trusty valet Solmes, who, touching his hat with due respect, said as he passed him, "Your lordship's letters are in your private despatch-box."

Simple as these words were, and indifferent the tone in which they were spoken, their import made Lord Etherington's heart bound as if his fate had depended on the accents. He intimated no farther interest in the communication, however, than to desire Solmes to be below, in case he should ring; and with these words entered his apartment, and barred and bolted the door, even before he looked on the table where his despatch-box was placed.

Lord Etherington had, as is usual, one key to the box which held his letters, his confidential servant being intrusted with the other; so that, under the protection of a patent lock, his despatches escaped all risk of being tampered with,—a precaution not altogether unnecessary on the part of those who frequent hotels and lodging-houses.

"By your leave, Mr. Bramah," said the Earl as he applied the key, jesting, as it were, with his own agitation, as he would have done with that of a third party. The lid was raised, and displayed the packet, the appearance and superscription of which had attracted his observation but a short while before in the post-office. Then he would have given much to be possessed of the opportunity which was now in his power; but many pause on the brink of a crime, who have contemplated it at a distance without scruple. Lord Etherington's first impulse had led him to poke the fire; and he held in his hand the letter which he was more than half tempted to commit, without even breaking the seal, to the fiery element. But, though sufficiently familiarized with guilt, he was not as yet acquainted with it in its basest shapes—he had not yet acted with meanness, or at least with what the world terms such. He had been a duellist, the manners of the age authorized it—a libertine, the world excused it to his youth and condition—a bold and successful gambler, for that quality he was admired and envied; and a thousand other inaccuracies, to which these practices and habits lead, were easily slurred over in a man of quality, with fortune and spirit to support his rank. But his present meditated act was of a different kind. Tell it not in Bond Street, whisper it not on St. James's pavement!—it amounted to an act of petty larceny, for which the code of honour would admit of no composition.

Lord Etherington, under the influence of these recollections, stood for a few minutes suspended.—But the devil always finds logic to convince his followers. He recollected the wrong done to his mother, and to himself, her offspring, to whom his father had in the face of the whole world, imparted the hereditary rights, of which he was now, by a posthumous deed, endeavouring to deprive the memory of the one, and the expectations of the other. Surely, the right being his own, he had a full title, by the most effectual means, whatever such means might be, to repel all attacks on that right, and even destroy, if necessary, the documents by which his enemies were prosecuting their unjust plans against his honour and interest.

This reasoning prevailed, and Lord Etherington again held the devoted packet above the flames; when it occurred to him, that his resolution being taken, he ought to carry it into execution as effectually as possible; and to do so, it was necessary to know, that the packet actually contained the papers which he was desirous to destroy.

Never did a doubt arise in juster time; for no sooner had the seal burst, and the envelope rustled under his fingers, than he perceived, to his utter consternation, that he held in his hand only the copies of the deeds for which Francis Tyrrel had written, the originals of which he had too sanguinely concluded would be forwarded according to his requisition. A letter from a partner of the house with which they were deposited, stated that they had not felt themselves at liberty, in the absence of the head of their firm, to whom these papers had been committed, to part with them even to Mr. Tyrrel, though they had proceeded so far as to open the parcel, and now transmitted to him formal copies of the papers contained in it, which, they presumed, would serve Mr. Tyrrel's purpose for consulting counsel, or the like. They themselves, in a case of so much delicacy, and in the absence of their principal partner, were determined to retain the originals, unless called to produce them in a court of justice.

With a solemn imprecation on the formality and absurdity of the writer, Lord Etherington let the letter of advice drop from his hand into the fire, and throwing himself into a chair, passed his hand across his eyes, as if their very power of sight had been blighted by what he had read. His title, and his paternal fortune, which he thought but an instant before might be rendered unchallengeable by a single movement of his hand, seemed now on the verge of being lost for ever. His rapid recollection failed not to remind him of what was less known to the world, that his early and profuse expenditure had greatly dilapidated his maternal fortune; and that the estate of Nettlewood, which five minutes ago he only coveted as a wealthy man desires increase of his store, must now be acquired, if he would avoid being a poor and embarrassed spendthrift. To impede his possession of this property, fate had restored to the scene the penitent of the morning, who, as he had too much reason to believe, was returned to this neighbourhood, to do justice to Clara Mowbray, and who was not unlikely to put the whole story of the marriage on its right footing. She, however, might be got rid of; and it might still be possible to hurry Miss Mowbray, by working on her fears, or through the agency of her brother, into a union with him while he still preserved the title of Lord Etherington. This he resolved to secure, if effort or if intrigue try the point; and was it the least considerate, should he succeed, he would obtain over his successful rival, such a triumph, as would amply to counterbalance the tranquillity of his whole few minutes, his rapid and contriving invention formed a plan for securing the sole advantage seemed to remain open for him; and contented he had no time to lose, he entered immediately on the execution.

He summoned Solmes to his lordship's apartments the Earl, as coolly as if he had hoped to experiment a valet by such an assertion, and gave brought him a packet designed for some the Aulouin—let it be sent to him—Stay, I will it first.

Sordidly re-sealed the packet, containing all that, excepting the letter of advice (which he it), and gave it to the valet, with the caution you would not make such blunders in

The servant was retiring, when he added, "Stay a moment—I have a more important business than I have yet mentioned—Solmes, managed devilish all about the woman and the Earl, as his agent withdrew,

"there is a spring put in motion, which, well educt, will move the whole machine—And here, in lucky time, comes Harry Jekyll—I hear his whistle on the stairs.—There is a silly lightness of heart about that fellow, which I envy, while I despise it; but he is welcome now, for I want him."

Jekyll entered accordingly, and broke out with "I am glad to see one of your fellows laying a cloth for two in your parlour, Etherington—I was afraid you were going down among those confounded butes again to-day."

"You are not to be one of the two, Hal," answered Lord Etherington.

"No?—then I may be a third, I hope, if not second?"

"Neither first, second, nor third, Captain.—The truth is, I want a tête-à-tête with Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's," replied the Earl; "and, besides, I have to beg the very particular favour of you to go again to that fellow Marigny. It is time that he should produce his papers, if he has any—of which, for one, I do not believe a word. He has had ample time to hear from London, and I think I have delayed long enough in an important matter upon his bare assertion."

"I cannot blame your impatience," said Jekyll, "and I will go on your errand instantly. As you waited on my advice, I am bound to find an end to your suspense.—At the same time, if the man is not possessed of such papers as he spoke of, I must own he is happy in a command of consummate assurance, which might set up the whole roll of attorneys."

"You will be soon able to judge of that," said Lord Etherington, "and now, off with you—Why do you look at me so anxiously?"

"I cannot tell—I have strange forebodings about this tête-à-tête with Mowbray. You should spare him Etherington—he is not your match—wants both judgment and temper."

"Tell him so, Jekyll," answered the Earl, "and his proud Scotch stomach will be up in an instant, and he will pay you with a shot for your pains.—Why, he thinks himself cock of the walk, this strutting hantam, notwithstanding the lesson I gave him before—And what do you think?—He has the impudence to talk about my attentions to Lady Banks as inconsistent with the prosecution of my suit to his sister! You, Hal—this awkward Scotch bird, that has scarce met enough to make love to a cow-milker, or, at best, to some daggled antique, has the assurance to start himself as my rival?"

"Then, good-night to St. Ronan's!—this will be a 'stir' dinner to him—Etherington, I know by that cough you are bent on mischief—I have a great mind to give him a hint."

"I wish you would," answered the Earl; "it would all turn to my account."

"Do you defy me?—Well, if I meet him, I will put him on his guard."

The friends parted; and it was not long ere Jekyll encountered Mowbray on one of the public walks.

"You dine with Etherington to-day?" said the Captain.—"Forgive me, Mr. Mowbray, if I say one single word—Beware."

"Of what should I beware, Captain Jekyll," answered Mowbray, "when I dine with a friend of your own, and a man of honour?"

"Certainly Lord Etherington is both, Mr. Mowbray; but he loves play, and is too hard for most people."

"I thank you for the hint, Captain Jekyll—I am a new Scotchman, it is true; but yet I know a thing or two. Fair play is always presumed amongst gentlemen; and that taken for granted, I have the vanity to think I need no one's caution on the subject, not even Captain Jekyll's, though his experience must needs be so much superior to mine."

"In that case, sir," said Jekyll, bowing coldly, "I have no more to say, and I hope there is no harm done.—Concerned excoomb?" he added mentally, as they parted, "how truly did Etherington judge of him, and what an ass was I to intermeddle!—I hope Etherington will strip him of every feather!"

He pursued his walk in quest of Tyrril, and Mowbray proceeded to the apartments of the Earl, in a temper of mind well suited to the purposes of the latter, who judged of his disposition accurately when he permitted Jekyl to give his well-meant warning. To be supposed, by a man of acknowledged fashion, so decidedly inferior to his antagonist—to be considered as an object of compassion, and made the subject of a good-boy warning, was gall and bitterness to his proud spirit, which, the more that he felt a conscious inferiority in the arts which they all cultivated, struggled the more to preserve the footing of at least apparent equality.

Since the first memorable party at night, Mowbray had never hazarded his luck with Lord Etherington, except for trifling stakes, but his conceit led him to suppose that he now fully understood his play, and, agreeably to the practice of those who have habituated themselves to gambling, he had every now and then felt a yearning to try for his revenge. He wished also to be out of Lord Etherington's debt, free of all guile under a sense of pecuniary obligation, which he considered his speaking his mind to him fully upon the subject of his flirtation with Lady Hanka, which he justly considered as an insult to his superiority, considering the footing on which the Earl seemed desirous to stand with Clara Mowbray. From these objects, as a favourable evening might free him, and Mowbray was, in fact, indulging in a waking dream to this purpose, when Jekyl interrupted him. His unkindly warning only excited a spirit of contradiction, and a determination to show the adviser how little he was qualified to judge of his talents; and in this humour, his ruin, which was the consequence of that afternoon, was far from seeming to be the premeditated, or even the voluntary work of the Earl of Etherington.

On the contrary, the victim himself was the first to propose play—deep play—double stakes; while Lord Etherington, on the other hand, often proposed to diminish their game, or to break off entirely; but it was always with an affectation of superiority, which only stimulated Mowbray to farther and more desperate risks; and, at last, when Mowbray became his debtor to an overwhelming amount, (his circumstances considered,) the Earl threw down the cards, and declared he should be too late for Lady Penelope's tea-party, to which he was positively engaged.

"Will you not give me my revenge?" said Mowbray, taking up the cards, and shuffling them with fierce anxiety.

"Not now, Mowbray; we have played too long already—you have lost too much—more than perhaps is convenient for you to pay."

Mowbray gnashed his teeth, in spite of his resolution to maintain an exterior, at least of firmness.

"You can take your time, you know," said the Earl, "a note of hand will suit me as well as the money."

"No, by G—!" answered Mowbray, "I will not be so taken in a second time—I had better have sold myself to the devil than to your lordship—I have never been my own man since."

"There are not very kind expressions, Mowbray," said the Earl, "you would play, and they that will play must expect sometimes to lose."

"And they who win will expect to be paid," said Mowbray, breaking in. "I know that as well as you, my lord, and you shall be paid—I will pay you—I will pay you, by G—! Do you make any doubt that I will pay you, my lord?"

"You look as if you thought of paying me in sharp coin," said Lord Etherington; "and I think that would scarce be consistent with the terms we stand upon towards each other."

"By my soul, my lord," said Mowbray, "I cannot tell what these terms are, and to be at my wit's end at once, I should be glad to know. You set out upon paying addresses to my sister, and with your visits and opportunities at Shaws-Castle, I cannot find the matter makes the least progress—it keeps moving without advancing, like a child's rocking-horse. Perhaps you think that you have curbed me up so tightly, that I dare not stir in the matter; but you will find it otherwise.—Your lordship may keep a bargain if you will, but my sister shall not enter it."

"You are angry, and therefore you are unjust," said Etherington; "you know well enough it is your sister's fault that there is any delay. I am most obliged—most desirous—to call her Lady Etherington—nothing but her unlucky prejudices against me have retarded a union which I have so many reasons for desiring."

"Well," replied Mowbray, "that shall be my business. I know no reason she can pretend to decline a marriage so honourable to her name, and which is approved of by me, that bears her head. That matter shall be arranged in twenty-four hours."

"It will do me the most sensible pleasure," said Lord Etherington; "you shall soon see how sincerely I desire your alliance; and as for the wife you have lost—"

"It is no trifle to me, my lord—it is my ruin—but it shall be paid—and let me tell your lordship, you may thank your good luck for it more than your good play."

"We will say no more of it at present, if you please," said Lord Etherington, "to-morrow is a new day; and if you will take my advice, you will not be too harsh with your sister. A little firmness is seldom amiss with young women, but over-kill—"

"I will pray your lordship to spare me your views on this subject. However valuable it may be in other respects, I can, I take it, speak to my own sister in my own way."

"Since you are so constitutionally disposed, Mowbray," answered the Earl, "I presume you will not honour her ladyship's tea-table to-night, though I believe it will be the last of the season?"

"And why should you think so, my lord?" answered Mowbray, whose looks had rendered his reply and contradictory upon every subject that was started. "Why should not I pay my respects to Lady Penelope, or say other today of equal? I have no title, indeed; but I suppose that is family."
